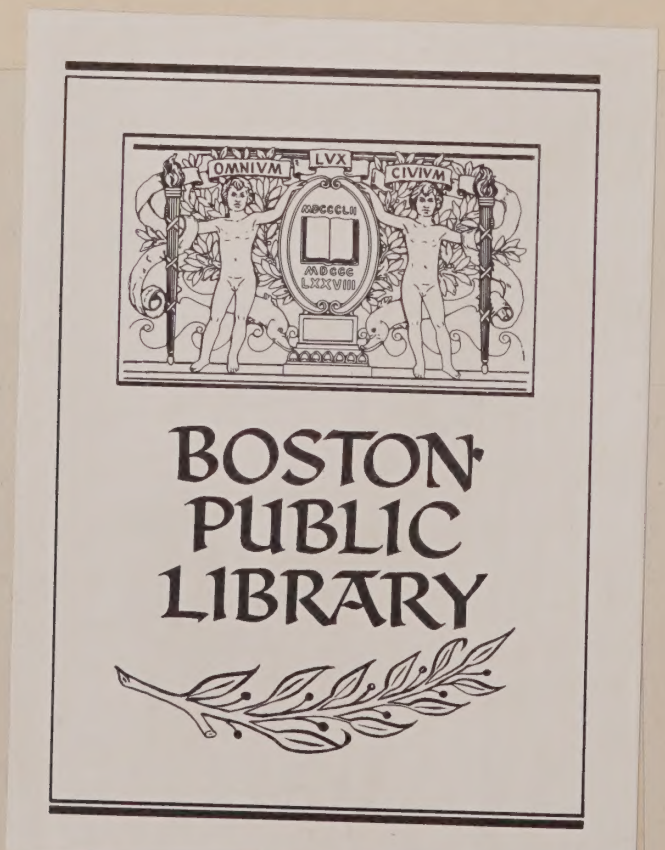
Boston Public Library
3 9999 10588 654 1

PRESENTED TO

THE MALDEN PUBLIC LIBRARY,

By E. F. BICKFORD.

Malden, Oct. 1st, 1885.



144 858 738 (1)

The Nation:

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

VOLUME XIII.

FROM JULY 1 TO DECEMBER 31, 1871.

NEW YORK:

E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS.

1871.

Removed AP2
.N2

10603

The Nation.

E L Bradford
Cloth

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JULY 6, 1871.

The Week.

If it had not been for the college commencements during the past week the newspapers would have suffered from dearth of matter, in spite of the activity of criminals and lunatics. There could hardly be a better proof of the dulness of the season than the amount of space the Washington correspondents devote to speculations as to whether the President will pardon Bowen the bigamist. Some think he will, others that he will not, and the chances seem to vary from day to day. The latest story is that the President has handed the whole matter over to the Attorney-General, and it is to be presumed that that official is now giving laborious days to the examination of the case. The other great subject of the President's consideration is said to be the condition of New York politics, which he is once more going to reform, and is investigating the matter at Long Branch.

The Harrisburg Telegraph has been looking about for a really good candidate for the Vice-Presidency, and has succeeded in finding one who is just the man for the place. "It is hard to say," the Telegraph observes, "whether the party or the man would be most honored by the nomination," and it adds that it is not alone in this opinion, for the Philadelphia Morning Post thinks that no stronger man could be associated with Grant, and that his nomination would ensure a Republican victory in Pennsylvania next year, and an overwhelming majority. Both journals point to the fact that men in their own and other States are of their mind, and cite in particular the language used the other day at a meeting in Baltimore. This gathering was at first intended to be small and very informal in its character, but enthusiasm took hold of the people assembled, numbers flocked in, a meeting was organized, Mr. S. S. Blair being chosen chairman, and resolutions regularly passed. One of these nominates Grant for re-election, another speaks of a Vice-Presidential candidate who is a man not only eminent in the councils of the nation, but who also was the most active defender of his country in the time of her troubles, and whose private traits are as eminent and honorable as his public career. In short, it is Mr. Simon Cameron whom the Telegraph has discovered as the candidate who, in 1872, can sweep Pennsylvania by an overwhelming majority, and for whom the Baltimore meeting was so ardent. It is not high treason, we believe, to say, in view of this discovery, that the superintendent of the Baltimore Division of the Northern Central Railroad, of which road Mr. Donald Cameron, son of the Senator, is president, is the Mr. S. S. Blair who presided at the Baltimore meeting; nor to say that the Morning Post of Philadelphia, which casts so sagacious an eye over our troubled politics, is asserted by the world's people to be in great part the property of Mr. Cameron; and that of the Harrisburg Telegraph also, it is asserted by its enemies that it too, is, in part the property of Mr. Cameron. Apparently, then, Mr. Cameron has set himself definitely to work for the Vice-Presidency, and finds supporters who have the face to say even to the people of Pennsylvania that "it is hard to say whether the party or the man would be more honored by his nomination." The simple truth is that the Republican party contains hardly a man whose nomination would be more harmful to it outside of Pennsylvania, and it is little short of a misfortune to it that its prospects should be such as to hold out to a man like him the faintest hope that his name may possibly be put upon the Republican ticket. It is not one of the least things against Grant himself as a candidate for the nomination that he has taken Cameron as one of his friends and advisers.

The peculiar position which Pennsylvania occupies in our politics may be presumed to be Mr. Cameron's ground of supposing that his reputation will not be sufficient to put him out of the question as a candidate. It is, to be sure, some time yet to the next Presidential election, and it would require a wise man to say what are going to be the relative prospects of parties this time next year; but it would not require excessive prudence to fear that the Republican party—let alone this or that particular candidate—may need every electoral vote it can in any way get. For instance, one or two nominations readily occur to all minds as possible to be made by the Democracy, which being made would make it extremely doubtful if the Republican nominees could win. Or, on the other hand, it is conceivable that General Grant's administration, which six months ago was in such discredit and which rose again under the influence of the English negotiation, may, by taking vigorously in hand some one or two measures of excellence, as the overhauling of our financial management and of the civil service, make itself indispensable and independent of Pennsylvania politicians. In such political situations as the present, the October elections have always had a great deal to do with turning the general vote in November in this or that direction, and the Pennsylvanian vote has been the most influential of those of the October States. Doubtless, a manager who, by hook or by crook, can next year carry Pennsylvania for a platform, not such as Pennsylvania left to herself would have constructed, would be a valuable party-servant of a certain kind. But we imagine that Republicans are clear enough in the opinion that Mr. Cameron a long time since put it out of his power to render such service.

We have had a fight with the Coreans, a simple sort of people, of a Chinese turn of mind, and of the Buddhist persuasion, who are now the only nation with a seaboard that has managed to avoid intercourse with foreigners. As usual, however, their doom has come upon them through their having made a "treacherous attack" on Americans, for which they refused to apologize, which led to their being assailed by the American squadron under Admiral Rodgers, handsomely pounded, and five of their forts taken with small loss. It is hardly likely that this will be the end of it. Their animosity to foreigners will be increased by what has happened, and they will make other attacks, which will be punished again, and finally they will be dragged into intercourse with the civilized world. The only way of avoiding this process is for civilized navies to stay away from Corean waters. Apparently the most marked result of the opening of Corea to the commerce of the world would be a heavy fall in tigers, which it produces in great abundance.

The Civil Service Commission have begun their sittings at Washington, and meet, we believe, daily, but of course have hardly made much progress yet beyond settling the exact nature of their functions, which they have decided to be advisory merely. It will make a good deal of difference, however, whether they report to the President, and he takes on himself the responsibility of acting on the report, or merely sends it to Congress, and leaves that body to take some action about it. One does not require to be a seer to know what will happen if he does. Congress will shelve the report, and on the ground that, though nearly every member of both Houses is in favor of civil service reform, he cannot make up his mind that "this particular measure is just what is wanted, etc." Whereas, if the President will only summon up courage to adopt the Commission's suggestions, and enforce them on his own responsibility, we shall at least get in the narrow end of the wedge, and he may certainly count on the hearty support of the country. There is one danger which we may be allowed to express the hope the Commission will avoid—we mean the danger of attempting too much. If they try to introduce fixity of tenure, or prohibit removal except "for cause," and after trial, they may depend upon it their reform will not last long, as the politicians will find no difficulty in breaking it down in practice, because the heads of departments will repudiate all responsibility for maladministration, and throw the blame on the new system, as having deprived them of all control over their subordinates. The true plan is to leave every chief absolute power of dismissal without cause, but provide that he shall not fill the place except by competitive examination. This would deprive him of all political motives for making a change, and would gradually, even in the worst cases, wean politicians from the habit of looking on offices as a means of rewarding party services, or, indeed, of thinking anything about the political opinion of office-holders. In short, the reform ought to be confined to fixing the qualifications which office-holders must have, and the mode in which they shall be selected, and, we would add also, promoted.

It were better for the judges of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts if they had never been born—for they have done the accursed thing. They have brought the cold, hard, and "legal mind" to bear on one of the warmest, most succulent, and juicy problems of the day—the right of women to be justices of the peace under the State constitution. Governor Claflin has appointed Mrs. Julia Ward Howe and Mrs. Stevens to be justices of the peace, and the Council, whose ways in the matter we do not at all like, took the opinion of the court on the question of eligibility before confirming the appointment, just as if the Governor, who is responsible to the people, was not as competent to form an opinion on this point as any of them. The court has decided that the appointment would not be valid, the laws of the State at the time of the adoption of the constitution, and the whole frame and purport of the instrument itself, and the construction put upon it for the greater part of a century afterwards, confining such offices to men. It ought to be added that the appointments in themselves were good, and the recipients will doubtless take the opinion in good part, but we doubt if the rest of the champions will acquiesce in it tamely. "Have the judges sisters, or wives, or mothers?" is a question which they are not unlikely to be asked, or "Do they dread the consequences to the male monopoly of the highest judicial offices which would speedily result from the admission of women to the lowest?"

The strongest objection to performances like this of the Governor's is that they are, as we have said once before, attempts to decide a question of the most serious kind—the admission of women to participation in the actual working of the political machinery, by what it is hardly unfair to call "a dodge." There is no question, and never has been any question, in the mind of any candid and intelligent man or woman, that no matter of what technical construction the instrument may be capable, no constitution in this country really intended women to vote and hold office, and no one doubts that their voting and holding office would make a serious difference in our social and political system, either for good or ill. It is, therefore, not honest to try to settle the question except by a fair and frank judgment of the men and the women of the community, even if it be reserved for men to say in what manner the government shall be carried on, and it is certainly the right of women to say whether or no they wish to be burdened with a share of it. All attempts to impose political duties on them by huggermuggering between male politicians and a handful of female agitators are tricks which deserve severer reprobation than they get. The gradual increase in their number at the instigation of the woman's rights champions does not make us hopeful as to that "purification of politics" of which we have heard so much.

The Supreme Court of the same State has done another thing which will expose it to much objurgation from another class of sentimentalists, in deciding that a mason who was fined $500 by a trades-union association in Boston for getting some of his stone-cutting done in New York (which was a breach of the society rules), and had to pay the fine in order to avoid having his men taken away from him, and being thus prevented fulfilling his contracts, was entitled to recover the amount from the members of the association, and he has sued them accordingly. It is this class of decisions which causes the French Communists to abolish the courts the minute they get into power, and substitute for them "the justice of the people," and to call for the "sweeping away of jurisprudence."

The Californian Democrats have joined in the "new departure." They accept the three amendments to the Constitution as a final settlement of the matters with which they deal, but demand the strict construction of them; call for universal amnesty; denounce "unlawful combinations" and also the "bayonet bill" passed to suppress them; declare for a tariff for revenue only, and reprobate the protective system; condemn land-grants to corporations; abuse Congress for not repealing the income-tax, for maintaining so many tax-gatherers, and for not stopping the importation of Chinese; denounce subsidies to railroads and other corporations; call for the amendment of the State constitutions for various purposes, but notably to prohibit the lending of the State credit to corporations; express warm sympathy with the workingman, and point to legislation shortening the hours of labor and restricting Chinese immigration in proof of their sincerity; again denounce Chinamen as an "inferior people," and abuse Congress for connivance at their coming.

The Treasury statement of the National Debt shows an unexpectedly large reduction, over seven millions for the month, mainly consisting of six millions of six per cent. bonds purchased and cancelled out of surplus customs receipts. The amount of five per cents subscribed for in exchange for sixes appears to have been nearly all delivered, the amount of the former appearing over fifty millions larger than on the previous statement. The new subscriptions appear to have ceased entirely, and the accounts from the agents sent to Europe are scarcely more encouraging, in spite of the continued abundance and cheapness of money at all the great financial centres.

The commerce of this port has been active. Large receipts of breadstuffs have been followed by a decided decline in price and heavy exports. Most of the other important staples have been higher, reacting from the previous decline. Cotton has had a further advance under the influence of continued unfavorable weather for the growing crop and the accumulating evidence of a largely increased consumption during the past six months. Coal has suffered a further decline, but the consumer has scarcely received the benefit as yet. Real estate is stagnant, although some of the suburban auction sales are reported to have been successful.

In the money market the utmost apathy prevails. Rates of interest have again been lower than ever before known. Stocks have settled down materially after the failure of the disgraceful Rock Island affair, but the extreme ease of money has enabled the great cliques to prevent any serious decline while the settlement of the recent collapse is in progress. Government bonds have been higher both here and abroad, but the unfavorable condition of the exchanges continues, and the coin shipment for the week has been unusually heavy. Under its influence the premium has been firm and has advanced somewhat, but the daily fluctuations are confined within extremely narrow limits. Double-eagles are again at a premium of three-eighths to one-half per cent. over small coin.

The terror and horror combined caused by the resistance of the Commune in Paris have had the effect, which we ventured to anticipate at the time, of filling the International Association with hope, and increasing its audacity. It glories in its doings in Paris, and, so far from being ashamed of the Commune, wants the credit of all its atrocities and desperation. The English communists have also held a meeting and issued an address of sympathy, which, for what used to be called cool wickedness, has not often been surpassed, and it has evidently frightened some of the genteel and "educated" sympathizers with the Reds, and they accordingly begin to haul off. Something of the same kind has been attempted in this city, but it was not very successful. The difficulty here is that there is no great ardor for a division of goods, nearly every man having something of his own he would like to keep; and then, owing to greater mental activity, there are very few come-outers here who have not a hobby of their own, and each man is so anxious to have his own way that no hearty union against society and property seems probable. We are glad to see that Stephen Pearl Andrews was at the meeting, and hope that he may get "Alwato" adopted as the language of the "Universal Republic."

The Treaty of Washington has been ratified by the English Government, which finally settles the Alabama question in the rational way in which we predicted that it might and would be settled, soon after Mr. Sumner made his speech, when we said (Nation, May 20, 1869) "that America had a perfectly good case against England; that all that portion of her claim for damages which is computable, and which the opinion of the civilized world will pronounce reasonable, will be paid, if firmly, calmly, and decently urged, and that along with payment can be obtained an expression of regret for the wrong-doing which brought this damage about; but the negotiations will have to be conducted by statesmen and not by rhetoricians." The most important point in the whole matter, as regards the future peace of the world, is the expression of regret, because the truth is that most wars are wars of sentiment—that is, begun on sentimental grounds, much as duels used to be fought—and if it once be established that an expression of regret for wrong-doing does not involve loss of position, though it may not put an end to fighting, it will greatly diminish it. The ratification of the treaty met with less opposition in England than was anticipated, the ex-post-facto operation of the basis of settlement being the only point which was made much of. It was said it was monstrous to try England for an offence under a law which was not in force when the offence was committed, but to this there was the ready reply, that if England agreed to be so tried, it was not monstrous. The slight commotion made by the treaty caused an attack in the House of Lords on the Declaration of Paris, with regard to the immunity of enemy's goods in neutral bottoms, but it ended in a "conversation."

The accounts of the French loan are still somewhat confused and partly unintelligible. But the official announcement in the Chambers leaves no doubt that the loan is a triumphant success, exceeding even the anticipations of the warmest and most sanguine friends of France, and entirely upsetting the calculations of those who believed in the serious exhaustion of the country. The amount demanded was subscribed for more than twice over in a very short space of time, and the provinces had not yet all been heard from. But it must not be forgotten that the loan is payable in seventeen instalments, and that there may be some difference between subscribing and paying, especially when the money paid in is necessarily to some extent sent abroad. The connection, too, of some large German banking-houses with the loan is not altogether explained, and the result has evidently surprised even the French Government itself, which only a few days ago was reported as making most strenuous exertions to secure subscriptions in Belgium. The contrast between this result and our own failure to raise one-half the amount makes the French success only appear still more extraordinary.

M. Pouyer-Quertier announced to the French National Assembly the splendid success of the new loan in its sitting of June 28. In less than six hours the agents of the Treasury had been promised $900,000,000, Paris alone having subscribed more than half of that sum; not all the provinces had been heard from, so that the total amount of the subscriptions could not yet be ascertained. The Government, thus enabled "to hasten the deliverance of the country," the Minister added, "would not wait for the dates fixed by the Treaty of Frankfort" in paying the war indemnity. A few days later, the Bank of France began the publication of its returns, the bullion in its vaults then amounting to $110,000,000, and the treasury balance being $28,000,000. The long-delayed military review, which was finally held at Longchamps on the 29th, proved another success for the Government of M. Thiers, whose great ability in managing affairs, both on the stage and behind it—in spite of the endless difficulties of the situation—becomes from day to day more apparent. No Bonapartist demonstrations, as was apprehended, were made by the soldiers, who, on the contrary, evinced a loyal enthusiasm, repeatedly cheering the old Chief of the Executive. One hundred and sixty battalions of infantry, sixty squadrons of cavalry, and three hundred pieces of artillery were on the field.

The French elections of Sunday last have resulted in an overwhelming triumph of the moderate Republicans and their associates in supporting the Government of M. Thiers. The Radicals, Bonapartists, and Legitimists together have succeeded only in carrying about one-third of the electoral districts; the Orleanists seem to have had no candidates of their own, and to have voted mainly with the moderate Republicans. The accounts thus far received are, however, quite meagre and, in some respects, contradictory. Among the successful candidates we find Wolowski, the distinguished political economist, a naturalized Pole, who heads the list in Paris; the Generals Cissey and Faidherbe, the latter elected in three provincial districts; Gambetta, elected at Paris and two other places; Laboulaye, Pressensé, and D'Haussonville. Rouher is conspicuous among the beaten Bonapartists. The vote in the capital was very light, owing of course, to the losses and apathy of the laboring classes. The Republican press is jubilant over the result, while the monarchical journals have fallen to wrangling with each other. A considerable change in the position of parties in the National Assembly is naturally anticipated. What is most likely is, that the hotspurs among the Legitimists will now make a decided front against M. Thiers, in view of the fact that the prolongation of "the truce" which he advocates has proved so disastrous to the interests of their party at the very beginning.

Numberless, as might have been expected, were the manifestoes and appeals which preceded the elections. Most Bonapartists emphasized their devotion to the honor of France and of the church; others, like Rouher, made the interest of free-trade their main staff; the Royalists thundered against anarchy; the "unsubdued" of the Commune lavished imprecations against the rich, the priests, and the bloodthirsty army; the moderate Republicans dwelt on the necessity of upholding the status quo; the Radicals warned the people against the final and hopeless decay to which monarchy would inevitably lead them. The chief manifesto of the latter, though signed among others by Louis Blanc, is, we are sorry to find, a document full of high-sounding phrases and frantic apostrophes, without a single common-sense argument. We hear of "slumber," "death," "decay," "abyss," "fall after fall in a bottomless void," "the force of things which carries away dead things," "ruins" and "tombs"—characteristics, of course, of the past and future of monarchy in France—and are told that the Republic will cure all ills; but not a word is said concerning its failures in the past or its conditions in the future. M. Alexandre Dumas (fils), in his late epistle, speaks much more impartially of past fictions and failures, but the remedy he proposes—ten years of virtuous life—will hardly appear palatable to the people, with whom "virtue" is not in favor, and of whom the regular political preachers demand only a vote.

The King of Italy made his formal entry into Rome on Monday, and the various government offices being transferred to it also, that city is now once more, after the lapse of fifteen centuries, the capital of Italy. The Pope has, as yet, made no move, though it was positively announced that he would take his departure as soon as the "Subalpine monarch," as he pleasantly calls him, made his appearance. The difficulty of deciding where to go to is probably insurmountable. At this moment there is not a government in Europe from which he could ask for dignified refuge. Twenty years ago, there were a dozen. He has lived to see many strange things besides the falsification of the proverb which denies the Pope a reign of twenty-five years. The Döllinger trouble continues without serious change, but Döllinger himself seems to be advancing, as he has announced that he considers the participation of the laity in the government of the church one of the great needs of the day.

A SOUTHERN VIEW OF THE SOUTHERN PROBLEM.

THE report of the convention of taxpayers which met at Columbus, S. C., in May, has just been issued in an authentic shape, and contains perhaps the most coherent statement of the opinions of the disfranchised class of Southerners that has appeared since the process of reconstruction began. It derives all the more weight from the fact that the assertions it makes about the condition of affairs in South Carolina are now generally acknowledged by Northern observers to be true, or, at all events, well founded. When the first outcry reached us from Southerners about the doings of the new governing class which was called into existence by the Reconstruction Acts, there was very little disposition at the North to pay any attention to it. It was thought not at all unnatural that the slaveholders should wince at seeing their old slaves and their late enemies legislating for them, and then the Southern press and Southern orators had such a reputation for rhodomontade, and exaggeration, and misrepresentation, that very few people here paid much serious attention to anything that came from them. There was, moreover, a disposition which has now nearly died out, but which was the natural product of the war, to treat all the misfortunes of the "ex-rebels" as no worse than they deserved; and some of their sorrows were too purely the sorrows of a fallen aristocracy to be understood or sympathized with, even if understood, in a democratic community. The enormities of the "carpet-baggers" began to come to light at a very early period, but they made little impression, for two reasons: one was that there was a general expectation at the North, after the war, that the regeneration of the South would be worked by an influx of settlers and capitalists from the North; and there was a strong and widely diffused disposition to encourage this Northern emigration, and to think and speak well of the emigrants, and a strong indisposition to believe evil of them. The denunciations of the natives were, therefore, disregarded or laughed at, and, more than this, there was an amusing effort made by the Northern press to take all the reproach out of the word "carpet-bagger." We were told that the Pilgrim Fathers were "carpet-baggers"; that all New Englanders in the West were carpet-baggers; and, in fact, that every man who went to a new country in order to better his condition was a "carpet-bagger," just as if the term connoted nothing but change of residence with a small amount of baggage. The carpet-baggers, too, being all politicians, and Republican politicians to boot, naturally received a good deal of sympathy and support from their brethren at home. They were looked on either as missionaries spreading the faith in troublous places, or as very shrewd managers, whose skill deserved anything in the shape of reward they could lay hands on. Many a poor devil, whose labors in caucus and convention at home brought up nothing better than one chance in twelve of a post-office or of a weighership, envied the lucky fellows who had gone to the South from their side, and turned up in a few months members of the legislature or of Congress, or state treasurers, or auditors, or county clerks, in lands where book-keeping was in its infancy, and constituents were neither inquisitive nor suspicious. All these were, in their eyes, the legitimate prizes of an arduous and poorly-paid calling, the winners of which might be envied, but not denounced. The Convention was a most respectable body, and represented almost the whole of the taxpaying portion of the population. To its competency to speak for the community even such radical organs as the Charleston Republican bore strong testimony, and it is safe to infer, therefore, that something useful may be learned from its proceedings, both of the actual condition of government and society at the South and of the temper and tone of thought of that large body of persons who, though temporarily excluded from all share in the government, are, it is conceded on all hands, the persons who must eventually purify Southern politics, if they can be purified. We say of the "actual condition of society and government at the South," because, although we are only talking of South Carolina, that State presents an aggravated case of a disease from which most of the Southern States are suffering.

The first thing the Convention did was naturally enough to look into the condition of the State finances, and its reports on this point will furnish a good study to those who are interested in what we may call morbid politics—that is, the politics of sick societies—for its resemblance to the financial exhibits which municipal reformers occasionally lay before the public in this city is very curious, particularly in the item of salaries, which, we need hardly say, have all risen greatly. The committee of the convention compares the amounts paid in 1866, when the new régime was established, and those paid this year, and the way the increase is distributed gives one an instructive glimpse of the carpet-bag ideas about administration and carpet-bag ways of estimating the value and importance of services. For instance, the Governor's salary remains the same, $3,500, and the annual amount paid to the Judges is actually diminished from $30,000 to $28,000, though there is a slight increase in the salaries of the Chief-Justice and the Associate Justices. But the expenses of the Secretary of State's office, including his salary, rose at one jump from $500 to $4,000. The "Adjutant Inspector-General," who has, we believe, no duties, and is himself a hollow mockery, cost the State nothing in 1866, but now the sorry wag pockets $2,500 a year. The Treasurer's office used to cost $3,200 a year, it now costs $5,800; and the Attorney-General used to cost $1,100, he now costs $4,000; the Clerk of the Court of Appeals used to cost $800, he now costs $1,500. The "Solicitors," whatever they are, used to cost $4,500, but the State now pays them $8,000. "The Auditor of State," apparently a new officer, gets $4,000. But the gem of the accounts is the item called "Legislative Expenses," to which we have, however, called attention in the Nation before now. These were, in 1866, $45,850, and less, we believe, previously; in 1871 they were $400,000. Of this enormous sum we believe a large portion is drawn from the treasury on the Speaker's order, or that of the President of the Senate, in advance of any appropriation. The most taking item in the account, which in many ways surpasses anything to which we have been treated in New York, is $15,000 to a "commission to codify the laws," the duties of which, the report says, "might be discharged by a clerk"—which is either a severe reflection on carpet-bag jurisprudence or very high praise of it. Laws that a clerk can codify were either not worth making, or were so well made that he who runs may read them. Finally, the State taxes of the year reach $2,000,000, as against $400,000 before the war, while the value of the taxable property is diminished by one-half. Want of space compels us to pass over without notice the charges brought by the convention against the State government, in connection with their management of the State credit; the repudiation of the "Fire Loan," contracted to rebuild Charleston in 1838; their failure to publish accurate accounts of the amount of the State debt, or to exact proper bonds from the State financial agents, their reckless lending of the State credit, and their perpetration of divers jobs of greater or less magnitude.

As regards the state of mind of the delegates, as revealed in the resolutions, it is clearly that of "unrepentant rebels"; that is, they express no regret or shame at having engaged in the war, and invariably allude to "the cause" as highly respectable, and their past as great and glorious; but they acknowledge their defeat in the frankest way, and solemnly accept the results of the war as "finalities." There is also running through the speeches and resolutions that curious undertone of discontent with the way the game which they have lost was carried on, which has been the one thoroughly childish thing in the Southern demeanor both during and since the war. The South challenged the North to fight, with barbaric confidence and exultation, and well knowing what the conditions, consequences, and accompaniments of war were, and did everything that insolence of language and behavior could do to infuse bitterness into the struggle, and well knowing, too, that as it was about slavery the war had begun, and as slavery was the very basis of Southern society, the whole social system of the South, as well as its political rights, were staked on the result. Nevertheless, from first to last, it has never ceased to lament over the devastation wrought by the fighting, as if wars were usually carried on without devastation, and ever since the close of the war it has lamented over the harshness of the victor in making his own terms of peace, and in not dealing gently with the vanquished, as if the South had carried it on à l'amiable, as the French say, or in a way to soothe Northern feelings or disarm Northern prejudices. The Convention keeps up this dismal strain, and affirms that the South has been very hardly treated, but nevertheless declares that they meditate no resistance to the United States Government, and intend to conduct themselves as peaceful, law-abiding citizens; to treat the reconstruction measures as "finalities," and "obey them in letter and in spirit"; that they look "to time and peaceful measures and the quiet influence of an enlightened public opinion" to solve the difficulties of Southern politics, and they "deprecate local disturbances," and appeal to the people to respect the laws, and look to them and them only for the redress of their grievances; and they supported this by other resolutions, providing for enquiry into the existence of violence and outrage, and the best means of repressing them. The committee charged with this enquiry reported that "violence prevailed to a greater or less extent in several counties of the State, but that in by far the larger number of counties no case of violence had been brought to their attention." These deeds of violence, they say, were "first simple larcencies and incendiarism, practised by ignorant, deluded, and bad men"; then came "instances of corporeal punishments and homicides, perpetrated by unknown persons on citizens, and even upon a few officials of the Government," all of which the committee pronounce "lamentable truths, which they feel called upon unequivocally to deplore and condemn." Their remedy for all these evils is one with which we in this part of the country are very familiar, but which has hardly as practical a ring as one would wish, namely, "the removal of all dishonest, incompetent, and bad men from office." The determination which they elsewhere express to push vigorously for minority representation, and not to give up the game or sit silent while Northern knaves help ignorant negroes to plunder the State, but to keep agitating, denouncing, and exposing, until they bring reform about, has a more hopeful sound; and in all this, as long as they show a sincere determination to accept the fact that the people of South Carolina now means the whole population of it, they will have the hearty sympathy of the best Northerners.

THE COLLEGES.

It is a strict rule of the newspaper profession that the most prominent incident of the day must always be noticed editorially at the time when it is occupying, or likely to occupy, the public attention, and nothing except the exceeding shortness of the public memory prevents the performance of the duty with regard to yearly recurring events being positively agonizing to sensitive men, owing to the striking resemblance which the "remarks" of each year must necessarily bear to those of the preceding year. For instance, there are few editors so hardened as to be able to gaze without wincing on a collection of the "reflections" suggested to them during say ten years by Thanksgiving-day, or Easter, or Christmas, or the Fourth of July. The man who would make such a collection from the columns of any of our papers would be worse than a heathen, and would richly deserve, and probably would be overtaken by, the total exclusion of his name from mention for many a long day afterwards. Bad as he would be, however, we think we should rate him more highly as a philanthropist than one who should gather together the ten years' comments of any of our contemporaries on "Summer Resorts" or on "College Commencements." Fruitful as these themes seem on the outside to the professional eye, there are few topics more barren and uninviting as the sands of Sahara. Some variety was, however, introduced into the treatment of college commencements a few years ago by the rapid rise and strong influence upon the editorial mind of what may be called the Herald school of journalism. It was the great founder of that school who first propounded the theory that the editor of the most widely circulated daily paper was ex-officio the wisest man in the community, and that, in fact, a man's wisdom was in the direct ratio of the number of people he got to listen to his sayings. He also invented in support of this doctrine the light and flippant way of dealing with dignitaries, and gave to the assertion that a man was "behind the age" the terrible sting which it now possesses in nearly all the papers in the Union. The steady preaching of this theory, combined with the really steady growth of the influence of the newspaper press on the public mind, daily advanced the editor more and more in his own estimation, as well as in that of the multitude, and finally converted the term "sanctum," which was at first used as a jocose appellation of his private room, into a synonym for a storehouse, not of all knowledge, but of all things worth knowing. Whatever branches of information or modes of investigation or ways of looking at things were not in use in newspaper offices, or found necessary in the composition of editorial articles, began to be pronounced at first "antiquated" and then useless, and finally "absurd." The world, as seen from the "sanctum" under this new light, naturally enough, looked somewhat faulty in its arrangements. Perhaps the most offensive feature in them was the prominence given to colleges, and the importance attached to college education, and colleges soon became to the new school objects of the fiercest contempt. Several of the most successful editors had had no college education; few "prominent financiers" had had any; what, then, was the use of it, and were not the pretensions of graduates very ridiculous? Under the influence of this feeling, the commencement for a time furnished considerable food for editorial ridicule. The ambitious efforts of the graduating orators and essayists were sometimes severely, sometimes jocosely, reproved, and this snubbing was not uncommonly followed by appropriate reflections on the awful waste of opportunities involved in going through a college course. After a while, the editors were reinforced by the Humanitarians, who placed all virtue in the absence of all kinds of restraint or direction, and taught that the way to reach perfection was to be yourself just as nature made you; that all you needed to know you could pick up while doing odd jobs, and the rule of right you could evolve from your own breast. Colleges under this new light gradually grew into crampers of the mind and chillers of enthusiasm.

The newspaper mode of treating colleges was, however, something more than a mere outburst of editorial flippancy and conceit. It was also in some degree the expression of the very popular belief which grew up with and was fostered by the democratic movement in politics, that inasmuch as the natural man knew as well as anybody what was good for the state, it was something very like presumption for a parcel of professors to suppose that they could better him by anything they could teach him. The "honest man," from being the peer of kings and princes, came gradually to be the peer of sages and philosophers, and somehow or other a far finer thing than if he were run through the mould of the schools. Out of the widespread praise of and confidence in popular intuitions there grew up a belief in an inner light which, in the breast of unlettered folk, not only furnished a substitute for the lore of the learned, but in dealing with the most perplexing problems of life was a far safer guide; and this belief was strengthened by the fact that, when the reformatory spirit began really to take possession of the world with heat and vigor in the second decade of this century, the persons whom it seized most easily were naturally poor and uninstructed, and it met from the literati and from colleges a good deal of the snubbing which is, do what we will, one of the unfailing concomitants of experience. Then, too, the colleges were as they have always been, and must always be, the strongholds of whatever ideas or forms of culture have fairly secured supremacy. They are not and will never be, and ought not to be, the first to open their gates to innovations, and they fulfil one of their highest functions in standing firmly in whatever position they have taken up until it has been ascertained whether the new positions to which they are invited are really academical groves, in which young minds may find philosophy, or mere beer-gardens to which radicals make excursions on fine days in barges, to dance and drink and swing.

The universities are now in every country deriving the benefit of the reaction in favor of training which was sure, of course, to come in the long run, and which has come at last. The "natural man," it must be confessed, has not distinguished himself. He has tried his hand at all sorts of things, and none of them have succeeded. He has set up governments, and they have been failures; he has raised troops, and they have been destroyed; he has procured arms of precision, and they have not saved him from slaughter. Altogether, the world is rather sick of him, and, what is better, he is sick of himself. Moreover, it has come about at last that liberalism in politics and religion have found some of their warmest and ablest champions among the friends and preachers of "culture." There are various kinds of culture in the field claiming popular confidence—Professor Huxley's, and Matthew Arnold's, and the religious culture, and there is a mixture of all three, and the multitude is somewhat perplexed as to which is the genuine article; but it now begins to be generally admitted that culture is a good thing, and, indeed, a necessary thing, for the right government of life; and that culture means, in the educational sense, training; and that training is an elaborate process, requiring special machinery, and cannot be left to chance. Consequently, the colleges, as the only institutions which make any pretence of furnishing this training, are rapidly rising in popular favor and confidence. They, too, have done much to secure this favor and confidence by a frank recognition, not so much of the superiority of any particular kind of training as the only real culture, as of the right of each student to decide for himself what means of culture he will adopt, and of the duty of the colleges to undertake within certain limits to enable him to act on his selection. It is in this recognition of the individual right of choice that the changes which have of late years being going on in American and English colleges have mainly consisted, and these changes have chimed in well with the growing faith of the people in the uses of high training and growing distrust of the rule of thumb.

The tendencies of contemporary politics, too, have all helped to strengthen this faith and deepen this distrust. The Franco-German war may be said to have afforded the most striking lesson that could be given, not simply of the dangers of gross ignorance, but of the value of the higher education. Probably no event of history ever brought into sharper contrast, taking the lowest view of the matter, the physical strength of education and the physical weakness of ignorance, and the contrast has received a sharper point than ever from the enormous difficulty in recovering from her prostration which France plainly shows.

PRESIDENT WOOLSEY.

By the retirement of Dr. Woolsey from the office of President of Yale College, which he has filled with unsurpassed ability and success for a quarter of a century, that institution loses from its corps of instructors the most eminent scholar that has ever served it in this capacity, and, we venture to add, with full confidence that the general verdict of competent judges would accord with our own, the foremost scholar on the long roll of its graduates. This event involves a public loss; for the influence which President Woolsey has wielded, as the head of one of our largest colleges, is of just that character which the country can ill afford to spare. His whole career, in a sense that is true of comparatively few Americans, has been that of a scholar. In his youth, he studied theology, but was not ordained as a preacher until his accession to the presidency. Having held the post of tutor at New Haven for two years, and pursued linguistic studies, mainly, for three years in Europe, he was made Professor of Greek in 1831. While holding this professorship, he prepared the editions of the Greek tragedians and of the Gorgias of Plato which, it is not too much to say, marked an epoch in the progress of classical study among us. In the point of accurate philology, they did not fall behind the best standards of European scholarship. At the same time, they embodied in the unobtrusive form of brief annotations a rich fund of ethical and literary criticism. In these, as in all the other writings of President Woolsey, there are found that severe simplicity of style and that economy of words which might be expected from a sworn foe of diffuse and ostentatious rhetoric. An Italian satirist said of Guicciardini's History, that a Spartan who had been condemned to read it as a punishment for having used three words where only two were necessary, fainted in the first sentence. Such a consequence not even a Laconian would have the least occasion to fear from any of the compositions of the retiring President. On the resignation of Dr. Day, in 1846, Dr. Woolsey reluctantly accepted the appointment to be his successor. He now assumed the work of giving instruction in modern history and political science, branches of study for which his profound acquaintance with antiquity and his familiarity with the principal modern languages, as well as the acuteness and breadth of his mind and his love of justice, specially qualified him. His extensive collection of Greek literature, with his wonted liberality, was given to the College library, and the ancient authors whom it had been his business to expound to his classes he has since taken up chiefly as a recreation. Among the fruits of his studies in the historical department are the excellent treatise on "International Law," the Essays on the Laws and Principles of Divorce, and not a few review articles, such as the series on the Revival of Letters which appeared a few years ago in the New Englander. These productions, however, furnish no adequate measure of the extent and variety of the learned researches which President Woolsey has found time to prosecute in the midst of the numerous employments and interruptions which pertain to his office. Besides performing the full work of a professor and officiating as chaplain at daily prayers, he has not unfrequently preached on Sunday in the College Chapel; and the volume of sermons which, in compliance with solicitations from different quarters, he has recently given to the public, show in their depth of thought, impressive earnestness, and catholic spirit the satisfactory manner in which he has fulfilled this very useful, though self-imposed, portion of his labors. The wide range of the author's learning is unconsciously revealed to discerning readers of these admirable discourses, just as his taste and love of beauty occasionally break forth in unsought felicities of thought and illustration. The wonder is that President Woolsey has been able to do with exemplary thoroughness so great an amount of literary work, without neglecting in the least the multiplied and sometimes perplexing duties belonging to the presidential function. Nothing save a disciplined intellect, uncommonly rapid in its natural movement, coupled with the advantage derived from solid attainments, made in years of comparative leisure, suffices to account for it.

As an educator, President Woolsey brought to his station an innate, intense hatred of all false shows. It was inevitable that the college should feel at once and continually the inspiring influence of so ripe and conscientious a scholar. The atmosphere of his presence was a place where superficial acquisitions, conceit of knowledge, and the mere ability to use the tongue glibly where there is nothing valuable to communicate, could not flourish. The national idea, that it is the chief end of education, if not the chief end of man, to make a speech, has obtained no countenance under his administration. To say that punctuality in the performance of official duty, unwearied diligence, and a generous spirit of self-sacrifice, have characterized the retiring President, is simply to declare what has been obvious, not only to all of his colleagues, but also to every one of the pupils who, in successive classes, have gone forth from the institution. But his agency in elevating the tone of scholarship in the college is equally well known to such as are intimately conversant with it. Among the particular steps of progress which are due to him are the conversion of the senior year from a period of comparative exemption from hard work into one of the most laborious years of the course—a year filled up with very stimulating and fruitful studies in history, philosophy, and politics; and the establishment of the biennial (now annual) examinations. But these, and many other particular changes that might be mentioned, which have been effected under his auspices, would convey a very insufficient idea of the intellectual influence of President Woolsey within the walls of Yale College. The best part of his influence has probably been the practical example which he has himself daily presented to professors and students, of unselfish devotion to all good learning, of an equal modesty and thoroughness in the pursuit as well as the inculcation of knowledge, and of a cordial disgust for all sorts of affectation and shallowness. Plato's inscription over the vestibule of the house where he received his select pupils, forbidding all who were unacquainted with geometry to enter there, probably grew out of the philosopher's belief that mathematical truth is intermediate between the realm of phenomenal existence and that of ideas, between transient, apparent forms of being and the abiding, eternal realities, to the knowledge of which he would lead up the minds of his pupils. In another and broader sense, President Woolsey has fastened the attention of his pupils on that which is true and real, and has moved them to purge from their ideals of culture and character whatever is false, meretricious, and unsubstantial. He has administered his office in the spirit which Melancthon, the "Preceptor of Germany," nobly declared to be the proper temper of all instructors of youth. "The same tempers of feeling," says Melancthon, "which we bring with us into the temple, it behooves us to carry into the school"—"quos in templa animos afferimus, eosdem decet in scholas afferre." "If one comes into the school in order to bear away some portion of learning wherewith to get gain for himself or to use as an instrument of idle vanity, let him understand that he desecrates the most holy temple of science"—"Is sciat, se polluere sanctissima templa doctrinæ."

Among the topics which President Woolsey has been called upon to discuss, from year to year, in his class-room, are the true foundations of political society, the proper functions of government, and the law of nations. It is impossible to estimate too highly the value of the instruction which he has given on these subjects to that numerous body of young men who have had the opportunity to receive it. Apart from the sound political and ethical doctrine which he has imparted, the deep abhorrence of injustice, of venality, and popularity-hunting, which could hardly fail to communicate itself, in some measure, from teacher to pupil, has not been the least of the benefits resulting from his instructions. The essential wrong and impolicy of slavery and of governmental interference with the natural laws of trade and industry, are lessons which there are few of his students who have not fully learned.

One of the best services that President Woolsey has rendered to the college over which he has presided and to the country, is in the proof which he has given of the value of exhaustive researches, such as are characteristic of the German scholars, in connection with the subjects which he has undertaken to elucidate. It is only by this method that knowledge is capable of a steady progress, for only thus can the present build upon the past. The historical, conservative, reverent feeling which makes one a patient explorer, as well as a thinker, is peculiarly needed in this country, where there is so much mental activity and so little, proportionally, of exact and extensive knowledge even in those who assume to be public teachers. It is a vulgar error that learning of necessity cramps the thinking power or interferes with vigor and independence of judgment. President Woolsey is a signal example of the possibility of uniting the utmost force and freedom of mental action with most painstaking investigations. Indeed, in the case of this distinguished teacher, it is difficult to say which is most conspicuous, the reach of his acquisitions, the intellectual force that judges and subordinates all, or the singular purity and elevation of his character.

It is gratifying to know that the resignation of President Woolsey does not spring from physical infirmity or a reduction of mental power; and it is hardly to be doubted that a portion of his well-earned leisure will be devoted to labors profitable to the public. It is already announced that he will give some lectures in the Divinity School on heathenism and the heathen religions, a subject to which he has given much attention. But this will consume but a fraction of his time. We do not presume to offer counsel; but we feel sure that historical students would be gratified if he should feel inclined to publish some of the results of his studies upon the feudal system and other characteristic institutions of the Middle Ages. In this difficult field, he is eminently capable of serving as a guide. President Woolsey is versed in the original Scriptures, and at home in the broad field of Biblical criticism. His keen perceptions, independence, and religious earnestness, in connection with the whole course of his studies in the past, peculiarly qualify him, also, for the work of an interpreter or commentator on the books of the Bible. A volume of this character, we have been told, relating to the Acts of the Apostles, he had at one time projected, and had already gathered the materials for it, when the appearance of Professor Hackett's excellent book prevented him from prosecuting his design. However he may choose to employ the time which will be afforded by his release from academic duty, he will carry into his retirement the heartfelt respect of all who know how to honor solid worth, and to appreciate the value of unselfish, laborious, long-continued services in behalf of education and religion.

VICTOR CHERBULIEZ.

We have for a long time been struck with the little justice that has been done to this writer, of whom we wish to say a few words to-day. Not that he has been treated with injustice, he has escaped all unfavorable criticism; but that he has been spoken of so little, while his merits are so considerable, is indeed surprising. He is scarcely mentioned by any French critic, never by Sainte-Beuve, and only once, and that but slightly, by Scherer. Julian Schmidt, who lets nothing escape him, devotes to him a few pages, and very good ones, in the last volume of his essays ("Bilder aus dem geistigen Leben unserer Zeit, neue Folge"); but with those exceptions, he has been unnoticed by those critics with whom American readers are familiar. His audience in Europe has been a large one, since he has for six or seven years been a contributor to the Revue des Deux Mondes, in which his novels have been appearing, and hence many of our readers will be already familiar with him. His novels are, "Le Comte Kostia," "Le Roman d'une Honnête Femme," "Paule Méré," "L'Aventure de Ladislas Bolski," "Prosper Randoce," besides some other works, "Le Prince Vitale," "Le Grand Œuvre," and "Le Cheval de Phidias," which are rather theses in the form of fiction than regular novels, and which even his admirers regard as failures, although they are willing enough to acknowledge their excellence in many respects. His novels, however, have shown that the possibilities of his work are so excellent that one is impatient with what would be a success for any one else, but which is a shortcoming for him.

Perhaps some of the silence of the French critics is due to their jealousy at seeing this young Genevese who outdoes the French novelists with their best weapons. The plots of his stories are always interesting, without being a perpetual chant of the joys and sorrows of breaking the seventh commandment. His healthy mind seems too robust to be fascinated unnaturally by the charm of that subject. The very fact that he is a foreigner, that his cultivation is wider than that of most Parisians, has been of service to him here. In France, certain questions had been discussed from every possible point of view by the novelists, until it seemed as if the country had fully ripened for the terrible fall this last year has shown us. The contagion had spread, too, to other countries. But meanwhile Cherbuliez was writing his novels, which might have shown that there are other objects of human interest than our neighbor's wife. Besides his superiority in the construction of his plots, his treatment of his characters is most able, and his style of the greatest brilliancy. It is never a distracting wit that dazzles one to the harm of the story, but always seems like the flow of the best of spirits, tempered by a generous cultivation. For instance, on opening "Le Roman d'une Honnête Femme" at random, the first sentence our eye meets is this:—"Il est des situations auxquelles il vaut mieux n'avoir pas eu le temps de se préparer. Notre imagination est un artiste; quand elle prévoit, elle met de l'ordre et de l'unité dans ses tableaux, et elle se trompe toujours, parce qu'elle simplifie tout et que rien n'est moins simple que la vie." Every reader of Cherbuliez will cry out at the ill success of our selection, nor will those who do not know him be at once converted by this extract; but it may serve as no extraordinary specimen of a much richer ore. Indeed, that a Genevese should have rivalled a Parisian in wit must have seemed incomprehensible, at least to Parisians.

Perhaps the greatest merit of his stories is his power of healthy treatment of all his subjects. His joyousness is never the unreflecting merriment of what we might almost call animal good-nature. It is not that he has not thought of all that pessimists tell us with such grim joy, but that he has survived it, he sees beyond it. Take "Prosper Randoce," for instance. No one who has drawn Didier can be said to be ignorant of the less buoyant way of regarding the world; yet there is not a sentence which shows a lack of sympathy for this character, any more than there is one that magnifies its importance. The whole book is written with the utmost objectivity. We see these two brothers, Didier and Prosper, who are so utterly distinct, as if they were the heroes of a play, walking about the stage before us, and at the end we put down the book perfectly contented with the story, yet without feeling that we have been tricked into our content, like children who close their ears to avoid hearing the end of a tragic tale. Perhaps this is the best of his novels. It is one that will bear re-reading; it is so rich in incident, so keen in the delineation of character. Prosper is always a puzzle, but never, in spite of all his faults, an offensive one. Didier, too, is such an excellent specimen of the analyzing, critical man of to-day that the book is perpetually charming. Of such characters as Didier, Cherbuliez is always fond, and he always draws them with the qualities of action that they possess in spite of themselves, rather than with merely the amiable impotence which they imagine to be their only trait. He is fond, too, of representing the struggle between a man's better and worse natures; and yet he does it without coarseness on the one hand, and without sentimentality upon the other; as for instance, in that charming chapter in "Le Grand Œuvre" in which is given the dialogue between the young man of that time and himself a few years before. "Ladislas Bolski," the latest of his novels, is extremely entertaining. It appeared only two years ago. The worst that can be said of it is that it is the best of sensational stories; and he who can follow the hero in his struggles against his nature, his love, and his ambition, without being moved, need not try to amuse himself with works of fiction. Novels were not written for him.

From what we have said, it will be clear what we mean in adding that his excellence is one that is not obtained by the harrowing of the feelings. The pleasure is more an intellectual than a sentimental one. We are continually treated to an interesting analysis, made by a cool demonstrator, who shows us the different moods of passion, but with the calmness of a writer who owns his creations rather than with the heat of one who is possessed, by his sympathy for mankind, by a deep pity for his fellow-men. If we compare him with Turgeneff, we find him lacking in that inimitable pathos that lies so much deeper in man than any intellectual pleasure, however intense. He never approaches that bitterness of tragic interest of which Turgeneff is such a master. Not that his view of life is flippant or trivial, but it is a different one—cooler, calmer, rather studied, rather observed than felt. In comparing him with the contemporary French novelists, one can see at a glance the points of his superiority. He is entertaining without being low, witty but not cynical, careful but not mechanical. He never falls into the more obvious faults of his brother-writers, with their aristocratic mummery and chilly hardness.

From this writer we are authorized to expect a great deal yet. He is still a young man, and we can earnestly hope to see another of his stories in the Revue. Of those already published, but which we have only mentioned by name, we can recommend "Le Comte Kostia," more especially. "Paule Méré" is not so good. Although it appeared later, it bears marks of being an earlier work. "Le Roman d'une Honnête Femme" is perhaps less interesting than the others we have mentioned, but it need not be omitted on that account. One is lucky who reads no poorer books, and every one of those of Cherbuliez is marked by some of his good qualities. Better and worse are only relative terms.

Correspondence.

THE CHENEY CONTROVERSY AGAIN.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Dear Sir: It is not with any desire of keeping up a controversy that I reply to your review of my statement in your issue of yesterday regarding the position of Mr. Cheney and his friends. I presume your object, as mine, is simply to maintain the "right," independently of personal issues. If what I shall now say seem to you of sufficient importance, perhaps you will insert it in your columns. If not, although it seems so to me, I am willing to let the article already published stand side by side with your review, for the unbiassed judgment of such readers as are fully informed as to the merits of the question.

The fact that my illustration did not contemplate a "voluntary association" by no means implies that I am unwilling to recognize the fact that Mr. Cheney belonged to one. Indeed, I am glad that you have brought this point to notice, since it affords me the opportunity to remind you that I do not advocate resistance to the execution of any laws under which Mr. Cheney voluntarily placed himself, but only against certain intolerant enactments.

In vindication of Mr. Cheney and his friends, I am happy to take the illustration which you have provided. A man joins an association for the establishment of a smallpox hospital. He solemnly binds himself, in case he has to resort to it for the treatment either of himself or his relatives, to abide by the rules and regulations of its managers. His wife being attacked with smallpox, is conveyed thither. The house surgeon prescribes; the apothecary prepares the dose. Here, however, something occurs which is not contemplated in your illustration. The man discovers that there is an attempt made to poison his wife. He resists the surgeon in his attempts to administer the potion. He is told that the only alternative is to remove her from the hospital. This he refuses to do, for he knows that such treatment would involve danger to her life. The officers approach him, but he stands firm in his resolution to defend his wife. He would be justified in calling in aid "from the street." (In the ecclesiastical case before us, he does not do this.) But the scuffle is overheard, and from the street assistance flows in to him.

This illustration serves to point out as well as mine the principle that there is no rule without an exception—the object I had in view in my last communication.

You may differ from Mr. Cheney as to the vitality of the issue; but if the moral results of his severance in this way from our church seem to him sufficiently great, you can scarcely blame him for taking his own part, or his friends who agree with him for "rallying round him." I have no sympathy with "the sentimentalists" on the one hand, nor on the other with the advocates of reason unguided by the Spirit and Word of God. But I do believe that the rights of an enlightened conscience are often superior to human enactments, and that in such cases "we ought to obey God rather than men."

As to "revolution." Your definition of it accords with my own view of it. I should be sorry to have you believe that Mr. Cheney "rebels simply with the view of releasing himself from the restraints of authority, or escaping the consequences of a particular sentence or enactment." He is too high-minded a man to be placed for a moment under such an imputation. He is standing for a principle—his friends for the same; and neither he nor they will be satisfied till they either see the church that they love freed from the mediæval spirit, or, when disappointed in this, shall have organized a new church in which the exercise of Christian charity shall be secured to all.

I am, dear sir, with much respect, yours very truly,

B. O. D.

[We have only to remark on this, that the question whether the dose was really poisonous was in Mr. Cheney's case submitted to a jury of experts in the manner prescribed by the articles of association, and by them decided in the negative; but Mr. Cheney still refuses either to leave the hospital or to allow the officers to perform their duties.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

In the various comments which have appeared in the Nation on the famous passage in "Romeo and Juliet," no distinct allusion has been made to what may have struck the common reader as an obvious explanation. Juliet says:

> "Gallop apace, you fiery-footed steeds,
> Towards Phœbus's lodging; such a wagoner
> As Phaeton would whip you to the West
> And bring in cloudy night immediately.
> Spread thy close curtain, love-performing night,
> That runaway's eyes may wink and Romeo
> Leap to these arms untalk'd of and unseen."

Let us recall the fable of Phaeton to which Shakespeare evidently alludes. In order that his paternity might be signalized, after much solicitation he obtained from Jupiter the privilege of driving for a day the chariot of the Sun. The "fiery-footed steeds" finding themselves guided by mortal hands took advantage of the driver and ran away. As they conveyed the Sun, this "personage" became a runaway, and the great dramatist, in keeping with the classical idea with which he makes Juliet commence her monologue, makes her continue it, and playfully call the Sun "runaway," and she prays night to spread her close curtain, that his eyes may wink and not betray the meeting of Romeo and herself. This interpretation requires no strain upon words, but is easy and natural and consistent with the highly poetical and figurative character of the whole monologue, indeed, with the whole play, so full of sentiment and poetry.

—We cited lately from a Lynchburg paper an instance of political fairness and good sense under the temptation to be partisan and petty. We now have the satisfaction of presenting a still more remarkable proof of the emancipation of the Southern mind, inasmuch as in the subjoined extract from the Richmond Enquirer of June 16, the rhetoric for which the South generally has been long distinguished, and for which even Richmond itself used to show some predilection, is punctured with as little feeling as if the critic had been born in the temperate shadow of Bunker Hill:

> With his body bent slightly forward, his eye blazing, his hand raised aloft, grasping a copy of Magna Charta, he exclaimed: "When you can tear the live thunder from its home in the burning ether, and bind it at the footstool of tyranny, then, and not till then, will I accept the situation."—Mr. Robert Toombs, as described by an Augusta paper.

We beg leave to remark that we do not know by what authority Mr. Toombs calls the thunder "live." Secondly. How does he know that it resides in "the burning ether"? Thirdly. Thunder is nothing but noise, and we cannot with propriety speak of "tearing a noise." Fourthly. We do not see the connection between binding this noise to "the footstool of tyranny" and the time when Mr. Toombs might feel himself at liberty "to accept the situation." That is all.

—Fresh light is thrown on the naval operations of the late war in Europe by a pamphlet just published in Berlin: "Unsere Flotte im deutsch-französischen Kriege," by Capt. O. Livonius. The author was in command of the turret-ship Arminius, which he carried safely through the French fleet from the Baltic to the Jahde in the latter part of July, and remained at this station till the close of hostilities. He had the additional advantage of being in the confidence of his admiral, and for particulars as to the German defence his narrative is more satisfactory than the "Campaign of 1870" which we recently noticed. The iron-clads König Wilhelm, Friedrich Karl, and Prinz Adalbert had been sent out on an experimental cruise in the Atlantic just before the outbreak of the war, and had already experienced those defects of their machinery which subsequently incapacitated them from taking the offensive. The squadron was intending to sail to Fayal, but being warned in season made a timely return to Wilhelmshaven by the 16th of July, the French admiral being so much in ignorance of the fact that on the 25th and the succeeding days he was cherishing the illusion that he should still succeed in intercepting these the flower of the German navy. Though the disposition of the German squadron defending the Jahde might alone have deterred the French from attempting an attack, they stood much more in dread of the enemy's torpedoes, and fancied them to be where not only they were not laid, but could not be made to stay. Their fears, after all, were much exaggerated, as the force of the currents made it exceedingly difficult for the Germans to keep the torpedoes in place; and, in fact, what with their drifting with the changes of the tide and endangering the German ships themselves, and what with their extreme touchiness while being handled, they cost more German lives than French, if, indeed, they took any of the latter. The German experience thus corresponded pretty nearly with that of the Confederates during the rebellion, and the lesson of each is that this branch of defensive warfare is as yet only in its infancy. The Weser-Zeitung, in reviewing Captain Livonius's work, observes that it fails to explain why the wooden fleet, which had no machinery to be deranged, and was not dependent on depth of water and had not the excuse of being poor sailers, so little distinguished itself, but permitted the French without molestation to ship arms and munitions from America. Perhaps this question will be answered by some future pamphleteer.

—It is going on five years since the establishment of what we may venture to call the very best of all the English societies which, from time to time, have set themselves to reprinting some of the works, inaccessible but for them, which lie at the foundation of our literature. But the Early English Text Society, useful as it has been, is not yet prosperous, if, indeed, it is self-supporting. Very much it owes to the self-sacrificing enthusiasm of its Secretary, Mr. F. J. Furnivall, and probably it might, but for him, have found its difficulties insuperable. Just at present it is waiting to see if it can get money enough to publish its next year's instalment of texts, of which it has several all prepared for the press. During this year just past, it has given, in return for the one-guinea subscription which it asks, no less than five books, containing matter, most of which is valuable, and all of which is curious and interesting; and it proposes to give as many next year. Its final issue of texts for last year was made last month, and contained the Minor Poems of Sir David Lyndsay, with a critical essay on Lyndsay, by Professor Nichol, of Oxford and Glasgow; "The Time's Whistle," a collection of satires of the time of James I.; and a curious collection of "Legends of the Holy Rood," or early English and Saxon poems concerning the cross. This is illustrated with copies of manuscript illuminations of the nails, hammer, scourge, crown of thorns, and other instruments of Christ's torture. Now that our booksellers and importers have begun to reckon the shilling sterling at about as many cents as it used to pass for in old times, before the war had carried it up to half a dollar, there is rather more reason, perhaps, and, at all events, there seems to be more than there was at the time of the Society's establishment, why American readers should become subscribers. The subscription need not be for more than a year. Indeed, we believe that the Society has on hand copies of most of its publications, and will even allow the subscriber to antedate his subscription, and take the books of that year which pleases him best. Of course there is choice, some of the works republished being for the student of English; some, like the five-volume "Percy Ballads Manuscript," being for "every gentleman's library;" and many others being well suited to such general readers as have anything bookish in their tastes.

—The book published by the Early Text Society next before the publication of the texts above-mentioned is, for instance, a very good example of the sort of reading which would interest and please very many readers who could not be called students or antiquarians, and it stands by no means alone in this category among the Society's publications. Its title is: "The Fyrst Boke of the Introduction of Knowledge, made by Andrew Boorde, of Physycke Doctor, edited, with life of Andrew Boorde, and large Extracts from his 'Breuyary,' by F. J. Furnival." Boorde was the original "merry Andrew," for though he began life as a Carthusian monk, and, when "dyspensed withe relygyon" by the Pope, took up the grave profession of medicine, he was, nevertheless, a humorist and jester by nature and habit, and if what is told of him is true, he used to frequent fairs and markets, and, setting himself in the midst of them, drew the people together by jocose speeches and stories, after which he would prescribe for them. "A rambling head and inconstant mind" is Antony a Wood's characteristically civil remark by way of accounting for Boorde's manner of practising medicine, and doubtless he had in his composition more or less of the vagabond; but in this reprint of his Breviary and Book of Knowledge he appears as a man of good learning in his profession, and with plenty of sound sense and shrewdness. He was bred a Carthusian monk, but appears to have left the order, under a Papal dispensation, for the purpose of studying medicine. He betook himself to Montpellier, at that time a renowned school of medicine, and on his return went to Scotland, either for the study or the practice of his profession. The Scotch he evidently was not fond of. "Shortly to conclude," he says, "trust yow no Skott, for they wyll yowse flattering wordes, and all ys falshoode." He got on with them, however, after a fashion: "Thei takyth me for a Skotysh mane's sone," he explains, "for I name my selff Karre, and so the Karres callyth me cosyn, thorow the which I am in more fauer." But still, says he, "it is naturally geuen, or els it is of a deuelysshe dysposicion of a Scottysh man not to loue nor fauer an Englishe man." It is improbable that Boorde went to Scotland for the purpose of study, as Edinburgh had not then the repute as a medical school which it has since enjoyed; but he was not yet free from apprehensions of being taken as a runaway monk by the Charter-house people, and may have thought it prudent to remove to some distance. Or it may be that he had then begun doing for Secretary Cromwell what he afterwards did for him on the Continent, where he was employed to travel and report how Henry VIII. was regarded by the French, the Genoese, Dutch, and other foreigners. It was in his journeyings of this kind that Boorde acquired that knowledge of Europe which he has set down in prose and verse in his "Book of the Introduction of Knowledge:" "the whych doth teache a man to speake all maner of languages, and to know the usage and fashion of all maner of countreys." It is a mixture of guide book, philology, satire, manual of useful knowledge, and other matters, and is highly amusing. In making the round of Europe the author begins with his own countrymen, and appears to be most struck with their proneness to change the fashion of their clothes, and with their talent for cursing and swearing. The Englishman is figured in a rude woodcut, holding in one hand a pair of shears, and in the other a roll of cloth, while underneath are these verses —"ryme dogrell," as Borde remarks:

> "I am an Englishman, and naked I stand here,
> Mu-yng in my mynde what rayment I shall were;
> For now I wyll were thys, and now I wyll were that,
> And now I wyll were I cannot tell what."

As for the swearing, he says: "In all the worlde ther is no regyon nor countree that doth use more swerynge than is used in England, for a chylde that scars can speak, a boy, a gyrle, a wenche nowadays wyl swear as great othes as an old knave and an old drab." English independence, too, as well as the swearing and the mutability of English fashions, Boorde insists upon:

> "No man shall let me, but I wyl have my mind."

The Welsh and Irish fare worse; and the doctor's old friends the Scotch, of course, come in for hard knocks. The device of putting these attacks on national vices into the mouth of the sinner himself, who is made to stand up and affirm himself to be thus and thus, comically enhances their effectiveness. One can imagine the state of mind in which Captain Fluellen would be thrown by these lines, especially if he had ever heard "Taffy was a Welshman":

> "I am a Welshman, and do dwel in Wales,
> I haue loued to serche boudgets and looke in males;
> I loue not to labour nor to delue nor to dyg,
> My fyngers be lymed lyke a lyme twig."

The old charges are brought against the Scotch:

> "I am a Scotyshe man, and trew I am to Fraunce;
> In euery countrey myselfe I do aduance;
> I wyll boost myselfe, I will crake and face,
> I loue to be exalted here and in euery place.
> I am a Scotyshe man, and haue dissembled mouche
> And in my promise I haue not kept touche.
> . . . . . .
> An Englyshe man I cannot naturally loue."

So the doctor goes through Europe, making a good many sensible remarks as he goes. In his Breviary, from which Mr. Furnivall makes copious extracts, Boorde treats of dietetics and the care of health, beginning in his treatment of the latter subject as far back as the rules for choosing a good situation for one's house, and throughout showing a freedom from professional prejudice and a practical wisdom that make him nearly as instructive as he is entertaining.

—"The Battle of Dorking" is said to have sold five additional editions—which would be five thousand copies—of Blackwood's, and its sale as a pamphlet by itself has also been large. It is still talked about, and various persons are mentioned as possible writers of it; a brother to the Colonel Hamley to whom the authorship is commonly attributed, a Mr. Pullene, and one or two more. The publishers, though saying nothing definite, seem rather to encourage the notion that the article was not written by Colonel Hamley. This, perhaps, is because that gentleman holds an office under Government, and Mr. Gladstone's economical cabinet, already at daggers drawn with the whole military class, which is naturally delighted to see this attack on its enemy, may be thought of as not particularly well pleased over a work which gives popular expression to the opinion that the Liberal policy as regards national armaments is dangerously or meanly inadequate. The Germans, as may be supposed, get considerable pleasure from the spectacle of the fast-anchored isle thus "frighted from its propriety," and some one of them has written an article, not the most brilliant in the world in point of wit, but expressing such a contemptuous acceptance of the situation described by the Dorking volunteer as is not calculated to soothe the Heligoland excitement.

——We see, by the bye, that the author of "Dame Europa's School," another specimen of the literature of the panic, but one far inferior to the Blackwood article, has come out with a novel, being moved to do so by the success of his satire. "Tom Pippin's Wedding" is the title of it, and according to all accounts it is extraordinary stuff. The Athenæum quotes among other passages this: "One has heard drunkards blaspheme, and madmen rave, but for downright, cool profanity, for simple prostitution of all that men and angels reverence, give me a couple of evangelical ministers talking Scripture during a six-mile drive." The silliness and vulgarity of other passages, however, more than equal the intolerance—if that be the name of it—of this. A set of words is wanting for the expression of the movements of minds and hearts of a certain size. Intolerance which argues a certain amount of deliberation and thoughtfulness, and a certain genuine warmth of feeling in itself respectable, is hardly the term to apply to the state of mind expressed in these words.

—"The eminent barrister and historian," as his daughter in her biography of him calls Mr. John Adolphus, will hardly be known to many of our readers either as a historian or a barrister, although he was in good practice as a criminal lawyer, and although, some half-century ago, his very high Tory history of England under George the Third and his memoirs of the French Revolution were in favor among people of old-fashioned principles. But although his books are forgotten, and the eminence which his daughter's affection takes for real was but very factitious, her filial piety will probably secure for him in literature the niche which he failed of securing for himself. Her biography of him is an interesting and very readable book, full of gossip about the London of the beginning of this century, its theatres, literary cliques, taverns, ordinaries, spouting clubs, coffee-rooms, and all the strange fashions and habits of "the town." Among a thousand similar other things that the writer tells us is this dubious piece of philology about a slang term which still holds its own in England, and has some currency in this country. "The fashion of the house," says Adolphus, speaking of a tavern called the Queen's Head, in Duke's Court, "was to order spirits in a pewter half-quartern measure, which the drinker mixed with water according to his taste. It was frequently the fashion to say, 'Now I'll have another quartern, and go.' In process of time the order was cut down to the last word, 'Waiter, bring me a go;' and from that house, and from that mode of expression, the word extended probably over the whole kingdom as synonymous with half a quartern of spirits." If Mr. Adolphus's memory does not play him false, he was connected with one of our customs which has always seemed to most people to require explanation, and which he thus explains. When a boy at school, he used to spend his holidays with a great-uncle, residing in Sackville Street, of whom he stood in great awe, and in whose house he had but doleful days of it, his only solace in his dreariness being a print-shop at the corner of the street, and the kindness of a lady "of high fashion and great beauty" who lived near, and occasionally gave him sweetmeats and kisses. On the day on which he wore his first chimney-pot hat, he paid a visit to this leader of fashion, and she in joke put the boy's hat on her own head, and liking the look of herself in the new head-dress, she resolved to wear it into the Park, whither she was about to ride. This she did at once, and from then till now, in spite of attempts at innovation, the fashion has sustained its ground.

PAUPERISM IN ENGLAND.*

Mr. Maine, in his recent remarkable work on "Village Communities," has made the ingenious observation that pauperism was first pressed upon the attention of English statesmen when the old "cultivating-groups" of England, with their community of lands, began to fall to pieces, and the modern unequal division of landed property to take their place. This process of dissolution is still continuing in Great Britain, making more unequal the holding of land, and accordingly adding to the many difficulties of England's great problem—pauperism. During the last one hundred and fifty years, as Prof. Fawcett shows, nearly 7,500,000 acres have been taken by Acts of Parliament from the common lands, both arable and grazing, of Great Britain—that is, from the use and enjoyment of the poor—and added mainly to larger estates. Early even in the feudal ages, when the "village community" had partly given place to the "manor," population in certain districts of England began to press upon space, and combined with the breaking up of "commons," the ignorance of the laboring class, and the difficulty of communication, to create local problems of pauperism. Throughout the early English history, we find various Acts of Parliament dealing with this question, especially endeavoring to prevent indiscriminate almsgiving, and to distinguish between voluntary and involuntary poverty. Still, owing to increasing inequality of property, to the effect of foreign wars, and to unwise legislation, pauperism steadily increased throughout the kingdom.

The special legislation against this evil, the "Poor Law" of England, dates from the reign of Elizabeth. Under this act, for the first time, every needy person had a legal right to claim relief. To afford funds for this public assistance, rates were laid upon real estate. The able-bodied were compelled to work, or the cost of maintaining them was thrown upon their near relations, if they were able to bear it. Workhouses were established, and overseers of the poor appointed, who were responsible for the administering of relief. This act has been substantially imitated by the most recent legislation of the United Kingdom, and was undoubtedly wise in its provisions. For a hundred and fifty years, it worked comparatively well; vagrancy and mendicancy diminished under it, and the great evil seemed possible to be controlled. Gradually, however, a history of blunders and mistakes in the treatment of this perplexing matter began, from which England has never yet recovered.

That dangerous form of public charity, "outdoor relief," crept in; the workhouse test was dropped; allowances were given by the overseers of the poor to make up for deficient wages. "Settlement laws" were passed, which restrained poor workingmen from migrating from a parish where the labor market was overstocked to one where there was a demand. Even illegitimacy was encouraged, by a larger allowance being granted by the parish to a poor woman for an illegitimate than a legitimate child. Under this vicious system, a pauper became better cared for than a hard-working laborer, and that most wretched human condition, where people live by the cunning, deceit, and dependence of beggary—a state often more fatal to character than courses of absolute crime—became a profession, and was transmitted sometimes for several generations. In 1832, Prof. Fawcett states, the evil had reached a gigantic condition. Rates increased so as to threaten the absorption of the whole rent of the land. In one estate near Cambridge, 500 acres rented for about £1 per acre, while the annual poor-rates amounted to £250, the owner also testifying that his loss every year, from being obliged to employ pauper labor, was £100 more.

The discouraging effect upon honest labor of this public support of an army of able-bodied paupers can hardly be imagined. Thus, as Mr. Fawcett well puts it, a laboring man, by dint of much economy, self-control, and hard labor, saves sufficient to purchase a small annuity, and to procure, when he is old and broken-down, an income of five shillings a week. Another spends all his savings at the ale-house, and leads a lazy, dissolute life, leaving his family in misery. At precisely the same age, all he has to do is to apply to the parish for relief, and, without any unpleasant publicity or obligation to reside in the workhouse, he receives the same income—five shillings a week. Even during the years when they were able to labor, it often happened that the pauper received more than the industrious laborer could earn. As Prof. Fawcett remarks (from whose clear sketch this résumé is taken), "England was brought nearer to ruin by the old Poor Law than she ever was by a hostile army." The ghastly and corrupting effects of this blundering legislation are still visible throughout England.

There was one mistake, however, made by the British statesmen in treating this evil which it seems to us Mr. Fawcett does not sufficiently estimate—we mean their neglect of any general scheme for popular education. During those same centuries when this evil was reaching such tremendous proportions in England, two other communities, Holland and

* "Pauperism: Its Causes and Remedies. By Prof. Henry Fawcett." New York: Macmillan & Co. 1871. 12mo, 270 pp.

New England, had instituted a system of popular education which has done more to check pauperism in their limits than any other one cause. Had England begun with education before alms in assisting the laboring classes, her future would have been very different.*

The new Poor Law of England dates from 1834. Under it the "workhouse test" was revived, and the assistance by "allowances" abolished. The "laws of settlement" were made easier for the laborer, so that he could go where his labor was in demand; illegitimacy was checked by making the father responsible for the support of the child; and the whole administration of pauperism improved by freeing it of many abuses. Under this legislation, the increase of paupers was undoubtedly checked, and the cost of pauperism diminished throughout the kingdom, from an average of eight shillings per caput of the whole population, to five or six shillings. The whole mode of relief was reformed by a more general application through the authorities of the workhouse test; that is, by requiring every alleged pauper to live and work in the almshouse. Still, even with this reformed legislation, this terrible disease and national evil of Great Britain reached such a point as to inspire all thoughtful Englishmen with anxiety and alarm. Though the increase of national wealth is estimated at $50,000,000 per annum, the increase of poverty seems to keep pace with it. Every winter in London, it is estimated, there are 170,000 paupers within the limits, and the pauper children of the kingdom are said to number the vast multitude of half a million. The relation, too, of outdoor and indoor pauperism is not satisfactory. Throughout England, only one-eighth of the paupers are inmates of the workhouse, while in Ireland the reverse is the fact, the indoor paupers being to the outdoor as five to one—a much more sound, economic condition.

In fact, we may say, in summary, that Prof. Fawcett's history of the condition of England in this matter is exceedingly discouraging. We think, perhaps unreasonably so, he takes the "hard," economic, and despairing view of the question, while the remedies which he proposes are some of them as hopeless as the disease. We have a little query here in our own mind as to his statistics. The English custom is to class all as "paupers" who receive any assistance, however small, from the public authorities. But manifestly a hard-working, industrious, independent laborer, who fell into a temporary misfortune and was helped out of it by a small assistance from the overseers of the poor, should not be ranked with the degraded class of "paupers." So that when we hear of 170,000 paupers in London, we need to know how far those were dependent on the public before we make up our minds as to the extent of the evil.

In this city, for instance, there are some 22,000 persons aided each winter, to a very small extent, by the Commissioners of Charities. They are notoriously not "paupers," and support themselves the rest of the year, bringing up, many of them, honest and industrious families. So when we hear from Mr. Fawcett of the terrible increase of pauperism in Australia and the United States, and of "110,000 persons receiving outdoor relief in Philadelphia," and of "9,000 being inmates of the almshouse" in a single season, we know that his constitutional tendency, or his contact with this gloomy subject, has thrown a cloud over all his views, and obscured even his examination of statistics. We have not the Almshouse Reports of Philadelphia at hand, but such statistics as the above are utterly incredible. So far from pauperism increasing in our cities, the Report of the New York Commissioners of Charities for 1871 shows that, while the number of inmates of the almshouses of this city on January 1, 1850, was 1,313, or 1 in 423 of the population of the city, on January 1, 1870, it was only 1,114, or 1 in 808. The number assisted by outdoor relief seems to remain about the same, year by year, being 23,034 in 1865, and 22,782 in 1870. The expense of the relief of the outdoor poor averaged ten cents per caput of our population in 1865, and was eight cents in 1870. That for hospitals for the poor was eighty-seven cents per caput in 1865, and eighty-seven cents in 1870. And yet it must be remembered that New York is the centre of the foreign pauperism of the country, about twelve per cent. of our city paupers only being native-born.

The main remedy for this vast evil which presents itself to Mr. Fawcett's mind seems to us utterly futile—that is, the diffusion through the laboring classes of a sense of their duty to check population. Mr. Mill's admirers must have often felt that his chapters on this subject—"the voluntary checks" of population—are the least satisfactory of his well-known treatise. Mr. Fawcett follows in his footsteps. Their positions are unassailable, economically, but they are such as a laboring class can never be induced to recognize; and the notion that pauperism can ever be checked by proper views of the workingman's duty in this matter seems to us as wild as the favorite theorem of the female reformers—that men and women can work together in public life, and forget the relations of sex.

Mr. Fawcett's least satisfactory chapter is on what is generally held as the most "advanced" of the recent methods of dealing with pauper children—the "placing-out system." The great objection to it, in the mind of this English economist, is that this charity offers a reward to pauperism, as the pauper's child is thus treated better than the self-supporting workingman's, and so the laborer is induced to increase his family, because he is sure of their being well cared for. Here, again, the philosopher of the study has lost sight of the nature of the laboring man in real life. No consideration as to the future support of his family ever affects a workingman in such matters. Furthermore, if anything would make him devoutly desire never to be the father of a family, it would be the prospect of his children being "placed out." In this city, the only thing often which prevents the lowest poor from sending their children to the almshouse, is the fear that they will be placed out or sent West, not through dread of any abuse to them, but from the blind force of the paternal instinct. Mr. Fawcett, too, forgets, under his scientific prepossessions, that the pauper's children, though, economically considered, they ought not to have been born, are not responsible for the fact; and society is responsible for giving them a fair chance in the world. Moreover, society, in Mr. Fawcett's own view, can do nothing more economical than in "placing out" these children. The great expense and danger to society are in "breeds" of paupers and vagrants. The almshouse tends to make pauperism inherited.

The emigration plan breaks up the line of descent, and converts the little pauper into a self-supporting producer. Besides, the annual cost of placing out or boarding out a pauper child is far less than his support in an almshouse. The experience of a very extended private charity in this city—the Children's Aid Society—is instructive in this regard, as this association have placed out some 25,000 poor and vagrant children in towns in the West at an average expense of only $15 per caput, the children growing up to a very large degree honest, self-supporting, and industrious persons, some even having acquired large properties.

Mr. Fawcett's other remedies for this great disease of England are more wisely considered. His remarks on education, emigration, co-operation, the improvement in land-tenure, and against the enclosure of common lands, are deserving of careful study.

*In London, $25,000,000 per annum are spent on organized charities, while, till the present year, no general scheme of popular education was ever inaugurated.

The Fall of England; The Battle of Dorking. Reminiscences of a Volunteer. By a Contributor to Blackwood. (New York: G. P. Putnam & Sons. 1871.)—There are few odder phenomena in modern politics than the feelings of the English people with regard to their national defences. They have deliberately, for over two centuries, chosen to rely on their fleet for protection against invasion, and have found their confidence in the advantages of this means of protection fully justified by experience. With the exception of the civil war of 1640, and the little raid of the Pretender in 1745, they have enjoyed for four hundred years complete freedom from hostile military operations on their soil, the beneficial influence of which on trade and industry, and on the growth and firm establishment of legal habits among the people, it is almost impossible to overestimate; and, indeed, nobody can form anything like an adequate idea of its value who does not consider what frightful evils the Continental nations have during the same period suffered from the movements of contending forces. It is, of course, impossible to say with certainty what cause has most contributed to any political results, but it seems safe to ascribe a very large proportion of the growth of English constitutional freedom to the absence of the military general, as a person of special weight or influence, from English politics. The growth, too, of that almost unique character, the Anglo-Saxon judge, who has played so important a part both in English and American political progress, is due to the total want of familiarity both of the governors and governed with the arbitrary processes of military rule. Moreover, the smallness and insignificance of the English army has undoubtedly had much to do with the subordination of the military to the civil power which is so marked and, to Continental Europeans, so striking a feature of English society. And yet, small as the army has been, it has sufficed not only for the preservation of order at home, but for operations of sufficient magnitude and brilliancy in Continental wars to acquire for the country a military reputation of the first order. The fleet, too, has not only proved a sufficient protection against invasion, but for more than a century gave Great Britain all but complete maritime supremacy. Nevertheless, the national mind has been haunted, probably ever since the Norman Conquest, with the fear that an invader might in some way give the fleet the slip, and that if he did he would surely succeed in subjugating the country. "Invasion panics" consequently form a regularly recurring incident of all periods of peace. Few Englishmen are, in fact, ever entirely free from the dread of invasion except when English armies are invading some other country. Nothing ever comes of these panics, because the fear is never strong enough to overcome the dislike of compulsory military service which an enlargement of the effective military force would make necessary, or to overwhelm the traditional suspicion of large standing armies. Consequently, after a few months' talk, the matter drops out of the public mind, till some imposing display of force on the part of some Continental power brings it back again. All panics, except the last one, were inspired by France. It was always a French army which was to land at Dover and take London, which city was sure to be given up to pillage—its wealth furnishing a temptation such as no French general was supposed to be able to resist. Indeed, one of the saddest evidences of French decline is to be found in the fact that Frenchmen no longer figure in the imaginary invasions of England conjured up by the British imagination. The Germans have succeeded to this as to so many other places of honor long held by their unhappy enemy, and it is a curious compliment to their discipline, and systematic method of spoiling their foes, that they are not expected to pillage London, but to levy heavy contributions on it.

The last panic has been created by the spectacle of German prowess in France, and, as usual, has called forth a good deal of writing, and amongst other things the brochure before us, a jeu d'esprit which first appeared in Blackwood, and has been since issued in a separate form, and enjoyed a great success. Its main object, apart from the general one of creating alarm about the state of the military defences of the country, is to show the uselessness of the volunteers, who go out every Easter Monday, and manœuvre in helpless ignorance and inefficiency on open spaces near London, under the command of elected officers, who know no more of soldiering than the men. The writer, an old man, describes in the year 1925 a battle in which he as a volunteer took part, fifty years previously, in which the volunteer force was totally defeated, and the regular army sacrificed in the vain attempt to stay the march of a German army of invasion, which had effected a landing owing to the destruction of the iron-clad fleet by a newly invented torpedo, and to the absence of a large portion of the regular force defending Canada against the United States and Ireland against the Fenians. The author is evidently either a soldier or a man very familiar with military operations, and he uses his knowledge sufficiently to make a picture of extraordinary vividness, and yet without ever laying aside the dimness of vision with which a civilian volunteer might be supposed to watch the operations of a campaign. Nothing, too, can be more skilful, in a literary way, than the incidental portrayal, in the course of the narrative, of the disorganization and want of preparation of the volunteers, and of the misery and humiliation wrought by foreign conquest. The tale has consequently been devoured, not less for its opportuneness as regards the state of the public mind, than for its artistic merit, which is, indeed, so high that only one man, Colonel Hamley—the author of "Lady Lee's Widowhood"—has been guessed at as likely to combine the needful military experience with the needful literary dexterity.

Who is Responsible for the War? By Scrutator. With an Appendix containing Four Letters reprinted (by permission) from the Times. (London: Rivingtons. 1871.)—The pseudonymous author of this little volume began the arguing of the question which forms its title in the columns of the London Times in October and November last. It was done in a controversy with Professor Max Müller, which was ably and rather politely conducted on both parts. At that time, the question was still of considerable practical interest and importance, as the victor was but claiming a part of the territory of the vanquished, chiefly on the ground of the latter having begun an unprovoked struggle. When the writer, having enlarged his arguments, published it in book-form, the war was over, and the preliminaries of peace about being concluded, but he seems still to have flattered himself that his appeal to the English public in favor of France might yet, through mediating voices, exercise some influence upon the final settlement. Now that the victor has safely carried off the spoils he demanded, the argument can have but a historical interest, and even that is somewhat narrowed down by the way "Scrutator" endeavors to prove his paradoxical theses. For he puts all the blame upon Bismarck alone; represents King William and Germany as having been drawn into the war by the "diabolical" manœuvres of that man of "blood and iron;" "excepts the Crown Prince of Prussia from all the strictures expressed or implied" in his pages; admits that the French, before the war, betrayed as much longing for the Rhine as the Germans for Alsace and Lorraine, and that the Emperor Napoleon and his ministers were "reckless and criminal" in opening the contest. His impeachment of Prussia, however—that is, as its development shows it, of Bismarck—is broad enough. He "has endeavored to establish," among other minor points, the following:

"That the Hohenzollern candidature was a legitimate grievance to France."

"That the French Government . . . really desired a pacific solution of the question."

"That Count Bismarck got up the Hohenzollern intrigue with his eyes wide open to all the consequences that have followed."

"That Prussia never withdrew, directly or indirectly, the candidature of Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, and that the eventual retirement of the Prince took place in such a way as to leave the grievance of France precisely where it was at the commencement of the quarrel."

"That, nevertheless, France still sought a pacific solution."

"That Count Bismarck . . . precipitated the war by the gratuitous invention and publication of a fictitious affront offered by the King of Prussia to the French Ambassador at Ems."

"That Count Bismarck requires French territory, not as a security against French aggressiveness, but as a means of keeping up the military system of Prussia and keeping down German liberalism."

To prove all this, "Scrutator" quotes sundry diplomatic notes, despatches, and articles, none of which, if we remember right, contains anything new to the journal-reading public. It is in their juxtaposition and the dexterous drawing of inferences that he displays his skill in defending assertions which, in their entirety, hardly deserve a serious refutation. Strictly speaking, he convinces the reader of none of his points; and all he makes plausible is that Bismarck was not at all unpleasantly surprised by the eagerness with which Napoleon grasped the pretext of the Hohenzollern candidature for plunging France, unprepared as she was, into a war which the Prussian statesman—and, in fact, the whole world—had foreseen, or by the mad fury with which sincere and hired chauvinism answered to the Duc de Gramont's warlike announcements; that, knowing that war must come, he used all the means in his hand—means fair and unfair—to put France in the wrong before the world, and to inflame the German mind, north and south of the Main; and perhaps also that, after seeing with what enthusiasm Germany, the whole of Germany, was ready to take up the gauntlet flung into her face by her infatuated neighbor, he was not inclined to let slip the opportunity of fighting the battle, which had to be fought one day, at a moment ill-selected by the foe, and of uniting the two sections of Germany by victories won in a common defence.

The Psalms. The Common Version revised for the American Bible Union, with an Introduction and Occasional Notes. By Thomas J. Conant. (New York: American Bible Union; London: Trübner & Co.)—Long before the revision of the English Bible was seriously undertaken in England, the American Bible Union had entered upon the same project, and had published several books of both the Old and the New Testaments. These revisions, being the work of individual translators, are of different degrees of merit, and lack that general consent of scholars which is counted upon to give favor to the work of the English revisers. Moreover, though scholars of other communions have been employed upon the work, the fact that it was begun in the interest of the Baptists must always prejudice it somewhat in the view of the church universal. Nevertheless, the Bible Union has made some improved readings, which might be adopted with advantage by the English Commission sitting in the Jerusalem Chamber of Westminster Abbey. Dr. Conant is a good Hebraist, and his part of the revision is performed with conscientious thoroughness, yet with a wise regard for the hold of the standard version upon the popular mind. He has not attempted an independent translation of the Psalms, but a revision of the common English version with a more exact conformity to the Hebrew. This principle is correct; for, in preparing anew the Bible for the people, regard must be had to the purity and integrity of the English tongue as well as to the more advanced state of sacred philology. The scholars meeting in the Jerusalem Chamber may know Hebrew and Greek better than King James's translators, but it may well be questioned whether they know English better; and a revision of the English version, adhering as closely as possible to the present text, is, perhaps, more to be desired than a new translation from the original Scriptures. Sometimes the change of a single word makes the sense more clear, and adds to the strength of the English. Thus, in Ps. xviii. 15, Dr. Conant reads, "The foundations of the world were made bare," where the common version has "discovered." So in Ps. ii. 5, "Will confound them in his hot displeasure" is an improvement upon "vex them in his sore displeasure." Again, in Ps. xlv. 1, "My heart is overflowing with a goodly theme" is more precise than "My heart is inditing a good matter"; and a new sense is given to v. 8 by the rendering, "Myrrh and aloes, cassia, are all thy garments; from palaces of ivory, stringed instruments cheer thee." Such examples of the improvement of the sense, without detriment to the English, might be multiplied from the revision of Dr. Conant. But the substitution of bowed for cast in the pathetic cry, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul?" (Ps. xlii. and xliii.), adds nothing either to the meaning or to the sentiment; and in Ps. xviii.: 7, the graphic description, "Then the earth shook and trembled; the foundations also of the hills moved and were shaken," is not improved by Dr. Conant's reading, "Then the earth shook and quaked; and the foundations of the mountains trembled, and were shaken;" while the emphatic repetition in v. 10, "He rode upon a cherub and did fly; yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind," is quite impaired by the phrase, "and soared along on wings of the wind." In some instances, as in Ps. xix. 3, Dr. Conant has adopted what appears to us the less accurate and facile of the various readings of the Hebrew text. Upon the whole, his revision is to be regarded as tentative rather than complete, a help toward an improved version, not that version itself. The poetic form and the explanatory notes add to the value of his scholarly work for the use of the general reader.

From Fourteen to Fourscore. By Mrs. S. W. Jewett. (New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1871.)—In the short "introduction" to this interesting story, the author informs us that she wrote it "to please herself." And this assertion is well sustained throughout the book, in the character which she has chosen to personate. It might easily pass for the veritable transcript of an old lady's journal and reminiscences, written out "with no view to publication," but to gratify a favorite grandchild. We do not mean by this to imply that it is not also likely to please others, but simply that it is not written in the interests of and theory, or party, or sect—that it is not didactic—that it cannot properly be classed among the "religious" novels, though there is a good deal of religion in it—that it can hardly be called even a "love story," if that means following the checquered fortunes of two persons through many fears and joys, doubts and hopes, to the inevitable conclusion. It is rather a collection of several love-passages, with quite the usual amount of cross-purposes, united, however, by the author's personality, to whose own story the main interest of course belongs. "If there is a moral to my story," the author says, "it is better that my life should teach it than my words." The reader, therefore, need not fear being preached to, though there are many passages which he may skip as prosy, if he is hunting only for incidents. It belongs rather to the "quiet" class of novels than the exciting, yet it never degenerates into dulness. The mere scenery of the narrative is of the slightest kind, and somewhat too vague, perhaps; but this is far from being the case with the sketches of character, which really form the true and permanent value of the book, and are positive additions to our spiritual portrait-gallery. Prominent among these are "Aunt Rebecca" and "Aunt Content"—the two most interesting persons in the book, unless the narrator herself be an exception. Both of these have had their lifelong trials, arising in each instance from disappointed love. But in the one case the lover's death brought the disappointment, and in the other his marriage. There is also a similarity in the two cases, in that both have sisters for rivals; but with the difference that the sister of Aunt Rebecca is a successful rival, and the sister of Aunt Content a disappointed one. Yet the former could be called successful only in a very literal and worldly sense. She is aware that her husband has given her but "a divided heart," the unmarried sister being still the most deeply loved. And in her treatment of this very difficult relation, the author seems to us to have shown rare delicacy and truth of sentiment. The reader will find here no justification of "elective affinities," or anything of the sort, in opposition to the true sanctity of marriage.

The contrast between the two sisters—that is, between the mother and aunt of our heroine—is admirably rendered, and not less so is the difference between the two "Aunts" already spoken of—Aunt Content, who is, upon the whole, our favorite, being of the homely sort, and Aunt Rebecca more refined. And yet the homeliness of the former is only of the speech and manner. There is no lack of true delicacy in the spirit of this excellent woman. "But why give us these sentiments in so homely a form, then?" it may be asked. "Why must a beautiful thought be degraded by vulgarity of style and constant violations of pure English?" It would be answer enough, perhaps, to say that, as a portraiture of New England life, these little touches of coarseness must not be omitted. But we maintain, further, that there is, indirectly, a valuable purpose to be answered by it, inasmuch as it reminds the "educated" classes of what they are so apt to forget—that defects of education are compatible not only with sterling worth, but also with the truest delicacy and refinement of feeling.

We have said that there there is a good deal of religion in this story, though it cannot be classed as a religious novel. Very little theology is introduced, and it would be difficult to assign that little to any one church or sect. But it certainly is of the healthy kind. It encourages no morbid excitement. It spins no wiredrawn subtleties. It refers continually to life, and believes, with Swedenborg, whom the book sometimes quotes, that "the life of religion is to do good."

Of defects in the book, we cannot say that we have discovered many worth noting. There is sometimes a little carelessness of grammar which might easily have been avoided. There are characters whom we would gladly have heard more of that are dropped too soon by the way. And, finally, Philip, who was meant to be the hero, decidedly falls off in interest in the latter half of the volume.

The Annual Register: A Review of Public Events at Home and Abroad for the Year 1870. New Series. (London: Rivingtons. 1871.)—This is a large, well-printed volume, consisting of two parts; the first comprising the "English and Foreign History" of the year, and a "Retrospect of Literature, Art, and Science;" and the second a "Chronicle of Remarkable Occurrences," an "Obituary of Eminent Persons," sketches of "Remarkable Trials," and "Public Documents and State Papers," besides some lists of minor interest. The whole second part, with the exception of the obituaries of Alexandre Dumas and Montalembert, and a few documents and "occurrences," is exclusively devoted to English subjects. Nor does the literary "Retrospect" review any production of the foreign press. The "History" is far from being equally partial—France, as might be expected, occupying a very prominent place in its foreign division. A separate chapter treats of Germany and Austro-Hungary; another of Rome, Italy, Spain, and Portugal; and another, very briefly, of a number of other countries in Europe, Asia, and America. Africa, however, is passed over unnoticed, Asia is represented only by China—the topic being the Tien-tsin massacre—and the death of President Lopez of Paraguay is the only event recorded of South America. This sparingness is the more surprising in a book which devotes no less than 145 pages to chronicling events and accidents of merely passing interest, such as "the theft of Colonel Hickie's child at Maidenhead," a "burglary at the American Minister's," the "accouchement of the Princess Mary of Teck," the "destruction of the Old Star and Garter Hotel, Richmond," murders, collisions, explosions, gales, disasters at sea, banquets, riots, executions, colliery accidents, and similar sensational things. The whole of the compilation, however, is readable, and some of its more important parts are very well done. Such is, among other historical portions, the account of the situation in France before and at the beginning of the war. The narrative of the military events is clear, comprehensive, and attractive; but here and there not quite accurate in its details. It is not correct that McMahon's army, "on the Thursday morning before the battle of Wissemburg," numbered only "40,000 men," nor that at Wörth it "contested the ground desperately for fifteen hours;" and still less correct that of its numbers, "scarce 5,000 remained on Saturday night to retrace their steps, broken and dispirited, towards Châlons." The figures regarding the forces in besieged Paris are rather loosely and contradictorily given (p. 179 and p. 211). The loss of the French "at Chevilly and Chilleurs," before Orleans, December 4—"no less than 14,000 prisoners"—is greatly exaggerated. Other inaccuracies of the same kind are probably typographical errors. "Nearly 300,000" (p. 179), as the number of the troops "of Bazaine . . . . shut up within the fortifications of Metz," is probably a misprint for nearly 200,000. "180,000 men," referring to the army with which McMahon marched from Châlons to Sedan, stands for 130,000, or possibly for 150,000; "10,000 prisoners," stated as the loss of General Von der Tann in the battle of Coulmiers, stands either for 1,000 or 2,000, the number claimed by the victorious French commander.

"Frossard, with the 7th Corps" (p. 158), is an obvious misprint for Frossard with the 2d Corps. "At Ognon" (p. 218), is a mistake for on the Ognon, Von Werder having defeated the French on the river, and not at a place of that name. The revision of the foreign names is, in general, somewhat defective. We find "Pinard" for Picard (p. 135), "L'Amirault" and "L'Admiraut" for Ladmirault, or L'Admirault; "Hassner" for Hasner, "Borez" for Baez. The writer on "Austro-Hungary" speaks of "Czechs and Gallicians, Poles, Slovenes" [sic], etc., with evidently very little knowledge of Slavic affairs. The "English History" is very exhaustive. Some of the literary pieces betray a decidedly able hand.

The Historical Reader, embracing Selections from Standard Writers of Ancient and Modern History, interspersed with illustrative Passages from British and American Poets; with Explanatory Observations, Notes, etc.: to which are added a Vocabulary of Difficult Words and Biographical and Geographical Indexes. By John J. Anderson, A.M. (New York: Clark & Maynard. 1871.)—This is a rather long title, but its length is justified by the contents of the volume, every part of which is carefully compiled or elaborated. "As its name indicates, it is intended to be used, not as a book of lessons to be committed to memory and recited, but as a Reading Book, to be used independently, or to accompany any of the ordinary school manuals of history, and to be read in connection with the study of them." The selections—which are chronologically arranged within the three divisions of "American History," "English, Scottish, and French History," and "Miscellaneous . . . History" of other nations, ancient and modern—are well adapted to make the youthful reader familiar not only with the details of a multitude of important events and with the characters of many historical personages, but also with the best productions of English and American historical literature, and a number of writers belonging to other fields and nations. Both as to names and contents, the extracts are well selected, but chiefly as regards the former. Not only such English or American historians proper are represented as Clarendon, Burnet, Hume, Robertson, Ferguson, Gibbon, Mitford, Lingard, Milman, Macaulay, Grote, Merivale, Freeman, Froude, Irving, Bancroft, Prescott, Hildreth, and Motley, but also Milton, Berkeley, Chatham, Goldsmith, Burke, Scott, Southey, Bulwer, De Quincey, Thackeray, Dickens, Everett, Story, Greeley; as well as several writers of antiquity—Herodotus, Xenophon, Plato, Josephus, Tacitus; and some French—Rollin, Thiers, Lamartine, Michelet. German literature has, however, only one representative—Niebuhr, and Italian literature none. The compiler's introductory or explanatory notes and biographical notices are to the point, brief and well-worded, though not entirely free from mistakes, some of which may, however, be but typographical errors. James Fenimore Cooper died in 1851, not, as given, "in 1859;" the battle of Arbela was not fought in "330," but in 331; Halicarnassus was not "a city of Ionia," but a Dorian city of Caria; Thiers was not "a member of the Provisional Government that succeeded the Revolution of 1848." Nor do we agree with Mr. Anderson when he states that the "Consulate and Empire" of the writer just named is "considered one of the greatest historical works of modern times;" when he ranks the "History of Turkey" among "the most noted" of Lamartine's works; or when he calls Froude's style "strong and brilliant." In the notice of Niebuhr, there is no mention of his death. Nor ought the "History of the United Netherlands" to go unmentioned under "Motley," or the "History of the Jews" under "Milman," while many less important titles are given in other notices. The pronunciation of French names is often rather strangely marked, as the following specimens may show: "Do-mavl" (D'Aumale), "shawng de mar" (Champ de Mars), "vareduhng" (Verdun), "sang ahn-twahn" (St. Antoine). These defects are, however, very slight compared to the merits and usefulness of the "Reader."

Musings over the Christian Year and Lyra Innocentium. By Charlotte Mary Yonge. A Concordance to the Christian Year. (New York: Pott & Amery.)—To make an index or a concordance is in itself so thankless an office, so utterly unselfish and unprofitable a labor for the doer, but so serviceable to the reading public, that one who takes the pains should have the praise, and not be permitted to veil himself behind an anonymous publication. All admirers of Keble will be grateful for the "Concordance to the Christian Year;" but none more so than the hard-pressed clergyman, who, at the last moment, thinks to embellish his sermon with an apt poetic phrasing of his text or theme. The work is very thoroughly and satisfactorily done.

As an introduction to her "Musings," Miss Yonge has put together her own recollections of Keble with those of several friends, thus giving, in an easy, inartificial way, a picture of the everyday life of Hursley vicarage and an insight into the character and habits of the Christian poet. There was little in the outside life of such a man to attract the notice of the world; but it is pleasant to observe his kindness to the poor, his gentle fidelity in his work, his devout zeal for his church—though in the latter Miss Yonge sometimes causes Keble to appear less lovable in the reflection of her own intenser churchism. Her "Musings," too, sometimes rob a poem of its charm by translating it into the rugged baldness of a doctrine which it had deftly covered with the web of verse. A passionate admirer, a grateful protégé, a very devotee at the shrine of Keble, she gives an excess of attention to minor incidents and secondary qualities. These "Musings," however, are not without value in interpreting some of the obscurer poems by the incidents or frames of feeling which gave them birth; and they will take their place in Christian literature among the elegiac tributes of piety to genius, of love to goodness, and of faith and hope to the ideal life.

The Daughter of an Egyptian King. Translated from the German of George Ebers. By Henry Reed. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1871.)—The historical novel which hovers about the dubious border between fact and fiction is always in danger of being too fictitious for the confidence of fact, or too matter-of-fact for the illusion of fiction. And when its avowed purpose is the restoration of the manners and customs of a remote antiquity, it is likely to be too dry for a story or too fanciful for a picture of actual life. The legend of Nitetis, which Herodotus has preserved under three distinct forms in his "Thalia," is wrought by Dr. Ebers into a highly dramatic story, through the skilful combination of various versions. The daughter of Amasis of Egypt having been demanded by Cambyses in marriage, he palmed off as his own Nitetis, the daughter of his predecessor, whose throne he had usurped. The fair princess won the heart of the stern and fitful Persian, but just as he was about to consummate the marriage his jealousy was excited against his brother, and in a rage he sentenced Nitetis to be dragged through the streets of Babylon and buried alive. Before the sentence was executed, Cambyses became aware of his mistake—but too late, for Nitetis had already swallowed a deadly cosmetic. After her death the king learned of the trick that had been played upon him, and turned his grief to revenge upon the faithless Egyptian king. But the story is only a screen upon which to paint the manners and customs of the Egyptians and the Persians. Dr. Ebers is a learned Egyptologist, Director of the Museum at Jena, and author of "Aegypten und die Bücher Mose's" (reviewed in Vol. VII. of the Nation, No. 175). He has successfully reproduced the Egypt of the Persian invasion; his work is remarkably free from anachronisms, and will be valuable for consultation; but the story drags with the weight of the speeches; for the doctor has made every character as learned and technical as himself.

* Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books on the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Anderson (J. J.), The Historical Reader	(Clark & Maynard)	$1 80
Boyd (M.) Reminiscences of Fifty Years	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Collins (M.), Marquis and Merchant, swd	" "	50
Dickens (C.), Pickwick Papers	" "
Dindorf (W.), Sophocles	(Harper & Bros.)
Downing (C.), Selected Fruits	(John Wiley & Son)
Droz (G.), Around a Spring, swd	(Holt & Williams)	75
Dunn (H.), The Study of the Bible	(G. P. Putnam & Sons)	1 50
Eberhardt (M.), Die Rechtstellung des Weibes innerhalb der Ehe, swd	(Meininger & Schick)
Folsom (N. S.), The Four Gospels, 2d ed	(A. Williams & Co.)
Forsyth (W.), Novels and Novelists of the 18th Century	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Garrett (Ruth and Edward), The Quiet Miss Godolphin, and A Chance Child, 1 vol.	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Gilbert (Rev. D.), The Love of Jesus	(John Murphy & Co.)	50
Glenn (Jessie), Poems	(Bannan & Ramsey)
Hawthorne (Nathaniel), Twice Told Tales	(Jas. R. Osgood & Co.)
Mosses from an Old Manse	" "
Helps (A.), Life of Hernando Cortes	(G. P. Putnam & Sons)	2 00
Henson (W. S.), Modern Astronomy	(Newark)
Howe (Fisher), The True Site of Calvary	(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.)	1 00
Hutchings (J. M.), Scenes of Wonder and Curiosity in California	(A. Roman & Co.)	3 00
Jelliffe (W. M.), Good Selections in Prose and Poetry	(J. W. Schermerhorn & Co.)
Kingsley (Chas.), At Last: A Christmas in the West Indies	(Macmillan & Co.)	2 00
Lebon (H.), The Holy Communion	(John Murphy & Co.)	1 00
Leighton (R. F. A. M.), Greek Lessons	(Ginn Bros.)
Lear (Edward), Nonsense Songs, Stories, Botany, and Alphabets	(Jas. R. Osgood & Co.)
Lever (C.), Davenport Dunn, swd	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	75
Lodeman (A.), German Conversation Tables, bds	(Holt & Williams)	40
Marryat (Florence), Her Lord and Master, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	50
Martin (Prof. B. N.), Choice Specimens of American Literature	(Sheldon & Co.)
Meredith (Owen) Lucile and Other Poems, swd	(Jas. R. Osgood & Co.)	50

JUST OUT.

CHARLOTTE ACKERMAN,

A THEATRICAL ROMANCE

Founded upon interesting facts in the Life of a Young Artist of the last Century.

FROM THE GERMAN OF

OTTO MÜLLER.

Translated by

MRS. CHAPMAN COLEMAN AND HER DAUGHTERS,

The Translators of the

MÜHLBACH NOVELS.

Cloth, price $1 50; in paper, $1.

For Sale by all Booksellers.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,

822 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

JUST PUBLISHED.

I.

"THE MOST ORIGINAL NOVEL OF THE DAY."

TOM PIPPIN'S WEDDING.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"THE FIGHT AT DAME EUROPA'S SCHOOL."

16mo, extra cloth, $1 25p; paper cover, 75 cents.

"We must confess that its perusal has caused us more genuine amusement than we have derived from any fiction, not professedly comic, for many a long day. . . . Without doubt this is, if not the most remarkable, certainly the most original novel of the day."—London Bookseller.

II.

TRAVELS OF A DOCTOR. A Book of Travels of a Doctor of Physic. Containing his Observations made in Certain Portions of the Two Continents. 12mo, extra cloth, ornamented sides, $2.

III.

THE UNSEEN WORLD in the Light of the Cross. By T. Stork, D.D. 16mo, extra cloth, $1.

IV.

WEAR AND TEAR; or, Hints for the Overworked. By S. Weir Mitchell, M.D., Member of the National Academy of Sciences, etc. 18mo, fine cloth, 50 cents.

☞ For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price, by the Publishers.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,

715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia,

JUST PUBLISHED.

The German Conquest of England in 1875, and Battle of Dorking.

DESCRIBED BY AN EYEWITNESS IN 1925.

Describing the Arrival of the German Armada; destruction of the British Fleet; the decisive battle of Dorking; capture of London; Downfall of the English Empire.

12mo, paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

A powerful satire on the military helplessness of England. The Britons are stirred up by it as they have been by no magazine article of this generation."—Journal of Commerce.

Everybody is talking about it, and everybody should read it.

For sale by all booksellers, or sent by mail on receipt of price.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,

PHILADELPHIA.

YALE and HARVARD use

Whitney's German Course,

Otto's French Course.

HOLT & WILLIAMS,

PUBLISHERS,

No. 25 Bond Street, New York.

The Publishers issue a very large assortment of works in the same department.

☞ A descriptive catalogue will be sent gratis to any one referring to this advertisement.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

In one vol., crown 8vo, price $2.

AT LAST. A Christmas in the West Indies. By Charles Kingsley. With numerous illustrations.

"In this book, as during his visit, Mr. Kingsley revels in the gorgeous wealth of the West Indian vegetation, bringing before us one marvel after another, alternately sating and piquing our curiosity. Whether we climb the cliffs with him and peer over into the narrow bays which are being hollowed out by the trade surf, or wander through impenetrable forests, where the tops of the trees form a green cloud overhead, or gaze down glens which are watered by the clearest brooks, running through masses of palm and banana and all the rich variety of foliage, we are equally delighted and amazed."—Athenæum.

MEMOIR OF CHARLES MAYNE YOUNG, Tragedian. With Extracts from his Son's Journal. By Julian Charles Young, M.A. With Portraits and Sketches. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $2 25.

"Mr. Young is one of those pleasant diarists who, it is to be feared, are rapidly becoming as extinct as the delightful letter-writers of the past age. In this budget of anecdotes, fables, and gossip, old and new, relative to Scott, Moore, Chalmers, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Croker, Mathews, the Third and Fourth Georges, Bowles, Beckford, Lockhart, Wellington, Peel, Louis Napoleon, D'Orsay, Dickens, Thackeray, Louis Blanc, Gibson, Constable, and Stanfield (the list might be much extended), the reader must be hard indeed to please who cannot find entertainment."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"He has contrived to bring out a narrative often as detailed as Pepys, as versatile and lifelike as Boswell, and as full of recent personal interest as Crabb Robinson. It is not a barren record of facts, but a kindly chronicle of life and manners, and men and minds, running over the last half century."—Saturday Review.

"There is hardly a page of it which was not worth printing. There is hardly a line which has not some kind of interest attaching to it.... When we mention that the extracts from Mr. Young's own journal abound in choice anecdotes of Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Scott, and many other of the great men of the last generation with whom he was brought into personal contact, we have said enough to prove the interest of the work, even if it had less of the grace and vivacity which characterize it from beginning to end. We lay down the volume with regret, and shall return to it in many a leisure hour."—Guardian.

MACMILLAN & CO.,

38 BLEECKER STREET, NEW YORK.

SCIENCE LECTURES

FOR THE PEOPLE.

FIRST SERIES. Thirteen Lectures by Professors Roscoe, Dr. Alcock, W. S. Jevons, and J. E. Morgan. 12mo, paper, 50 cents.

SECOND SERIES. Four Lectures by Professors Williamson, Dr. Carpenter, A. H. Green, and J. Norman Lockyer. 12mo, paper, 25 cents.

THIRD SERIES. Five Lectures by Professors Huxley, Roscoe, Huggins, Dawkins, and A. W. Ward. 12mo, paper, 25 cents.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,

23 Murray Street and 27 Warren Street.

FINE BOOKS. CHEAP BOOKS.

BOOKS FROM LONDON.

J. SABIN & SONS,

"YE ANTIQUE BOOKSTORE,"

84 Nassau Street, New York.

LANE'S ARABIAN NIGHTS. Numerous beautiful Illustrations by Hennessy. 3 vols. 8vo, cloth, $10.

CAULFIELD, James. Portraits, Memoirs, and Characters of Remarkable Persons, from the Revolution in 1688 to the end of the Reign of George II., collected from the most authentic accounts extant. London, 1819. 4 vols. large 8vo, uncut. Fine copy. Several of the Portraits are by George Cruikshank. $24.

CRUIKSHANK. Oliver Twist, by Charles Dickens With all the original Illustrations by Geo. Cruikshank. 3 vols. crown 8vo, half-red morocco. London, 1841. $9.

CRUIKSHANK. The Comic Almanac. An Ephemeris in Jest and Earnest, containing Merry Tales, Humorous Poetry, Quips and Oddities, etc. With many hundred Illustrations on Steel and Wood by George Cruikshank. First series, 1835-1843. $2 75.

The Comic Almanacs of George Cruikshank have long been regarded by his admirers as among his finest, most characteristic productions.

CRUIKSHANK. The Biglow Papers, by James Russell Lowell. With Colored Plates, by Geo. Cruikshank. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

THE COIN-COLLECTOR'S MANUAL. By H. Noel-Humphreys. Many nice Steel Plates. 2 vols. crown 8vo, newly bound, half-morocco. London, 1853. $5.

MR. SPONGE'S Sporting Tour. With Illustrations (colored) by Leech. 8vo, half-morocco, uncut. Scarce. $5.

FALSTAFF. The Life of Sir John Falstaff. Illustrated by George Cruikshank. With a Biography from Authentic Sources, by Robert B. Brough. London, 1850. Royal 8vo, uncut, $10.

The Illustrations to this book are some of the finest specimens of Cruikshank's masterpieces. Shakespeare's Jack Falstaff is inimitably rendered.

WALKER, Alexander. Beauty: Illustrated chiefly by an Analysis and Classification of Beauty in Woman, preceded by a Critical View of the Hypothesis of Hume, Hogarth, Burke, Alison, Leonardo da Vinci, Winckelman, Mengs, etc. Illustrated with Drawings from Life by Henry Howard, drawn on stone by Gauci and Lane. London, Wilson, 1836. Royal 8vo, half-levant morocco (new) extra, uncut. Fine copy of the original edition. With first impressions of the plates on India paper. $11.

CHAP BOOK. Pleasant and Delightful History of Jack and the Giants. 2 parts in one. 12mo, half-morocco, uncut. Nottingham, n. d. $1 25.

CHAP BOOKS (A Collection of). The Milliner's Girl; or, The Adventures of Fanny Bilston. The History of Mary, the Maid of the Inn. The King of the Beggars; or, Bamfylde Moore Carew. The Life and Sea Battles of Commodore Paul Jones. The Affecting History of the Duchess of C——, who was confined nine years in a Horrid Dungeon under ground, where light never entered, by her inhuman Husband. The Life of David Hoggart, the Murderer. The Remarkable Life and Death of Doctor Faustus, relating the means adopted by him to Raise the Devil. The London Apprentice; or, The Melancholy History of George Barnwell, who was induced by an infamous Prostitute to Rob his Master and Murder his Uncle. Greenacre; or, The Edgeware Road Murder: a most circumstantial account of that most Sanguinary Outrage of the Laws of Humanity. Cook, the Murderer; or, The Leicester Tragedy: being a faithful account of the Horrible Assassination of John Paas. The Life of Wolfe, a notorious Robber and Murderer, and the Bird and Pigeon Fancier. 12 very curious Chap Books. Numerous characteristic Colored Plates. Crown 8vo, newly bound, half-morocco, gilt top. Derby, n. d. $6 50.

CHAP BOOKS (A Collection of). Containing The Comical Budget, The Richardson Songster, London Songster, The Whole Art of Legerdemain, Mother Shipton's Dream-Book, Baron Munchausen, Napoleon's Book of Fate, Valentine Writers, Domestic Cookery, Nixon's Prophecies, The Dreamer's Oracle, and the Original Norwood Gipsy. Numerous Colored Plates. 12mo, newly bound, half-morocco, gilt top. Derby, n. d. $6 50.

CRUIKSHANK. Queen Caroline. A Series of Caricatures illustrating the Attorney-General's Charges against Queen Caroline. 51 Plates. Oblong folio, newly bound, half-red morocco extra, gilt edges. London, n. d. $40.

The American Bibliopolist and Literary Register, and Monthly Catalogue of Old and New Books, and Repository of Notes and Queries. Subscription $1 per year; cheap paper, 36 cents per year, postage free.

Office, 84 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.

NEW ENGLANDER.

EDITORS:

George P. Fisher, Timothy Dwight, William L. Kingsley.

CONTENTS OF THE JULY NUMBER:

ART.

I. The Opening of the New Northwest. Burdett Hart.

II. Tai-Ping-Wang, and the Chinese Rebellion of 1853–1862. Rev. John E. Johnson.

III. Life in the Roman Catholic Church during the first French Revolution, as illustrated by the Memoirs of the Marquise de Montagu. William L. Kingsley.

IV. Evolutionism in Natural History as related to Christianity. Rev. James B. Tyler.

V. Mirabeau as a Statesman, in the light of the history of France during the last eighty years. Dr. H. von Holst.

VI. Yale College.—Some Thoughts Respecting its Future. Fourth Article. Prof. Timothy Dwight.

VII. Notices of New Books.

Price $4 a year. Single Numbers, $1.

Address, with orders,

AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY,
119 Nassau Street, New York, or
W. L. KINGSLEY, New Haven, Conn.

CASSELL'S POPULAR EDUCATOR.

COMPLETE IN SIX VOLUMES.

Price, $15.

"We have gone over its pages with sentiments of real wonder. We know no work like it. It has occupied and filled up a field of education vast and most important to the community."—Dublin University Magazine.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,
596 Broadway, New York.

LONDON BOOKS.

PRICED AND DESCRIPTIVE
CATALOGUE No. 26
OF Rare, Standard,
AND
Valuable English and Foreign Books, which we offer at very low prices, now ready, and will be sent, free of charge, to any address.

A. DENHAM & CO.,
IMPORTERS OF ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS,
17 Murray Street,
(Near Broadway), New York.
☞ NEW INVOICES OPENED EVERY WEEK.

The Labor Question is the most important question in the Political Economy of the United States.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE COOLIE:

HIS RIGHTS AND WRONGS.

By the Author of "GINX'S BABY."

12mo, 380 pages, paper cover, price 50 cts.; in extra cloth (on thicker paper), price $1 25.

"This edition of 'The Coolie' has been expressly prepared for American readers, and has been corrected by the author's own hands. The subject of it is only one branch of a wide and deeply interesting question—one likely to increase in interest with the expanding energies of the Anglo-Saxon race through British and American dominions....It is well that Americans and Englishmen should feel a common interest in all great questions of social polity or of philanthropic principle."—Extract from Preface to the American Edition.

☞ For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of price, by the Publishers,

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,
416 Broome Street, New York.

THE WORKS OF THE

Rt. Rev. Ashton Oxenden, D.D.,

Bishop of Montreal and Metropolitan of Canada.

My First Year in Canada. 16mo, cloth extra, $1. (Just ready.)

The Lord's Supper Simply Explained. 18mo, cloth, 40 cents.

The Christian Life. 12mo, cloth, $1.

The Pathway of Safety; or, Counsel to the Awakened. 12mo, cloth, $1.

Decision. 18mo, cloth, 60 cents.

Family Prayers for Four Weeks. 12mo, cloth, 90 cents.

Prayers for Private Use. 18mo, limp cloth, 40 cents.

Portraits from the Bible. Old Testament Series, containing twenty-three sketches of Bible Characters. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.

—— New Testament Series, containing thirty-four Sketches of Bible Characters, 12mo, cloth, $1 25.

Cottage Sermons; or, Plain Words to the Poor. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.

Cottage Readings. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.

Fervent Prayer. 18mo, cloth, 60 cents.

God's Message to the Poor. 18mo, cloth, 75 cents.

Short Lectures on the Sunday Gospels. Vol. I. Advent to Easter. 12mo, cloth, $1.

—— Vol. II. Easter to Advent. 12mo, cloth, $1.

The Home Beyond; or, A Happy Old Age. 12mo, cloth, 60 cents.

Words of Peace; or, The Blessings and Trials of Sickness. With Meditations, Prayers, and Hymns. 12mo, cloth, 60 cents.

Baptism Simply Explained. 18mo, limp cloth, 40 cts.

Our Church and Her Services. 18mo, cloth, $1.

Any book free by mail on recipt of advertised price.

POTT & AMERY,
Cooper Union, Fourth Avenue, New York.

ZELL'S

GREAT ATLAS OF THE WORLD

Is now being issued in parts at 50 cts. each, and will be completed in 25 Parts. Specimen Numbers 25 cts. each. Sent on receipt of price.

The maps of this Atlas are engraved on steel and printed in colors. Their artistic beauty and their correctness warrant the Publisher in saying that the Atlas will be unsurpassed by any yet issued.

ZELL'S POPULAR ENCYCLOPÆDIA

Is now complete and will be served to subscribers in Parts or Volumes. There are 59 Parts, or Two Royal Quarto Volumes.

Specimen Numbers of Encyclopædia, 10 cts.

T. ELLWOOD ZELL,
17 and 19 South Sixth St., Philadelphia.
5 Beekman Street, New York.

CHEGARAY INSTITUTE.

English and French for Young Ladies and Misses, Boarding and Day Pupils, 1527 and 1529 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Will reopen on Wednesday, Sept. 20. French is the language of the family, and is constantly spoken in the Institute.

MADAME D'HERVILLY, Principal.

DARTMOUTH HOME SCHOOL
FOR YOUNG LADIES.

Instruction given in all departments. Apply for Circulars to MISS L. J. SHERMAN, Principal,
HANOVER, N. H.

"AMER. SCHOOL INST."
FOUNDED 1855.

Is a reliable and practical Educational Bureau—
To aid those who want well-qualified Teachers;
To represent Teachers who seek positions;
To give parents information of good Schools;
To sell, rent, and exchange School properties.

Sixteen years have proved it efficient in securing "the right Teacher for the right place."

J. W. SCHERMERHORN, A.M., Actuary,
14 Bond Street, New York.

RIVERVIEW MILITARY ACADEMY,
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.

Location healthy; Scenery unequalled; Building convenient; Teachers highly educated, earnest, working men; System of Order unsurpassed. A wide-awake, thoroughgoing School for Boys wishing to be trained for Business, for College, or for West Point, or the Naval Academy. Address OTIS BISBEE, A.M., Principal and Proprietor.

FINE ART AGENCY.—MR. WILLIAM J. STILLMAN, London, England, begs to offer his services to Fine Art collectors and amateurs, for the purchasing of Pictures, Fine Art Publications, etc., etc., from any of the European Schools; and will either select from the works of designated artists or exercise his discretion in the expenditure of definite sums, guided by such indications of taste as purchasers shall give. He is also authorized to act as the agent of Morris & Co. (see the Nation for March 2, 1871, No. 296), and will superintend the execution of any commissions entrusted to them.

Refers by permission to Martin Brimmer, Esq., Charles C. Perkins, Esq., Boston; Le Grand Lockwood, Esq., E. L. Godkin, Esq., New York.

Terms made known on application to Mr. Stillman (address care of Baring Bros. & Co., London), or to his agent, W. P. GARRISON, Nation office, New York.

PRATT'S Astral OIL. No accidents have ever occurred from burning, storing or handling Pratt's Astral Oil. Over 100,000 families who continue to use it can testify to its perfect safety. It gives also a clear, soft, and beautiful light—unequalled even by gas.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JULY 13, 1871.

The Week.

Politics seem to be rather livelier in Massachusetts than anywhere else, though it is only among the politicians and editors that there is much stir as yet. Governor Claflin declines a renomination, an act which is said to mean that there are several gentlemen who wish to be governor, that the nomination of some of them would split the party, and that it has been decided that Mr. Claflin, who could be elected, shall withdraw, and that the split, if it is coming, shall be permitted to come this year. Our old acquaintance, General Butler, is understood to want the nomination, and probably he is as strong a candidate with the people as anybody else, for to the greater portion of the Republican vote he could add the vote of the Labor Reformers and what votes the Woman's Rights women could influence—such is esteemed to be the virtuousness of those ladies in political matters. But politics in Massachusetts have been so long in the hands of one party, that Massachusetts has a set of hack professional politicians between whom and the average voter the difference is much like that between a country mouse and an astute old stable-rat in the city, so, some candidate really weaker than Butler with the people, and not a particularly shining light morally either, may carry the convention. Doctor George B. Loring, for example, who is a professional office-seeker who has for years been painfully seeking the governorship, is said to be very determined not to be put off this time. His friend Butler is popularly believed to have robbed him of one or two nominations, and this time the Doctor will make an out-and-out fight. But it may be doubted if any convention can be made to believe him really a formidable personage, and if he may not be thrown aside unregarded as he was by Butler—a gentleman who knows when to be bold as well as he knows when not. Other candidates are plentiful, but no names of particular prominence are mentioned except Mr. Hoar's, which, in view of his recent services, would doubtless be a strong one; but probably the men inside politics could mention several things which, in spite of their fondness for him, compel them to think him unavailable. Mr. Phillips, we see, is out in favor of his friend Butler, and it might cheer the spirit of Doctor Loring if he would go over in his mind the times when Mr. Phillips was on the winning side, and of these see how many there were when he did not immediately set off and go into his own corner.

In Ohio, the leaders are trying to import some life into the contest, but it is hot, and everybody languishes. In September, however, there will be hard work, and it may reasonably be expected that the Republicans are going to carry the State, which is what they could hardly venture to hope two months ago. For one thing, the Ohio Democracy are open repudiators, and that alone ought to be the ruin of them. For another, it is by no means all of them who are pleased with "the new departure," and a great deal of the vitality and power of growth in that bantling of Mr. Vallandigham's were buried when he was, so that what hope there was of his serpent's swallowing up the others has in good part disappeared, and there is division in the Democratic ranks which will be felt at the polls. Then, too, there is a quarrel as to whether the candidate really got votes enough to nominate him, while the Republicans, on the other hand, escaped Mr. Ben Wade as a candidate—definitively, we trust, relegating that war-horse to grass, in spite of his announcement that he should deem himself false to his record if he could decline to obey the summons of the party—and escaped also a San Domingo plank in their platform, or rather declined outright to put one in. Those Republican journals, then, are probably right which are expecting a Republican success; but probably those are not so right which, we perceive, are already getting their mouths made up to announce the success as "an endorsement of the administration of President Grant." One good result, by the way, of a thorough civil service reform would be that there would be a stronger tendency to make State elections turn on State questions, and the attention of the people would be concentrated on their local office-holders, who would be called to a stricter account than at present. The general Government's means of interference now work harm in various ways, both in Washington and in every State capital.

The weighty question whether the President would pardon Bowen the bigamist has, we believe, at last been solved. He has pardoned him, on the ground that he acted in good faith; but no public explanation has yet been offered of the fraudulent divorce proceedings here and in Connecticut.

The Bowen bigamy having been got out of the way, the prominent Washington topic is the dispute between Mr. Boutwell and General Pleasanton—the latter, to make a long story short, denying the right of appeal to Mr. Boutwell from his decisions as Commissioner of Internal Revenue. They have come to loggerheads on other points, but this is the main question between them; and the beauty of the affair to the cynics is, that Mr. Boutwell is suffering now from the operation of a law made to exalt the Commissionership in power and dignity during the Johnson period, when Mr. Rollins held it, and the Secretary of the Treasury was suspected of heresy. The law gave nearly the whole control of the Internal Revenue collection to the Commissioner, and Mr. Boutwell, who was its most prominent supporter, forgot to get it repealed before he came into office. But the quarrel with General Pleasanton began when the latter came out against the income tax, and issued regulations for the assessment which went far to make its collection impossible, Mr. Boutwell being a firm supporter of it. The difficulty of settling the dispute lies in the fact that while the Commissioner has a very fair color of law on his side, and has a strong hold on the President's favor drawn from old military associations, the Secretary is rather too important an official to be lightly sacrificed, and has won a high reputation for honesty and fidelity, which ought not to be much to say of a financial minister, but, in the times in which we live, is a great deal. Mr. Boutwell has held enormous power over the money market ever since he took office, and the absence of all suspicion of abuse of it is certainly a strong testimony to his character.

The brutal assault on the Orange procession, in celebration of the Battle of the Boyne, which occurred last year in this city, and which the police made little effort to prevent, and for which nobody was punished, led to preparations on a great scale among the Orangemen to repeat the celebration this year, and to still more extensive preparations among the Catholic Irish for an attack on them. The result was that the city was for a full week in expectation of a bloody riot yesterday (Wednesday). The Orangemen called on the city authorities for protection, and the Catholics vowed that no protection should avail them; but the Catholics, for obvious reasons, carried their point, and forced Mayor Hall and the Superintendent of the Police into the unparalleled step of prohibiting the procession. The two documents—one a letter from the Mayor to the Grand Master of the Orange Association, and the other the general order of the Superintendent of Police—in which the reasons for not permitting the reception are given, are perhaps as amusing contributions as have yet been made to the literature of the municipality. Not that the reasons are not all good; they are those which have made the best Irishmen for the last seventy years look on the Orange societies as curses to Ireland, and which have led to the statutory prohibition of these processions in Ireland, after years of violence and bloodshed; and no candid and disinterested person can gainsay their force. But coming from Mayor Hall and Superintendent Kelso, who are well known to be simply obeying the orders of the Irish Catholic mob, represented in the Ring by two of its prominent members, they have a very ludicrous sound, particularly as the same authorities saw no objection to Fenian processions, which were highly offensive to thousands, or the great German procession, which celebrated a triumph in war to the last degree humiliating to another portion of the American population. This open surrender of the city authorities to a lawless and bloodthirsty mob, involving as it did the establishment of a precedent which would make all processions dependent on the will of the majority for the time being, and put into the hands of the Mayor the power of deciding what events it was proper for American citizens to celebrate by parade, was too much even for the New York public; it was too much even for Governor Hoffman, and at last roused in him the old American Adam, which seems to have been sleeping a good deal of late. So he came to New York, revoked the Superintendent's order, issued a proclamation announcing his intention to protect the Orangemen at all hazards, and put the troops under arms, and at this writing stands ready to open a passage for the procession at the point of the bayonet.

We are, of course, heartily glad that the city has been saved from the disgrace which the Mayor and his confederates were about to inflict on it, and glad, too, that the followers of the Ring are about to receive a lesson in toleration; but this does not prevent us regretting deeply that this affair has ever occurred, because it marks, we fear, the formal transfer to American soil of one of the most ferocious, baleful quarrels of the Old World. We shall now have to prepare for a battle in the streets every Twelfth of July, and even if the law be every year successfully enforced—which is at least doubtful—the hates and antagonisms which these processions breed will burn through the rest of the year, and lead to many an outrage. The persons who parade in honor of St. Patrick in this city every year have certainly not as yet established many claims to the sympathy or respect of the American public, and get very little of either; but it ought not to be forgotten, in comparing the St. Patrick's procession with the Orange one, that St. Patrick was a Christian missionary and civilizer, and that a tribute to his memory does not and ought not to rouse any bitterness or animosity in the mind of any rational man. His name is associated with nothing but peace and good-will. The Battle of the Boyne, on the other hand, though it established civil and religious liberty on a firm basis in England, and was, therefore, one of the most important battles in history—pace the historians of the City Hall—was for the Irish the beginning of a period of almost unparalleled misery and oppression, and established among them a system of class-rule which it is no exaggeration to call devilish, and which came to an end only at the time of the American Revolution. That the Irish Catholics should therefore still remember it with hate and rage, and should see in a public celebration of it a kind of open rejoicing over their sorrow and degradation, and that the spectacle of such a celebration should rouse the more ignorant and degraded of them into blood and fury, is nothing wonderful. Orangemen profess to be very pious and great Bible-readers, and are, we believe, on the whole, a highly respectable and intelligent body of men. It may not, therefore, be useless to suggest to them, that now that their rights have been vindicated, the most creditable thing they could do for their order and for Protestantism would be to go in procession no more.

The City Ring has done a pretty good stroke of business during the week in procuring the publication of an apology for them in the New York Evangelist, the highly respectable organ of the Presbyterian body. Nobody who knows anything of the editor will doubt that he published it in perfect good faith, but it was nevertheless an act of singular indiscretion. It was the result, we learn, of an evening's conversation in his own house with Judge Hilton, whom the Evangelist pronounces a good man, but who, good or bad, has shown remarkable facility during the last two or three years in acting with some outrageously and notoriously bad men, and from whom, therefore, it would be absurd to expect a fair statement of the condition of the city government under the Ring in an evening's chat. There arecertain facts about the Ring which admit of no denial. As, for example, that its members have grown enormously rich in a very few years without being engaged in any legitimate business calculated to bring in large returns; that various misappropriations of large sums of public money and jobs have been proved against them; that large sums of money which pass into their hands have disappeared and have not been accounted for; that they for two years persisted in refusing to publish any accounts whatever; that they corrupt the legislature of this State and two of its judges. It is no answer to these charges to say that the city government is improving in their hands, that our parks are better kept, or our streets better paved. That might satisfy a French atheist or a Roman pagan, it ought not to satisfy "professing Christians" in America. It is not enough for us that the government is efficient—we have to see if we can that it is pure, that honest men administer it, and that neither its honors nor profits go to knaves, or ruffians, or whoremongers. Civilization demands this of us, and we owe it above all to the next generation not to give up trying for it, however wearisome the task may be. We may be thankful that Tweed and Sweeny are no worse, but we cannot afford to pardon them for being so bad. Such men cannot be forgiven, no matter how the parks are kept, if we mean to keep up the semblance of a moral standard in politics. Of course, we understand many good people's being weary of the denunciation of the Ring kept up by the New York Times, but then we do not see how moral, much less religious, men can find fault with that paper on any other grounds than those of taste or policy. We think, for our own part, the persistence and pluck it has shown have been deserving of the highest praise, and if anybody finds its iteration tiresome, it is the theme which is to blame. The one good and all-sufficient reason for denouncing the Ring every day is that the Ring is every day appropriating the public money, or debauching the public conscience. We used ourselves, in like manner, to be frequently requested to let Butler alone, at a time when Butler was every day trying some new trick in Congress, or making some effort to demoralize the public out-of-doors.

There came near being a very ugly tussle between the Times and Tribune last week—so near, indeed, that people began to put up their shutters and call the children in from the street, the cause being that old and delicate one of "free love," which seems of late to have a more irritating effect on the newspaper mind than anything in the whole range of "topics." It began with Mrs. Paulina Davis, who writes flowery letters in the Tribune, showing that, when a wife does not like her husband, she ought to have the privilege of leaving him and trying another; to which the Tribune very naturally replied that this was "free love," and that, when a woman made a mistake with one husband, there was no reason why she should not make a mistake with the second, and so on, and pointed out the obvious conclusion that under this system there was good ground for fearing that large numbers of women would go on trying new men all their lives, without ever finding their soul's darling—that is, that we should have under it no addition whatever to the happiness of society, and a very considerable addition to its filth. It also pointed to the murder in Newark of the late distinguished statesman, "Pet" Halsted, and the numerous murders of Mrs. Sherman of Connecticut, as illustrations of the consequences of indulgence of lawless desires. Whereupon the Times remarked that this was very surprising language to come from that quarter, and the Tribune immediately began to take off its coat and cravat, and there was for a few minutes prospect of bloody work.

Business is even duller than is usual at this season of the year. Under the influence of large receipts here and lower prices in Europe, breadstuffs have declined, although the principal European crops are reported unpromising. Cotton has further advanced on the accumulating evidence of a largely increased consumption, but the weather has been more favorable for the growing crop. Meats are firm at the prevailing low prices, dry-goods are dull, coal unexpectedly firm, and real estate stagnant. Exports are light, and the foreign exchanges were consequently strong, with an advancing gold premium, until the close of the week. But the extraordinary success of the French loan had the effect to stimulate to a great degree all the financial markets of Europe, a very marked demand for American bonds resulted, leading to large shipments, with a consequent decline in exchange and a moderate reaction in gold. Later on, rumors of a sudden and unexpected success in the attempt to place our new five per cent. bonds abroad were generally circulated, then denied, and finally again reported as confirmed, the negotiation being reported as made through the London house of Jay Cooke & Co. The financial markets are all more or less affected by these rumors and reports, which, in view of the general buoyancy of the money market abroad, are entirely probable. The new French loan is quoted at a premium, and the old Rentes have advanced to 56, which is the highest point touched since the first reverses of the Empire. The discovery that the coin reserve and securities of the Bank of France as well as of many other financial institutions remained entirely untouched by the Commune, despite reports to the contrary, has contributed materially to the revival of confidence and activity in France and throughout Europe, but there are many minor indications that the seeming prosperity is in many instances fictitious and artificial.

There is some alarm in England over the fact that the Council of the International Society have marked out England as the country in which their great experiment on modern society can be most effectively tried first, as the country in which "the capitalist power—labor combined on a great scale under master capitalists—has gained possession of the whole process of production," and the only country where "every change in the economic facts will immediately react on the whole world." In short, "the English have every material condition for the social revolution; what they have not, is the generalizing spirit and the revolutionary passion." The Council decides, therefore, that while England is a good place in which to set the work on foot, it ought on no account, owing to the moral defects of the Englishman, "be allowed to fall into purely English hands." In other words, the Assys, Dombrowskis, and Cluserets are to be brought over to manage it. This prospect of the Commune say in London or Liverpool, worked by the statesmen who superintended the institution in Paris, has apparently alarmed some of the "educated men" who were apologizing for its doings, a month or two ago. The Spectator has a strong appeal to the English workingmen not to be led astray, and Professor Beesly writes to the London Times trying to "hedge" a little. He says that the account given by a "distinguished Positivist," some time ago (whom we have reason to believe was M. Littré), of the aims and creed of the Communists, was not authoritative. Its correctness, however, is not denied, and indeed the address of the Council, from which we have made extracts elsewhere, confirms it in every particular. We have more than once cited it in the Nation. Anybody who has read it, or read any statement of the objects of the Commune emanating from anybody connected with it, must have been amused by the accounts given of these objects to the American public by Messrs. Wendell Phillips and B. F. Butler. The New York Times made an attempt to drive Mr. Phillips into a corner by publishing in parallel columns what Mr. Phillips says about the Commune and what the Commune says about itself, which, however, only shows that the Times did not know its man. What would it say if Mr. Phillips were to inform it that all the Communists knew about the Commune they had learned from him?

Concerning the French elections of July 2, the Cable has left us in considerable darkness, the reports continuing contradictory both as to the number and the political complexion of the candidates elected. The first classification spoke of "120 Republicans, 8 Legitimists, and 12 Bonapartists;" the next of "86 for Thiers, 13 Radicals, 2 Legitimists, 3 Orleanists, and 1 Bonapartist"; then we hear that "the elections have increased the majority of the supporters of President Thiers in the Assembly by fully 100"; and, finally, that the election of M. Moreau "increases the Republican delegation from the capital to 7"—though Paris elected 26 representatives. Thus much, however, is certain, that the aggregate of the elections is generally felt and admitted in France to have been a great victory for both Thiers and the Republic, though not all Thiersites elected are Republicans, and not all Republicans supporters of Thiers. Both Legitimists and Bonapartists have suffered a crushing defeat; more or less secretly, however, they console themselves with the thought that their Republican antagonists, who are now masters of the field, will soon manage to compromise their new position by excesses and errors—a speculation which derives only too much support from the history of the past.

The Comte de Chambord has hastily acknowledged the utter rout of his supporters—though not of his hopes—by announcing that he is not going to avail himself of the recent abrogation of the proscription laws for taking his abode in the country of his birth and royal ancestors, for fear that his presence in it might give countenance to agitation. He is to wait until France will call him not only to her bosom but to her throne, and then, he adds, "we shall found a government with decentralization, liberty, and universal suffrage as our mottoes." These are sound mottoes, and somewhat different from some enunciations lately made by the same august personage when the royalist tide seemed to be irresistible. He continues, however, to praise the army, though the vote of the army in the supplementary elections may have contributed more than anything else to cast dismay into the ranks of the Bourbonists, and into the heart of their future Henry V., who had tried so hard to cajole MacMahon into playing the part of Monk. That vote is reported as overwhelmingly Republican, and to have been cast for lists of candidates "all headed with the name of Gambetta," which, if true, is of rather evil omen for the future of France, as it signifies the desire of the army either for a dictatorship or for war. Gambetta himself, however, is stated to counsel moderation, and the doings of the National Assembly show that it sees in the elections not the triumph of Gambetta, but of Thiers. The old statesman's principal care is to pay the indemnity, get rid of the Germans, and pacify France. He is reported to have discharged half of the Commune prisoners. His attitude towards foreign powers, Germany and Italy not excluded, is friendly. One of the great difficulties within is the question of the unpaid Paris house-rents.

There is a fierce conflict going on in France over the income-tax, which the free-traders of the agricultural and wine-growing districts clamor for, as a good substitute for the protective duties with which M. Pouyer-Quertier threatens them, and which they, having tasted the sweets of free-trade, dread. The protectionists are strongly opposed to the tax on the ground that it would be a tax on a class, and therefore odious and dangerous, and would yield little, the great mass of French incomes being so small, and would lead to an enormous amount of fraud and evasion, Frenchmen thinking it no great harm to cheat the government. The result will probably be a compromise, as M. Pouyer-Quertier will probably find it impossible to carry out the protectionist programme as it now stands, involving a rise of about 300 per cent. in the customs duties.

The German celebrations of victory and peace are over, or nearly over. There were, on a number of days, grand displays, rejoicings, and thanksgivings throughout the new Empire, both north and south of the Main. The city of Hanover, which five years ago was deprived by Prussia of its dignity as the residence of a sovereign king, seems alone of all the great cities of the Empire to have given vent to its feelings of disaffection towards the triumphant Hohenzollern, by refusing to vote the sum required for a celebration—an act of discord which has caused much comment of an unpleasant character. The ultramontanes of various parts of Germany added to the mortification thus inflicted on the more passionate unionists by not only celebrating on the days of the triumphal entry and thanksgiving at Berlin—July 16 and July 18—the coinciding twenty-fifth anniversaries of the election and see-taking of Pope Pius IX., but also boasting that the jubilations in honor of the Catholic Pontiff surpassed those performed for the glorification of the Protestant Emperor. Things, however, passed off quietly everywhere, and Germany is gradually subsiding into real peace and unity. Annexation proclivities here and there continue to be manifested, some self-constituted leaders of public opinion demanding the incorporation of the German provinces of Austria, others the deliverance of the Germans in the Baltic provinces of Russia, and still others the occupation of the Island of Heligoland; but these reckless counsels are scouted by the better sense of the nation, as either premature, adventurous, or flagrantly unjust.

THE GREAT LAND QUESTION.

The growing indifference on the part of the great body of the people in Europe to political questions, as distinguished from social questions, is aggravated in England by the difficulty of the land question, which is both social and political, and on the whole, perhaps, more social than political. It is not denied that the constitution of society is everywhere more or less dependent on the way in which the land of the country is held. If a few persons hold it, they will almost inevitably form an aristocracy, and exercise an amount of social and political influence such as no other species of property of equal value would give them. If the majority are landholders, they will form a democracy, and the existence of a small privileged or influential class, let it be never so wealthy, will be difficult or impossible. This well-known influence of the distribution of land on politics and society is in England strengthened by the traditions of a thousand years. The national character itself has worked in its favor. There is something in the unprogressiveness and permanence, and the having-and-holding character of this kind of property, which is grateful to ninety-nine Englishmen out of a hundred, in spite of the bold spirit of speculation displayed in English commercial history. All English speculators, however, from the Conquest down, whether they fought or traded, did so with a view to owning land, and surrounding their names with the fixity of land. The result has been, however, that the soil on which over 30,000,000 of people live has worked itself gradually into the hands of 30,000 proprietors, and the tendency in the same direction continues as strong as ever. Whichever way English reformers turn, therefore, they find themselves face to face with the land question. The process of democratization cannot be carried much if any farther than it has gone, unless the great estates can be broken up, or, at all events, an end be put to their agglomeration. But how is either of these things to be done without attacking the very principle of property, which moderate reformers are just now very anxious about, and feel to be seriously imperilled by the assaults of a much less scrupulous enemy?

There was a time when it was the fashion of platform agitators to say that all that was needed was to abolish primogeniture; but it has now become generally known that you might abolish primogeniture without seriously affecting the size of English estates in five centuries. The death of an owner of real estate in England without having made a will, and having regulated the descent of his property by a settlement, is a very rare occurrence—so rare that it might for all practical purposes be said to be unknown, and it is only in cases of intestacy that the law of primogeniture operates. The law might, as in France, interfere with the right of testamentary disposition, but this would be evaded by "settlements," such as are now made between father and son, and to interfere with these open proclamation has to be made of the theory that there is a distinction between real and personal property, which requires that the transmission, transfer, and tenure of the one should be regulated in a different manner from those of the other. This is the theory, however, which the English Tories have held and legislated on for centuries, and, what is more to the purpose, it is the theory against which the English Radicals have always fought. The latter have invariably contended that the sale or descent of a piece of ground should be as easy as that of a sheep, and the formalities no greater or more expensive than might be necessary to provide proper evidence of title. This view, however, the Conservatives have of late shown a suspicious willingness to accept, and the Radicals have begun to find out that, even if they got it embodied in legislation, the absorption of the small holdings would probably go on as rapidly as ever, for the simple reason that, owing to the eager competition for land among persons who have made large fortunes in trade, the price of land all over England is what dealers call "a fancy price"—that is, a price which men pay for a luxury, and which makes the usual return on capital impossible. No man buys an estate in England nowadays with the view of making money out of it. He buys it with the view of "founding a family," and giving himself social consideration, and amusing himself. The buyers of land, therefore, are always in the market, offering prices which no holder who is dependent on his land for his living can well afford to refuse, and which in practice few men of the farming and yeomanry class, in these days of speculation, emigration, and travel, think of refusing. The process which is going on all over England is, in short, the one which everybody is familiar with in the neighborhood of our great cities in this country, where land has come into demand for "country seats," and, therefore, risen ten or twenty times above its value for farming purposes. In other words, poor men cannot afford to own land. The evils of this state of things are now a subject of daily comment. The separation of the great body of the people from the soil, and the stripping of the land of all sentimental association with the national life, and its reduction to the character of an instrument of production simply, and the diminution to a mere handful of the number of those who can be said to have any real interest in the defense of property against the disorganizing theories which are gaining currency among the inhabitants of the great cities, are matters which begin to excite serious apprehension amongst all who have anything to lose. France, whenever the devil of socialism is let loose in her great cities, is able at once to meet him, and, if need be, to crush him with millions of peasant proprietors. But what could thirty thousand "noblemen and gentlemen," who now constitute "the landed interest" of England, do if the landless majority were to become hostile to, or even indifferent about, their rights? It is not the Radicals only, therefore, whom the present state of things is alarming. Conservatives, too, begin to see its dangers.

How is such a division of the soil as exists in France—supposing it to be desirable—to be brought about? It has in France been the result of three things—the general impoverishment of the noblesse, through their extravagance and exclusion from trade and from intermarriage with the commercial class before the Revolution; the confiscation and sale of noble and church estates during the Revolution; and the abolition of the freedom of testamentary disposition made by the Revolution. When we consider what all these things mean, and what an extraordinary combination of circumstances has been needed to produce them, it will be seen that even if the condition of landed property in France were never so desirable, it would be no easy matter to introduce it into any other country. To introduce it into England would require a far greater upturning than has ever taken place in France.

Supposing it were introduced, however, and supposing it to be desirable, would it be possible to maintain it without a great change in the Anglo-Saxon character and in the Anglo-Saxon philosophy of life? There is one fact in the social condition of both England and America which has to be seriously considered by anybody who undertakes to regulate the distribution of landed property in either of them, and that is the growing indisposition of the people to play the part of small farmers, and their increasing eagerness for town life and increasing restiveness under the solitude and monotony of country life. The French peasant's love of land and the tenacity with which he clings to and labors on the minutest portion of the soil, are in a large degree the result of his ignorance and want of enterprise. If he were educated and his horizon enlarged, and the spirit of speculation or desire to "get on," which devours Anglo-Saxon societies like a fever, were once to take possession of him, we should assuredly hear no more of the extreme division of the soil in France. It is safe to say that wherever the peasants are educated, or, in other words, wherever the farming-class is ceasing to be peasantry, the alienation from farming life, which is so marked a feature of American society, has sprung up or will spring up. The soil of England might, therefore, be parcelled out among farm laborers to-morrow, but if their sons went to the district schools and got a knowledge of strange places, and a hankering after the easy gains of trade, and the clean life of the store, the probabilities are very strong that they would be found disposing of their patrimony or abandoning it as eagerly as the sons of farmers in New York or Ohio. The truth is that the railroad, the telegraph, and the newspaper have taken the magic out of freeholds. The process of the concentration of land in few hands does not go on here because, in the first place, no man can here get either income or social consideration out of the holding of larger tracts of farming land than he can himself cultivate, and, in the second place, because Europe is steadily supplying a class who are still in the peasant condition of mind and body, to take the place of the natives who are abandoning agriculture. We consequently do not need to trouble ourselves about the matter from a political point of view, and probably shall never have to do so; but one does not need to be very perspicacious to see that the problem, how to make country life attractive, which occupies social philosophers so much in the United States already, lies at the root of the land difficulty in England—far below the question of primogeniture or of testamentary disposition. To keep land divided in the way which seems most desirable in a healthy society, and at the same time make the farmer something better than a peasant, we must in some way make life on the farm more attractive than it is now. It is easy enough to provide that every man's real estate shall be divided equally among his children at his death, or that no man shall rent land to be cultivated by another, or even that no man shall own more than a certain quantity; but one certain result of this would be to make land a very undesirable species of property which few would wish to hold, and a likely result would be that nobody would live on it or cultivate it, except a class very inferior in intelligence and character to the rest of the community; and we should thus create and perpetuate the odious distinction between the town and the country population which has converted unhappy France into two mutually hostile nations.

Mr. J. S. Mill and others have organized an association to deal with the land question, and they have begun operations by a blow at the rich landholders, which is based on Mr. Mill's theory, that as land, being limited in quantity, and the source of subsistence, really belongs —and ought to belong—to the state, and as in England and all other countries whose law has a feudal foundation it legally belongs to the state also, the state is entitled to all the increased value which the land in the hands of private holders may have received from the increase of population and the rise of great towns and so on. He would not give this rule a retroactive character: that is, he would let those whose land has risen in value up to this date pocket their gains, but he would keep a watch on "the rise in real estate" hereafter, and see that the state, and the state only, profited by it. Whatever the abstract merits of this scheme may be, it may be safely said of it, as of many other schemes of reform now before the world, that they would probably answer the expectations of their authors in a society composed of philosophers or highly educated, far-seeing, and self-controlled people—that is, such a society as does not now exist and is not likely to exist for many generations; and that you cannot at the present day fling such a plan into the political arena of any community with the least expectation of seeing it carried out with the reserves and qualifications and restrictions necessary to prevent its degenerating into wholesale robbery. Let us add that we doubt whether it would have been seriously propounded in any country in which land had not been looked upon, as it has in England for centuries, as a possession of peculiar sanctity and dignity, totally unlike any other possession known to civilization. If such a theory as Mr. Mill's were gravely taken up by such a body of legislators as the great cities in Europe, for instance, would be likely to elect, or by such a body of legislators as some constituencies in America do already elect, the chances that they would confine themselves to confiscating the increase in the value of the landed property would be amusingly small. Fancy the Parisian Commune, for instance, or the New York Legislature solemnly restraining themselves within the limits of the distinction drawn by Mr. Mill between realty and personalty, and, while taking away Mr. Astor's gains from the rise in the value of his unimproved lots, letting Mr. Moses Taylor, or Mr. Stewart, or Mr. Dodge pocket the value of the rise in his bank stock, or railroad stock, or steamboat stock, or in his mining stock, or oyster-beds, or stock-in-trade, which could be ascribed to the general growth of the community in wealth and numbers. In fact, if any such idea were seriously taken up in our time, there is not one of us who would not every year be called upon to hand over to a pack of political knaves every cent which he could not show to have been the product of his personal labor; that we have no right to anything else is a doctrine already preached by one branch of the "Labor Reformers."

"RADICALS" AND "CONSERVATIVES."

Radicalism has of late been bringing good people into such strange places and queer company that many have begun to ask, in some alarm, whether one must really give up one's interest in reform, and one's desire to promote it, through fear of falling into or helping the excesses to which attempts at reform have in some cases led. Are they to give up all effort to settle the labor question, through fear of communism; all efforts to improve the condition of woman, through fear of "free love"; all efforts to abate intemperance, through fear of the trickery and unreason of prohibition? Just now, owing to events which are present in everybody's mind, this halting mood is more than usually widespread. Many persons who have been Radicals all their lives are in doubt whether to be Radical any longer; but at the same time have such a traditional horror of standing still, that they shudder at the thought of bringing on themselves the name of "Conservatives."

To all these doubters we think we can offer one or two consolatory suggestions, and suggestions that may possibly be useful in other ways than consolation. To those of the younger generation all over the country, and their number is very large, who have entered on their careers since the questions by which the last generation was most fiercely agitated were laid at rest, and who, while sincerely anxious to serve their kind, hesitate about the banner under which they should enrol themselves, we take the liberty of saying that there is no more necessity for calling themselves either Radicals or Conservatives than Guelfs, or Ghibellines, or Whigs, or Tories, or Federalists, or Democrats, Legitimists or Republicans, and for the simple reason that, in politics and sociology, the great question has ceased to be, Shall we stand where we are, or go forward? The question which now occupies men's minds is, What is the next best thing to do? In other words, none, or next to none, now maintain that things are best as they are; all admit that change may be a good thing, and that change is inevitable; the differences in our time are about the changes which it is best to try to hasten by active efforts, and the changes which it is best to leave to their natural course. There are, of course, old Conservatives who do not understand this, and who go about armed cap-à-pie, looking for Radicals, and who, expecting to find them murdering children and gutting houses, are surprised to find them teaching schools and nursing in hospitals; so also, there are old Radicals who are always collecting the power of the country to help them to root Conservatives out of their feudal strongholds, and are surprised to find them living in frame houses, and playing on pianos, or reading penny papers. But these eccentricities are the traditions of a period when Conservatives had no scruple in saying that they liked the world as it was because they got a good deal out of it, and when Radicals were so exasperated by this that they elevated mere assault and destruction into a mission.

There is no occasion any longer to belong to either faction, because there has come over the world a sense, which is none the less strong for not always finding expression or recognition, that the affairs of men in society are to a large extent the subjects of scientific adjustment, and in fact cannot be adjusted in any way but scientifically, and that though the "enthusiasm of humanity" may often be necessary to keep the machinery in motion, in the construction and arrangement of it something totally different from enthusiasm is necessary. When we say this, nobody need fancy that we are trying to administer a dose of Positivism in disguise; we are only saying what every thinking man, no matter what his views about the freedom of the will may be, acknowledges to be true. No opinions about the rightfulness or wrongfulness of the sale and manufacture of whiskey, for instance, affect a rational man's recognition of the fact that there is a point beyond which a tax on whiskey cannot be raised; and no opinions about the final cause of disease ever shut any intelligent person's eyes to the fact that cholera is controllable or preventible by certain sanitary precautions. We might multiply these illustrations indefinitely if it were necessary. What they would all show would be the fact that science has taken firm hold of society, and although we may not say, or believe, that the laws of human society will ever be discovered, or that there is not a wide margin reserved to individual freedom, the perfecting of the social arrangements is now, and must become more and more every day, the result of the careful collection, arrangement, and skilful comparison of facts and of the study of human character.

When we say this we suggest some curious reflections as to the precise status of the Radical as we all know him, and as many of us love and respect him. If a gentleman should present himself to Professor W. D. Whitney with his cravat off and his hair streaming in the wind, and tell him that he was utterly disgusted with the received theories about the origin and structure of language, that nothing good had ever come of them, and that he was going to war against them perpetually till he had overturned them and established new ones, and he were to confess on examination that he had never studied language, that he knew nothing of any tongue but his own, and did not understand the grammar of that, and that he had the merest smattering of ethnology, the Professor would certainly think he was either a very impudent or crazy person, and would waste but little time on him. Or if another was to visit Professor Peirce, and denounce astronomy as now taught, and vow never to rest till he had worked out a new and very superior solar system of his own, and were then to acknowledge that he was totally ignorant of mathematics and chemistry, or of the history of astronomy, and meant to remain so, the Professor would in like manner drive him off as a bore or fool. But a very large proportion of the Radicals of the day are really conducting themselves with absurdity almost as great over a subject even more recondite than language or astronomy. There is nothing deeper hidden than the springs of human action, and yet all our legislation and social arrangements have to be based on the imperfect glimpses we have got of them here and there through many ages.

The road before the reformer of to-day is, in fact, plainer than ever it was. His one duty is to find out things. His father was occupied in assailing monstrous and palpable evils, and getting the government into the hands of the many; the son has no such duty. He has no abuse of any magnitude to attack which is maintained by the few for their own comfort. His work is to adjust the relations of the individuals of the great crowd to each other, so that they may be enabled to lead a quiet, and comfortable, and free life. There is no need, therefore, of his hiring himself out to a "cause," or taking service under a banner, or calling himself either a Preserver or an Uprooter. He will preserve or uproot just as seems best, and without fancying that there is any more merit in one kind of work than in the other, or that it is a peculiarly noble thing to keep continually putting down plants and sowing seeds which he has no reasonable ground for believing to be suited either to the climate or soil. He will not, in order to give the laborer a better chance in life, spend his days howling against capitalist greed; nor, in order to elevate women in the social sphere, devote himself to denouncing men and marriage; nor, by way of promoting municipal independence, apologize for the burning of cities.

If it would not be travelling out of our domain, we should venture to suggest an application of what we are here saying to our esteemed and active friend, the Religious Radical, who just now hardly ever passes a night in his bed, and discovers a new object of adoration every week, and, if he can only get people to worship his god, will reciprocate the politeness by worshipping any other well-endorsed deity that is presented to him. It is apparently the opinion of this gentleman that some prodigious gain will result to mankind by having the greatest possible number of people lay before the world and work into each other's brains the greatest possible variety of odds and ends of religious ideas, and the amount of activity expended in this way by men and women whose speculations even on mean or simple subjects are of little value, and whose speculations on time, space, and eternity are absolutely worthless, is one of the most curious phenomena of the day. Now, what we would say on this point to any young man who is starting in life with the desire of either making the world better or promoting his own culture, is that, considered from the social standpoint, religion is of little or no interest or importance, except in so far as it promotes right living. Religious opinions which purify and elevate character, promote truthfulness, justice, temperance, and chastity, and brotherly kindness, or, in other words, supply springs of action, are infinitely valuable; religious opinions which do nothing more than help debating clubs to chop logic, and give people who have not learned how to think something to sharpen their wits over, and which a man may hold and proclaim daily without leaving off lying, or distorting, or slandering, or cheating, or stealing, are things with which nobody who wants to keep his brain clear, healthy, and strong, and his moral perceptions in good working order, will have anything to say to. They are to the mind what tippling is to the body.

ENGLAND.—BROUGHAM—GROTE—THE BALLOT IN IRELAND.

LONDON, June 23, 1871.

I HAVE just been reading the second volume of Lord Brougham's autobiography. Though the book is rather disappointing on the whole, it contains some letters and anecdotes curiously illustrative of the history of his time. The Brougham of the middle of this century was a very feeble and rather querulous old gentleman, with an undignified appetite for applause, and too great a reluctance to retire from the stage when his powers were failing. The amazingly strong constitution with which he, like most great lawyers, was gifted, seemed to have preserved his passion for notoriety after the comparative eclipse of his intellectual faculties. Yet he was interesting as the representative of a past generation. It was pleasant to see the mainstay of the old Edinburgh Review, the advocate of Queen Caroline, the energetic popular orator, the successful lawyer, who, as his chief rival remarked, if he had only known a little law would have known a little of everything. That was a singularly happy description; and I think that anybody who turns to Lord Brougham's writings in the hopes of learning much from them will be disposed to admit that he scarcely escaped the ordinary fate of those who aim at omniscience. His works are generally flimsy and pretentious. The present book, written in his old age, shows some singular symptoms of senility, as, for example, he transcribes a whole story of Voltaire's as written (doubtless it was translated) by himself at the age of thirteen; and he quotes a letter of George II., written to the Frederick who "was alive and is dead," as written by George III. to George IV. some sixty years later. Still, as the book is composed in great part of letters written during the first years of the century, when he was in his full vigor, it includes some valuable materials. The greatest triumph of Brougham's life was the defence of Queen Caroline. His eloquence on that occasion has been often celebrated, and is noticed with pardonable pride in this book. The position of the royal family is altered since those days. It is in no danger of any such disgraceful scandals, and, at the same time, it is far from exciting the same amount of loyalty by its virtues. The monarchy in its present form could scarcely stand such an exposure. It is bound to be respectable, on penalty of ceasing to exist, except, indeed, that one sometimes wonders whether a little more originality—even if it took a direction not strictly virtuous—might not be more popular than monotonous decency. It would be almost impertinent to speak of the merits of our present sovereign, for it seems like complimenting a lady in a private station for not outraging domestic proprieties. The Prince of Wales, in spite of certain scandalous stories, which have now pretty well died out, is admitted to be a very harmless, if not at all a brilliant, young man. His worst crime is that he patronizes the disgraceful sport of pigeon-shooting, which is unfortunately popular with our aristocracy, and some rather shrewd remarks have been made upon our distinguished legislators, who cease for a time from the labor of obstructing all business in Parliament to spend days in knocking over wretched birds in a garden. However frivolous and cruel the sport may be, it can hardly be considered as a heavy crime in the Prince not to be in advance of the sentiment which prevails in his class. And, on the whole, there is little enough in a positive way to be said against any of the family. How long this negative recommendation and the conservative disposition of Englishmen may keep the monarchy in its present position it would be hard to prophesy, but it may safely be said that just now the ordinary tone of mind is made up of absolute indifference and the certain stolid dislike to the risk and bother of a change. It is the state of mind of a husband who has discovered that his wife is silly and a bore, but feels that a separation would be more trouble than it is worth.

Another veteran author has just left us. Mr. Grote died a few days ago, and his services to English literature are beyond any panegyric that I can pronounce. His name was one which we quoted with justifiable pride when foreigners, and especially Germans, declared that we were unable to rival them in thoroughgoing research and intelligent criticism. In other ways he was a man of mark. He was identified with the London University from its origin to the present stage of its history. That body was originally designed as an unsectarian counterpoise to the strictly orthodox universities of Oxford and Cambridge. It has been unable fairly to rival them, as wanting both their old prestige and rich endowments, and now that, after a contest of many years, they have at length been freed, or nearly freed, from their subjection to the state church, the existence of a secular university will not be so much wanted. Still, the London University has in its way done much for education, and it has supported a number of able professors, and has enabled people of scanty means to obtain degrees and get a fair amount of instruction at a moderate rate. Almost a generation ago, Mr. Grote was conspicuous as a chief member of the school of philosophical radicals, in company with such men as Mr. Mill and Sir W. Molesworth. Their direct services to the cause of liberalism were undoubtedly great, and they have done still more in influencing the general tone of thought throughout the country. Mr. Mill is the only one left who still takes part in active politics. He differed from Mr. Grote on the particular doctrine—or, shall I call it crotchet?—with which the name of the historian is chiefly associated. It has generally been considered as a weakness of the school in question, but they were inclined to attribute an exaggerated value to mere changes of political machinery. Mr. Grote entertained expectations of the moral effect to be produced by the adoption of secret voting which to most people seem exaggerated. Perhaps he was prejudiced in favor of this plan by its classical associations. And now, by a curious coincidence, just as he has passed away from us, the Ballot Bill, so long despised and rejected, has become the chief measure of the Liberal Government for the session. The Army Bill has been mutilated and reduced to a simple measure for the abolition of purchase. Almost all the other bills introduced with so much confidence at the beginning of the session have been thrown out, and Government is bringing its whole influence to bear in favor of the Ballot Bill, in order that the session may not be described as utterly barren and wasted. The radical wing of the party will, of course, be gratified by this adoption of one of the favorite points in their programme. Most other people, I think, regard the change without any lively anticipations of a great social regeneration from its adoption. I confess that, for my own part, I am not specially enthusiastic about it, and I have very little belief that it will materially alter the balance of parties in England and Scotland. Corruption, so far as it consists in actually giving money to voters, will be a little more difficult to carry out, and a little more difficult to detect. The influence of money will, of course, not be really diminished, whether its diminution be desirable or not. Intimidation may be discouraged, and we would readily give a good deal to put a stop to such a detestable practice, though I rather doubt whether secret voting affords precisely the best means of doing it. There is, however, another result with which we are threatened by the Conservative party, the importance of which might be incalculably greater. Though few reasonable men, as I have said, expect any great change in England or Scotland, the conditions in Ireland are extremely different. The effect of the Land Law has already been to render tenants far more independent of their landlords. Grant them the protection of secret voting, and they will be more independent than ever. Already "nationalist" members have been returned in some cases, and it is said by some people that if a general election were to be held in Ireland to-morrow, nearly the whole body of members would consist of men, like Mr. Martin, pledged to insist upon repeal, and only condescending to sit in a Parliament at Westminster under protest, and with the avowed intention of bringing about a separation. Mr. Plunket, for example, a young member, with a hereditary right to eloquence, put this argument with much force last night, and undoubtedly the prospect is a serious one. If the Irish members in a body, or in anything like a body, insisted upon secession, it would certainly be a very serious matter. Mr. Plunket, who is a Conservative, declared that a general election would be dangerous at the present moment with or without the ballot, but held that the ballot would materially increase the danger. I am not qualified to pronounce any opinion on this point, nor to say whether, if the ballot enables Irishmen to make their true wishes known, they ought not to have the ballot, even if those wishes are disagreeable to us. I am content to point out a possible contingency without speculating on its further consequences.

The results of this year's census just have appeared, from which it seems that we have been increasing in the last decade more rapidly than in the preceding, whilst Ireland, though still in process of depleting, is not depleting so rapidly as of old. The most remarkable circumstance to be observed on the face of the returns is the enormous increase of the towns as compared with the country. Purely agricultural districts have fallen off in many cases, whilst such places as London, Liverpool, Manchester, and Glasgow swell with almost American rapidity. And thereby hang several morals, which I leave to your sagacity.

PARIS AND FRANCE.

PARIS, June 27, 1871.

THE war with Germany has not been without results on the interior policy of France. For the first time in her history, a real divorce has been apparent between Paris and the rest of the country. This divorce is a new feature in our history. The moral dictatorship of Paris has been accepted almost at the remotest date. It was felt at the time of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, when Paris gave the signal of the persecution of the Protestants. Henry IV. acknowledged it when he said, "Paris is well worth a mass," and renounced the Protestant faith. This dictatorship became intolerable in the stormy days of the French Revolution and of the Terror. It became a sort of tradition, I would almost say, a dogma, that a handful of bold men, addressing a mob in the name of the sovereign people, from a window of the Hôtel de Ville, could legally proclaim a new government, and that France had nothing to do but to submit quietly to the dictation of the Parisian will. The centralization of all the political power in Paris, rendered more complete by each government in succession, and more easy by the invention of the telegraph and the railways, condensed, as it were, all the will of the country in one single spot. Paris really became the brain of France, and issued orders to all the muscles. But now, alas! the brain is diseased and these new nervous centres, and reflex movements take place in the whole body, to use the jargon of the physiologists. The revolution of the 18th March is the first example of a popular movement successful in Paris and unacknowledged by the country. This time Paris has been fairly beaten: it is now under martial law. I see groups of soldiers everywhere with chassepots on the shoulder, policemen with revolvers in the belt, and I cannot help remembering Milan at the time when the Austrian soldiers occupied it in the same fashion. The garden of the Tuileries is full of tents and of artillery, and hundreds of horses are led down to the Seine to take their drink. The Pantheon, like almost all the vast public edifices, has become a caserne; the regiments go by in their campaign-dress, with knapsacks and cartridge-boxes. You see everywhere the apparel of war. France has been beaten by Germany, and Paris has been beaten by France.

The magnitude of these events can hardly be overstated. Paris has always been the republican capital of a monarchical country. It had proclaimed again the republic on the 4th of September, without consulting the country, and all the efforts of Gambetta were directed against the nomination of a National Assembly. The government was entirely composed of the deputies of Paris, with the exception of General Trochu. In the name of the National Defence, the government of Bordeaux, which was, in fact, the dictatorship of a Parisian deputy, exercised through all France the most outrageous despotism—it dissolved the conseils-généraux, violated all the laws, suppressed provincial newspapers, tried even at the last moment to curtail the electoral rights of the citizens. How could France be reconciled to the Republic? The tree must be judged by its fruits. The fruits of the government of the 4th of September, of the Republican and Parisian government, were the invasion of a third of France, the capitulation of Paris, the treaty of Frankfort, the expenditure of four milliards of francs, the necessity of finding five milliards more for the Germans, and, finally, the Communist movement, with all its horrors and its follies. Paris, I have said, is the republican head of a monarchical country. But Paris does not know what a republic means; only a very few among the Republicans understand that the essence of a republic is the government of the majority by the law. In our days there are but two modes of establishing a government—universal suffrage or force. Universal suffrage has invariably been adverse to the republican form of government in France; and it will hardly now be reconciled with it. Montesquieu said that virtue was necessary to the republic; by which he meant that a republic cannot live if there are not many people capable of framing laws, of obeying laws, of understanding laws; and it must be acknowledged that this political culture, this general intelligence, is wanting in France. The country is led by instincts more than by ideas; but the instincts of the capital and of the country are totally at variance. The instincts of the rurals, as we now call them, are orderly, conservative, peaceful; they are, if you like, of a low order, but they are healthy; the instincts of Paris are morbid, simian, disorderly, revolutionary. Paris during the siege had really become a madhouse. There was something pestilential in the moral atmosphere. Even among the bourgeois, the rich bankers, and shopkeepers who escaped the tyranny of the Commune, there was a curious want of balance, of foresight, of sagacity. "We don't like the Commune," they used to say, "but we don't like the Assembly any better. There ought to have been a compromise." They spoke of conciliation; they had almost a secret leaning towards the adventurers who occupied the Hôtel de Ville. And why? They knew it not themselves; it was because these tyrants represented the tradition of the sovereignty of Paris, because the Assembly represented the sovereignty of the French people. Paris has been for a century a Circe, who changes the wisest and the best men into fools. Politically, it is not more enlightened than France; it obeys other instincts, other passions, but it obeys only instincts and passions. Our great necessity is the diffusion of political ideas; and first of all of this idea—that a government, whatever be its name, is made for the majority of the people, and represents the wishes of the majority. An American child understands this better than M. Thiers, who, in order to gratify his own senile ambition, has been attempting to force the Republic on an Assembly which desires to establish a constitutional monarchy—better than M. Louis Blanc, who proclaims that the Republic is above the divisions of universal suffrage—better than most of our public men, who advocate a new trial of the Republic, because in the commotions and agitations of such a trial they expect to gratify their hopes with greater ease and rapidity. We live under conditions which are utterly demoralizing; there is no truth in anything. We are nominally under a republic, but the Assembly has only accepted the Republic as a fact. It may last two years, or it may last two months more. We can hardly be said to have had even a parliamentary government; for at Bordeaux M. Thiers did not take his ministry in the majority of the Chamber. Is he a king? is he a president? is his cabinet responsible? He has so far thrown all the weight of his influence on the side of the minority of the House. He had been named a deputy in twenty-seven departments as an Orleanist, and it was only after the downfall of the Commune that public opinion obliged him to consent to the abrogation of the laws of exile passed in 1848 against the Orleans family. During the first part of the second siege of Paris, he hoped to terrorize the Chamber into a proclamation of a republic it did not wish to proclaim. For the last months everything has been a sham; nobody would see the plain truth, or durst express it. It is not the fault of the people; the people expressed its wishes clearly enough in electing the House; it wanted peace with Germany, and peace in France; and, in order to have peace in France, France demands a constitutional monarchy strong enough to be liberal. France has lost all faith in the Republican party, in the liberalism, in the capacity, in the honesty of its leaders. She has made up her mind, but the politicians have not; they are still vacillating, anxious, uneasy, and they show an imbecile fear of the remnants of the Commune and of the Bonapartes. But if anything can give any chance to the Bonapartes, it is the trial of the Republic. The Republic of 1848 paved the way for them; if the monarchical party of the House does not impose its will on M. Thiers and his followers, we may see again a coup d'état, which will be fatal to liberty and to parliamentary institutions.

A. L.

Correspondence.

A LAST WORD FOR MR. CHENEY.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I feel great reluctance to trouble you with any further communication in regard to the case of Mr. Cheney, but I cannot allow to pass by unnoticed a most important position (and one which has much wider bearing than this particular case), assumed by both you and your correspondent "B. O. D.," which I believe is wholly wrong, and puts the whole question in a false attitude and light. As one of the friends and upholders of Mr. Cheney, I would ask the favor of calling attention to this point, and saying a few words in defence of our common position.

You both argue upon the assumption that the Protestant Episcopal Church is "a voluntary association," which one is free to join or leave, as a mere matter of individual choice. If this be true, if the church be a mere social compact of individuals, then all which you say concerning Mr. Cheney and his upholders follows legitimately. But if it be not a voluntary association, but a divine organization (as you intimate that Mr. Cheney must probably regard it), then our uniting with it is not a mere matter of choice, but of imperative duty. For, let it be observed that, to those who are by conviction Protestant Episcopalians, there can be no choice between this church and other churches, such as the Presbyterian or Congregational. For them, so far as this is concerned, there is practically no other church. In addition to this should be considered the fact that, in the Providence of God, we have been born and baptized and nurtured in this church. It is our birthright and heritage. When called of God to the work of the ministry, in like manner, it was not for us a mere optional matter in what particular church we should exercise that ministry. Here again there was for us practically only this one church.

In entering this ministry, we willingly and gladly promised to conform to the doctrine, discipline, and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church. But it is well known that this promise is universally considered and taught to be a promise of conformity to substance of doctrine, discipline, and worship, and that a certain amount of latitude of interpretation and practice is allowable. Even under the more rigid form of subscription, until lately used in our mother Church of England, the same has always held true. In his recent letter on the Purchas case, the Archbishop of Canterbury says that it has not been customary upon the part of parishioners to require from their ministers a strict observance of the rubrics in every particular, neither has it been the custom of the bishops to enforce it, but much has been left to the conscience and discretion of the minister.

Recently, the form of subscription has been altered to give more relief to the conscience, and bring it into conformity with this liberal interpretation and practice. Now, in omitting the word regenerate from the office of infant baptism, we believe that Mr. Cheney acted within the bounds of this allowable latitude of interpretation and practice. Others had been accustomed to make variations in it, among whom I may instance the late Bishop Meade, of Virginia. When Mr. Cheney's practice was brought to the notice of his bishop, and the bishop required of him the promise to use in the future the omitted word, evidently Mr. Cheney could not obey his bishop contrary to his own conscience. Here let it be observed that the promise of obedience to our bishops and other chief ministers, made at our ordination, is not an unconditional one, it is a promise "to follow with a glad mind and will their godly admonitions, and to submit to their godly judgments." Every minister is thrown back upon his own reason and conscience in determining what are godly admonitions and godly judgments. Refusing to make a promise contrary to his conscience, Mr. Cheney was next tried, suspended, and afterwards deposed by the ecclesiastical court of his own especial diocese.

Mr. Cheney is now placed in a new dilemma. He must either leave that ministry to which he has been called of God, and in the exercise of which God has largely blessed him, and must cease his ministrations to the people over whom he is placed, or he must resist this ecclesiastical decision. For be it observed, Mr. Cheney has not the choice of uniting with some other church; for him, so far as this is concerned, there is only this one church.

And here I want to call attention to another most important deduction from our position, that the Episcopal Church is a divine organization, and that is this, that the church itself is limited in its right of legislation by the charter or constitution which it has received from its divine head; it can legislate only according to the terms of this charter. It has not the same freedom in passing laws which a mere voluntary association possesses. It should be very careful not to pass any laws which infringe upon the rights which its members and its ministers have received from our common Master. It has no right to pass laws bearing severely upon the consciences of a minority, and then say to them, "If you do not like these laws you need not join us, or you are free to leave us;" for this joining or leaving the church is not optional with its members. I want to emphasize and call especial attention to this point, which is too generally overlooked.

It is a very serious question whether the whole legislation which has brought about the result of deposing from the ministry of "the Church of God" (Bishop Whitehouse's words) an earnest and godly minister like Mr. Cheney, for the conscientious omission of a word from the Baptismal Office which in no way affects the efficacy of the rite, is not an assumption of authority which is contrary to God's Word and to the whole spirit of the Gospel. Believing it to be so, very many ministers and laymen of the Church are prepared to resist it at all hazards. We believe it to be our duty to make our first effort within the Church. We are bound to the Protestant Episcopal Church by the closest ties, by the dearest associations, by the strongest convictions. Whilst differing from many of our brethren on some points of doctrine and discipline, we ask liberty only for the practical working out of our own views, desiring that they should have equal liberty for the exercise of their views. We have no desire to be in a narrow church, representing only our own particular opinions—we want our church to be a wide and comprehensive church, embracing all shades of opinion consistent with the platform of fundamental Scriptural truth. Our desire and effort are to make the Protestant Episcopal Church such a comprehensive church, a Catholic church, in the true sense of that word. We appeal earnestly to all our brethren to make it so, and to repeal all restrictive and narrowing legislation—legislation which tends to reduce it to a mere human association or sect.

But if our effort and appeal are in vain; if such legislation is continued; if no relief is given to Mr. Cheney and those sympathizing with him, then there only remains for us the sad alternative you point out—leaving the church. The only way in which we Episcopalians can consistently do so is by withdrawing and forming a new Episcopal Church. But this step is so serious, and fraught with such momentous consequences, that we may well pause long before we take it; and we can only do so as a last alternative, after having exhausted every possible means to avoid it, and to remain with our brethren in one united church.

Surely this position is not the position of "a brigand"; surely there is such a thing as conscientious resistance to unconstitutional and oppressive legislation, without resorting to the last alternative of revolution. So our forefathers resisted the oppressive legislation of Great Britain. So the martyrs of the church have resisted, even unto death, merely as witnesses for the truth, appealing to the tribunal of the last day for the vindication of their cause. J. P. H.

[We publish the above as presenting a fresh view of the matter, but the controversy must close here, as far as we are concerned. Our correspondent must surely see that his admission that he and his friends may yet leave the Episcopal Church and set up another of their own is an admission of the correctness of our assertion that the church is a voluntary association; and we cannot help calling his account of the nature and effect of the ordination vow a very neat reductio ad absurdum. To promise to obey "a godly" judgment, and reserve to yourself the right of the deciding when it is "godly," is surely something very like child's-play. The fact is, Mr. Cheney's position is a false one, and therefore one out of which an honorable and straightforward man, who allows of no dodging on the part of his own conscience, ought to get as fast as possible.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

American announcements of new books are few in number and not of particular importance. Harper Brothers are to publish with illustrations Mrs. Sarah N. Randolph's life of her great-grandfather, Thomas Jefferson; "The Domestic Life of Thomas Jefferson: Compiled from Family Letters and Reminiscences," is the title of the work. The same house announce the third volume of the life of Brougham; a reprint of Bulwer's "King Arthur," and another reprint of the articles about Frederick the Great which have been appearing in their magazine, illustrated profusely, and written by Mr. J. S. C. Abbott, who, having been just preceded by Carlyle, may be supposed to have produced a better popular history in this case than he has in others. ——Messrs. Ivison, Phinney & Blakeman will bring out Mr. William Swinton's "Condensed School History of the United States: constructed for Definite Results in Recitation and containing the New Method of Topical Review."——Roberts Brothers announce another volume of Mr. F. C. Burnand's "Happy Thoughts," a volume which we can recommend to all who like the fun of the English comic papers, and indeed to a good many who care little for most of that sort of product.——Sheldon & Co. will publish the Galaxy's last pair of serial stories, Mr. De Forrest's "Overland," namely, and Mr. Justin McCarthy's "Lady Judith."——Dodd & Mead will reprint a fairly good English work with a title said to be too big: "Synonyms Discriminated: A Complete Catalogue of Synonymous Words in the English Language."

—In our issue of the 29th of last month (Nation, No. 313, p. 446, first column, 17th line from the top), there is a mistake of the press which probably most of our readers corrected for themselves, but which we mention here. After saying that we found in the recent decision of the Supreme Court "no trace of the exploded dogma that the originally sovereign states created the Government, and surrendered to it certain functions," we meant to say that "fifteen years ago Mr. Justice Nelson would probably not have used such language, but the court has moved during the last decade, and this progress has been conspicuously noticeable in some of its oldest members." The not italicized above was omitted.

—The July number of the American Law Review has some comments on Mr. George Ticknor Curtis's defence of Mr. Field which will doubtless surprise the author very much. It says, "It is one of the most amusing contributions to literature which has been made for many a long day," and it proceeds to prove its assertion in this way: Mr. Curtis claims the right to assume, for purposes of argument, the existence of a condition of affairs which every man who knows anything at all of the subject knows does not exist; and from this condition of affairs he deduces whatever he finds necessary. For instance, at the bottom of this controversy lies the charge made by General Barlow, and generally adopted by the bar, that Judge Barnard is corrupt; but, says Mr. Curtis, Judge Barnard cannot be corrupt, because, if he were, the people would not elect him, Governor Hoffman would not appoint him to the First District, and his brother judges would not sit with him on the bench. Here are three assumptions made by Mr. Curtis which have not a particle of foundation, either in the facts of this case or in Mr. Curtis's experience of politics or law; they are wholly gratuitous; but, once made, all is plain sailing afterwards. So, also, Mr. Curtis, having, as he says, no personal knowledge of Mr. James Fisk, Jr., and having no acquaintance with his merits or demerits, assumes that Mr. Fisk must be a very respectable man, and just the person to be appointed receiver of a large amount of property in an equity suit in which he is himself a party, and goes on and argues accordingly. So also, having shown that, under the Civil Code of New York, it is permissible for a judge to sign orders wherever he may be, and at any hour, Mr. Curtis thinks he need say nothing whatever in defence of Judge Barnard's meeting Mr. Field's clerk in the street at half-past ten at night, after coming down from Poughkeepsie on the summons, and going into a real-estate office of one of Fisk's friends, and signing an order there presented to him by the said clerk. The Law Review makes very merry over all this, and we admit that it is funny; but there is certainly a serious side to it. As we have already intimated, we doubt if anything more insulting to honorable and ordinarily intelligent men has issued from the press for a good while; and the fact that a practitioner of Mr. Curtis's previous standing could have been induced to go through such a performance for a fee, is one of the most striking indications which have yet appeared of the demoralization of the legal profession in this city. We ought, in justice to him, to add that we understand he has abandoned that reference given him by Barnard, in the case of "Johnson vs. the Kansas Pacific R. R. Co." This is right—he knows as well as we do why it was improper for him to take a reference from this judge, immediately after attempting to whitewash him in a bulky pamphlet.

—The biography of the late Rev. Samuel Joseph May, who died at Syracuse on the 1st inst., has been partially though unintentionally written by himself in his book entitled "Recollections of the Anti-Slavery Conflict" (Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co. 1870). As an author, he is perhaps most appropriately mentioned in this place; but as a clergyman and a philanthropist, overflowing with the milk of human kindness—whose very face has been called a benediction—and as a prominent figure in the great anti-slavery struggle of which he was only accidentally the chronicler, he will be much longer remembered than for his literary labor. To those who knew him intimately, he has long stood for the sweetest and purest example of the Christian character; and, the late Theodore Parker not perhaps excepted, no American clergyman has ever been the adviser, comforter, and confidant of so many whose religious views were totally at variance with his own, and who would even have felt it a peril or a sin to sit under his preaching. One may read in vain Mr. May's tract on the subject to discover in what exactly the Unitarian faith consists; but no one could meet him in person, or carry his griefs to him for sympathy and assistance, without a very just and lively sense of what constitutes Christianity. He was, in short, the beau ideal of a good pastor; and wherever his religious ministrations were performed—in Massachusetts, Connecticut, or New York—he was the centre of the warmest attachments and of the deepest and most widespread respect. Mr. May was a graduate of Harvard College, in the distinguished class of 1817. He was ordained in 1822; went first as a missionary to Brooklyn, Connecticut; was afterwards settled in Scituate, Mass.; and in 1842 was appointed by Horace Mann the principal of the Normal School at Lexington, Mass., the first in the State or country. His last years were spent in Syracuse, where he voluntarily retired from the pulpit on attaining the age of 70. At his death he was 73 years of age. He was a very earnest Abolitionist, and was by "natural selection" one of the most efficient conductors of the "underground railway." In the so-called "Jerry rescue," at Syracuse, in October, 1851, he played a quite conspicuous part; but as an opponent of slavery and of color prejudice at the North, and as a defender of the rights of public instruction and of free speech, he will be most fitly honored by posterity for his conduct in the remarkable case of Miss Prudence Crandall—a chapter in the history of Connecticut which is probably not taught in the schools, but which would bear being read aloud in them at least once a year.

—We hope, for the benefit of slender purses, that some publisher may be induced to issue a reprint of Mr. Tylor's "Primitive Civilization." The cost of the English edition might keep it out of the hands of many who would be extremely grateful for the chance of reading these interesting volumes, for the book is one of those combinations of thorough investigation and bold, but never unsupported, hypothesis that cannot fail to leave its mark upon the history of the time. In fact, it may be considered as a sort of continuation of Darwinism, tracing the advance of man from the earliest period by means of the comparison of what we know of savage races of all times and countries, by the examinations of various legends and myths, and by the interpretation and explanation of many of our everyday customs and ordinary beliefs. He shows us how much our life is a polished repetition, when boys on the playground, when grown up, in our houses, and, indeed, in our churches, of the doings of our savage ancestors. The meaning of our children's games and their antiquity are set before us with new light. Our very familiarity with the subjects of which he treats makes the book attractive to many who might be unable fully to appreciate such books as Mr. Darwin's, for example, while the ignorance of their true meaning, of which we are perpetually convicted, keeps the book ever fresh and attractive. About three-quarters of the first volume are devoted to the study of our games and customs, the rest of that and nearly the whole of the second volume contain an account of the various opinions of men upon the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, and kindred topics. The method of the book can hardly be too warmly praised. The amount of research that it displays is immense. Probably experts will detect points of error, time will undoubtedly correct and throw more light upon what is now obscure and misunderstood, but meanwhile the book is a most valuable collection of material for the student of mankind. Nor is it that alone; it is no mere unorganized collection of facts, but an exposition of interpretation for the most part as novel as it is convincing. Mr. Tylor has the rare power of managing a great mass of facts, and here and there he culls out some familiar story or game which we have read or played a thousand times, and explains its full significance with a clearness that makes us blush for our own dulness. In the last part of the book the reader will find those most important subjects treated with the same ability. It contains nothing that need shock the timid, nor, on the other hand, is the writer ever made dishonest by the solemnity of his subject. It is not necessary to defend here the importance of getting at the truth. In short, it may be said that the book deserves the highest praise that can be given to a scientific book—it is written in a perfectly scientific manner, science being as remote from flippancy as it is from superstition. The style is very good, at times being humorous, and often really eloquent, so that the book is as interesting as it is valuable. We warmly recommend it to publisher and reader. Before closing, we should like to say a word about the difference between this work of Mr. Tylor's and that of Mr. Cox, "The Aryan Mythology," which was published about a year ago. The latter, as our readers know, is an attempt to interpret the various myths, legends, and tales of the Aryan races as different versions of the solar myth, and thus it was a book of the same kind, although of narrower scope, as Mr. Tylor's, but that is their only point of resemblance; the contrast is most striking. One opens Mr. Cox's thick volumes and reads on in vain hopes of finding a succinct statement of his views, and an orderly arrangement of his proofs, but only finds a long succession of tales, told at great length, explained arbitrarily and often inconsistently. All the work has to be done over again by some more careful and systematic hand, while Mr. Tylor's will serve as a model for future investigators.

—Mr. Matthew Arnold proposes to write three essays, one of which shall treat of literature as it regards dogma, another of literature as it regards physics, and the last of literature as it regards science generally, and of these the first half of the first has appeared in this month's number of the Cornhill Magazine. Mr. Disraeli, it appears, "treating Hellenic things with the scornful negligence natural to a Hebrew," said the other day, "in a well-known book," that the English aristocratic class, the polite flower of the nation, are "truly Hellenic in this respect, among others, that they care nothing for letters, and never read." "Now, there seems to be here," says Mr. Arnold, "some inaccuracy," and he goes on to say that of Thesprotians and Mollossians, and the original Hellenes generally, and of some of their descendants, as the Dorians, it would be true to say that they had little culture, and were fond of field sports, and of open-air life; but that it is not true, but is misleading, to liken the English aristocracy, which loves field sports, and never reads, to those Hellenes who, by their culture, gave the term Hellenic the meaning which makes it mark the opposite of barbaric. The English aristocracy are, then, as Mr. Arnold has called them, barbarians, and show a decided disregard for letters. Having pleased himself—and not very greatly displeased Mr. Disraeli, we dare say—by these not very successfully malicious remarks to the author of "a well-known book," Mr. Arnold gets a little nearer the business in hand. Next after the aristocracy, the most favored class, the class enjoying most sunshine, and exacting most admiration from the middle class, or Philistines, is made up, according to Mr. Arnold, of the friends of physical science, with their brilliant leaders, and as to these men, "their revolt against the tyranny of letters is notorious." To substitute other studies for the study of letters is with them the object of a sort of crusade. Next after the friends of free science, in the matter of being in the sunshine, and exercising influence over the Philistines, Mr, Arnold puts the leaders of the religious world, and he says that these too are just now much opposed to mere letters, which "they slight as the vague and inexact instrument of shallow essayists and magazine writers," while their demand for more dogma is loud. Attempts made at a literary treatment of religious history and ideas they call a "subverting of the faith once delivered to the saints." Mr. Arnold quotes some instances of the religious leaders demanding more dogma, as the Bishops of Winchester and Gloucester endeavoring in convocation not long since "to do something for the honor of Our Lord's Godhead"—which would seem to mean to do something to bring about a fuller and wider acceptance of the dogma of the unity in trinity of Christ and the Father. Furthermore, these gentlemen wished to do something "to mark their sense of that infinite separation for time and for eternity which is involved in rejecting the Godhead of the Eternal Son"—which would seem to mean to manifest more plainly their belief in the dogma that those who believe Christ to be God shall after death go into bliss, and those who do not so believe shall then go into punishment, both of which shall be eternal. Others also the essayist quotes, and makes this at any rate clear enough, that it is admissible for him if he likes to say that some religious people wish the church to be more dogmatic in its teaching; that a larger number of religious people certainly do object to a "literary" handling of the Scriptures and religious ideas; that the British aristocracy does not care as much for literature as it might; and that the physical science men, as they have small capacity for letters, so have small delight in them, and would fain get not only more share in the direction of education than the absurd educational system of England has hitherto allowed them, but also more than it is probably desirable they should have. Doubtless they are, just now, people with a hobby, and they are not as a rule famous for breadth of nature.

—When Mr. Arnold gets fairly at work on his defence of literature against the theologians he makes some good points, but in some places his work is very loose and ineffective. What likelihood is there, for instance, that a writer will carry along with him many people, professors of religion or rationalists, who says that "the true meaning of religion is not morality, but morality touched by emotion"; it is "ethics heightened, lit up by feeling"; and, again, "the object of religion is conduct"? Certainly the religious man, of whatever religion, who holds that his sacred books solve the universe; tell him truly who made it and him and why he and it were made; describe for him the nature of his Maker; show him how his sins are to be washed away; look on the other side of the grave for him; assure him of existence after death and how he may be for ever happy—the man with a religion that solves the universe and opens a heaven to him is not going to listen to one who tells him that the sole object or the main object of religion is his conduct among his fellow-men; that religion is ethics lit up by emotional feeling. And the rationalist, who holds that solutions of the universe have been too numerous, and is resolved that he will deal only with the admittedly certain and verifiable, will be as little likely to believe himself religious in any just sense of the word merely because he has an excellent ethical system which is sometimes, in part at least, lit up by emotion. The fact seems to be that Mr. Arnold, in opposing the theologians in their stiff handling of such extremely undefined and indefinable terms as "grace" and the like—the whole dictionary of the theologians, we may say—has had occasion to make definitions of those terms himself, and has read his sense—we do not say not the true sense, but his sense, which he read there—into both the Old and the New Testaments, and now finds believers in the Bible and disbelievers in it equally unwilling to follow him.

—The great defenders of the Paris Commune in this country, B. F. Butler and Wendell Phillips, must have felt a slight touch of envy on reading the official eulogy of that defunct body by the gentlemen of the "General Council of the International Workingmen's Association," Boon, Bradwick, Buttery & Co. This document is perfectly grand in its demagogic outspokenness, and sublime in its rhetoric. The Commune, it frankly avows, did not come into life as a protest against usurpation, real or threatened; "it was the positive form of that Republic" which was "not only to supersede the monarchical form of class-rule, but class-rule itself." It did not mind the affairs of Paris alone, as its name implied—that is to say, affairs belonging to a limited sphere within the state—"the Commune was to be a working . . . body, executive and legislative at the same time;" "not only municipal administration, but the whole initiative hitherto exercised by the state was laid into the hands of the Commune;" "in consequence of the siege it had got rid of the army," and its "first decree . . . therefore, was the suppression of the standing army, and the substitution for it of the armed people." It destroyed both "the standing army and state functionarism;" but "neither cheap government nor the 'true Republic' was its ultimate aim; they were its mere concomitants; . . . its true secret was this: it was essentially a working-class government, the product of the struggle of the producing against the appropriating class, the political form at last discovered under which to work out the economical emancipation of labor." "It wanted to make individual property a truth, by transforming the means of production, land and capital, now chiefly the means of enslaving and exploiting labor, into mere instruments of free and associated labor." In one word—the "General Council" has no hesitation in announcing it—the Commune meant "Communism."

—Having given its exposé of the meaning and aims of the Commune, the "General Council of the International Workingmen's Association" pass over to vindicating and glorifying its deeds. They do not stoop to answer the question, What good could there result from a civil war thus raised within sight of a foreign foe, who had just proved his ability to crush the combined forces of both contending parties, and whose cannon frowned down upon the Commune, ready to crush it in case of its victory? They proudly tell us this: "Within sight of the Prussian army that had annexed to Germany two French provinces, the Commune annexed to France the working-people all over the world." And they tell us how it did it: "The Commune admitted all foreigners to the honor of dying for an immortal cause." That it placed the Dombrowskis, Okolowiczes, and Wroblewskis "at the head of the defenders of Paris" was not because it could find no decent French officer to lead the assassins of Clément Thomas and Lecompte against the national army of France, but because "the Commune honored the heroic sons of Poland." That it suppressed scores of ournals was not the natural consequence of a system of terrorism wantonly inaugurated, but an unavoidable measure of self-defence, for in the terrible struggle it had entered upon it would have "shamefully betrayed its trust by affecting to keep up all the decencies and appearances of liberalism as in a time of profound peace." The Commune "dismissed and arrested its generals" and war-ministers one after another, it is true, but it was done because "they were suspected of neglecting their duties," and then it was a splendid "satire upon M. Thiers," who at the same time distributed military rewards.

—And then comes the glowing description of "the change the Commune had wrought in Paris" as to morals. The vilest of men, transformed as if by magic, no longer thought of "assassination, theft, and personal assault"; "the real women of Paris showed again at the surface—heroic, noble, and devoted, like the women of antiquity"; Paris, "almost forgetful of the cannibals at its gates," was "radiant in the enthusiasm of its historic initiative." It was the work of "the bloodhounds of order" that radiant Paris "was suddenly changed into a pandemonium." Pétroleuses now showed at the surface, but "the Commune had, long before, given full public notice that, if driven to extremities, they would bury themselves under the ruins of Paris, and make Paris a second Moscow"—and that from higher motives than military reasons, for snow-fields fatal to the Versailles troops could not be expected in May, nor the Seine to be turned into a Beresina, while those who were to pursue them would lie buried under ruins. Incendiarism was accompanied, it is true, by the execution of sixty-four hostages, with the Archbishop of Paris at their head; but "how could they be spared any longer after the carnage with which MacMahon's pretorians celebrated their entrance into Paris? Was even the last check upon the unscrupulous ferocity of bourgeois governments—the taking of hostages—to be made a mere sham of?" The slaughter came rather too late to be effective for this cause, but it may do good, we must presume, for the future. After all this—this is a fit conclusion—"workingmen's Paris, with its Commune, will be for ever celebrated as the glorious harbinger of a new society."

—Russia has at last reached, in her reforms, the one of all others that is to develop the national character and lay a sure foundation for future greatness. Within the past six months, Count Tolstoy, Minister of Public Instruction, has submitted to the Imperial Council—and that body has endorsed, after examination by a distinguished committee—certain law-projects looking to the improvement of both primary and secondary education throughout the empire. The scheme embraces (1) common schools to take the place of the present district and parish schools; (2) the organization of normal schools, which shall combine with the training of teachers for the public schools the objects proposed by the Realschulen or commercial schools of Germany; (3) the establishment of polytechnic schools, and (4) certain changes of a very important character in the courses hitherto prescribed for the gymnasia and progymnasia. The modifications in these latter institutions, in 1849 and 1851, were designed to check the study of the Latin language, and—strange as it may seem in a country connected in so many ways with Greece—to banish the study of Greek altogether. To this prohibition some have gone so far as to attribute, as a natural consequence, the materialistic and nihilistic tendencies of the present generation. But it is enough to point to the fact that attendance upon the universities has decidedly fallen off, and that it is impossible not only for them but even for the gymnasia to find native professors of the classic languages, of philosophy, of the Russian language and literature, and of universal history. The statute of 1864, though intended to reinstate Latin and Greek, has needed for full effect the legislation now determined on.

FORSYTH'S NOVELS AND NOVELISTS OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.*

THE novels which delighted our grandfathers and grandmothers, and which (or some of which) we read in our youth almost as a necessary part of a liberal education, are unknown, many of them even by name, to our sons. And why? First, there is an impression prevalent among younger readers that these works have a general stamp of unreality. It appears to be founded partly on the traditions of the romance (a very different thing from the novel), extending from Mrs. Radcliffe in the last century to Miss Porter in the present, and partly to the peculiar and not undeserved reputation of the voluminous Richardson. Yet it is a false impression, for Miss Burney was the founder of realism, and though there are scenes in "Evelina" which verge on caricature, many passages in "Cecilia"—those, for instance, in which Mr. Dubster is brought into contact with the military "swell," as he would be called nowadays—vie, for their delicacy and accuracy of handling, with the very best work of Anthony Trollope. Nor can unreality be reckoned among the sins of Fielding. Of Jane Austen we say nothing, as she belongs to this century, though Mr. Forsyth classes her among the authors of the eighteenth, because some of her works were written, though not published, prior to 1800.

The second reason is a better, indeed a very good one. The exceeding grossness of a majority of the last-century novels (another marked difference between them and the romances) repels the ingenuous mind of the modern Anglo-Saxon youth. Here we are called upon to discriminate between a just conclusion and an inference not absolutely warranted. It is very proper, and in our more refined age very natural, that a young man should throw down one of Smollett's novels in disgust, and that it should be to a young lady something unapproachable. But it is another matter altogether when we come to ask how far such books present an accurate picture of their age. To take a strong case from Fielding. The author of "Tom Jones" (from what we know of him independently of his writings) evidently considered fornication a gentlemanly accomplishment; accordingly and characteristically, he makes his hero a rough-and-ready sinner in that way, while the villain Blifil, as the crowning trait of his villany, is a chaste man—not, be it observed, a hypocrite of the "Tartufe" and "Joseph Surface" class, but a person constitutionally cold. Now this is bad; strong terms are required for stigmatizing such a perversion and inversion of morality; but it is not fair to infer at once that Fielding was the representative man and author of his day: the assumption must not be made without careful investigation and comparison.

If we find ourselves at the outset giving prominence to an unpleasant subject, it is because that subject is really the main staple of Mr. Forsyth's book. He begins by expressly disclaiming (in his preface) any attempt at a history analysis of eighteenth-century fiction, and his incidental specimens of literary criticism are certainly not of a nature to make us wish that they were more direct or numerous. His work is not unlike such a one as we might suppose Mr. James Parton to write, if that gentleman would suppress some of his philosophical reflections and look a little more carefully to his English. It is a familiar and lively, but decorously cautious, picture of British manners and morals in the last century, drawn from the pages of its most popular novelists. Of course it is impossible to escape the delicate and important question how far a writer of fiction is to be accepted as a witness of the truth. Mr. Forsyth's notice of this difficulty is, to use the mildest term, inadequate. He puts out of court "Dickens's caricatures"—though here it is worth while remarking that out of ten characters which he enumerates "in whose existence it is impossible to believe," two are considered by those who profess to be acquainted with the original to have been intended for real persons. Taking a wider view, we may observe that all obviously partisan novels, whether political, religious, or social in their aim, must be taken with a great many grains of salt, if indeed they can be admitted at all. Further, we see that in our own country a number of non-partisan novels, which only profess to represent manners and real life, are utterly unreal and unlike any state of society that ever existed anywhere. And when we come to the probability of this or that type-character, the elements of discussion become very complicated. Imagine some critics of a future day debating whether Charles Kingsley's or Wilkie Collins's representation of the fashionable athlete was the true one, and how far Charles Reade could be depended on as an authority on the Kingsley side.

* "The Novels and Novelists of the Eighteenth Century, in illustration of the Manners and Morals of the Age. By William Forsyth, M.A., Q.C., author of 'The Life of Cicero,' etc., etc." New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1871.

Not only does Mr. Forsyth deduce from the popular novels of the last century a most undesirable state of social morality, but, with a pertinacity that almost makes one suspect a pious fraud, he asserts that, "with the exception of some well-known names, they are deplorably dull," "their plots are contemptible and their style detestable"; their incidents "poor," their construction "inartistic," their narratives "insipid," and their dialogue "stupid." A fair specimen of his more detailed treatment of them is afforded by this appreciation of "Chrysal; or, The Adventures of a Guinea":

"I have looked through the four volumes of 'Chrysal'—it is impossible for human patience now to peruse them—to see if there was anything that could interest a reader of the present day, but the attempt was vain; the book, both in style and matter, is execrably bad. . . . It has sunk into total oblivion, and I am bound to say that it deserves its fate. . . . . The vice is not redeemed by wit or grace of style, and the book is simply unreadable."

From this judgment we entirely dissent. "Chrysal" is not unreadable. We have a distinct recollection of reading it twice, at an interval of some ten years, and if we were starting on a twelve-hours railroad trip, we would run the risk of a third reading sooner than trust to many native works or even European reprints of the day which enjoy a fair popularity and circulation. The style is certainly not first-rate, yet it compares favorably with that of several lady authors now more or less in vogue, such as Mrs. Henry Wood in England, or Mrs. Mary Holmes on our own side of the Atlantic. Two things should be borne in mind when forming an opinion of "Chrysal"—first, in reference to the merits of the book itself, the idea of describing widely-separated scenes and characters of all sorts by the medium of an object passing from hand to hand, was—we will not say absolutely new, for we do not pretend to an acquaintance with the whole range of European fiction—but new to the British public. It has since become hackneyed even to children, so that later readers cannot put themselves in the place of its first public, any more than the present generation which has seen Cooper run out to the dregs in two languages, through Simms, and Bird, and Kennedy, and "Gabriel Ferry" De Bellemarre, down to Aymard and Mayne Reid on land, not to mention his countless imitators at sea, can judge of the effect which his earlier works had in their freshness and originality on our fathers. Secondly, as to the value of its testimony to the manners of the age, there is sufficient evidence, internal and external, that the author, Charles Johnson, was an embittered and disappointed man, and the obviously misanthropic tone of his book renders it anything but an impartial witness.

The animus of our author may also, we think, be traced in such little touches as these, that he introduces the novels of Mrs. Behn, although they belong to the middle of the preceding century, and that he dismisses De Foe as "throwing little light on the social manners of the age," apparently because De Foe makes his low people behave like low people, and his gentlefolks as gentlefolks should.

His remarks on Fielding are to the effect that this author is very coarse, that no parent or schoolmaster at the present day would think of putting him into a boy's hands, and that he is fond of [burlesque] Homeric similes, which last original discovery Mr. Forsyth thinks worthy of being illustrated by three pages of quotation.

Still, whatever shortcomings of detail Mr. Forsyth may have committed, we must own that he has made out his case on the general issue. He undertook to prove that the "swell" of a hundred years ago was a very deboshed fish, and by the corroborative testimony of essayists and diarists, added to that of the novelists, he has done so. If the progenitor of our cousins (and partly of ourselves) was not exactly Darwin's hairy animal with pointed ears, living in trees, he was a moral monster, in some respects as extraordinary and antagonistic to the British or American Philistine of to-day. The fashionable man of the eighteenth century was generally a measureless tippler, so generally that the occasional appearance of a temperate liver like Chesterfield seemed a social phenomenon. He was prone to profligacy, usually in a low, boorish, animal way, sometimes with a clumsy imitation of that seductive science which even then had made adultery one of the fine arts in France. His ordinary talk blossomed out at small provocation into profanity and obscenity. He not only fought duels, but indulged in those extemporaneous and promiscuous encounters which the chivalry of another age and clime knew as "street fights," the principal difference being the substitution of cold steel for firearms. Ladies, married or unmarried, were frequently assailed with indecent language, and sometimes but too ready to listen to it. And this was the least indignity to which they might be exposed, for abductions were at least as common then as elopements are now, and liberties sometimes taken or attempted in public which would at this day hardly be practised on a recognized courtesan. The common people could scarcely be expected to improve on the example of their betters, especially as neither government nor society treated them with much humanity, for the laws were almost Draconian, and culprits received such usage as we only hear of now among the "heathen Chinee" or other semi-barbarous nations.

Yet this, or most of it, we, or most of us, knew already, and it seems as if we did not need a Queen's Counsel and ex-Fellow of Trinity to tell it to us. Freely, we confess that this book has been a great disappointment to us. The subject is magnificent, and much might still be made of it, even after Thackeray and his imitators. Mr. Forsyth has produced—what? A very moral and proper monograph, safe reading virginibus puerisque, but absolutely without critical value. It was begun, he tells us, "to divert the idleness of a long vacation." Whatever amusement its composition may have afforded the author, the result affords little gratification to the curiosity of the mature reader. It might have made a tolerable magazine article or series of articles; it is not sufficiently substantial for a separate work.

An ex-Fellow of Trinity may be expected to write good English—though we have known some who did not. Mr. Forsyth's diction is generally precise and elegant; but we notice an odd bit of slip-slop on p. 71 (note): "Richardson thoroughly reciprocated this lady's dislike of the Miss Gunnings," meaning that he shared it! The damaged Latin quotation on p. 166 we will charitably set down to the credit of the American republishers.

STIMULANTS.*

This volume should have been called "Gossip about Stimulants." It describes the history, pharmacology, and effects of opium in its various forms: it tells us something of the nature of the other substances mentioned in the title; and it abounds in quotations which represent the literary as fully as the scientific treatment of the subject. While he contributes nothing new to our knowledge of it, Dr. Calkins gives us glimpses of nearly all that has been written about stimulants and narcotics. He cites an abundance of facts; but he helps us to no decision of the debates which rage around the question of the use or renouncement of these agents. For the rest, the volume is written in a style so grotesque and turgid as to be positively amazing, as witness the following sentences: "Many a snug packet of the cherished morphine, drawn from the interior boutique of the conniving pharmaceutist, finds, through surreptitious procurement, a safe transmission to the palatial boudoir." And apropos of "champagne-wine or anisette cordial," Dr. Calkins says: "In a goodly city of ours there was an Esculapian brother, whose wont was to prepare himself with liberal potations of the like preparatory to the expected soirée, and, once mingled with the throng, to grow decidedly impulsive and loquacious in the general not only, but amusingly demonstrative and ingratiative in the particular."

* "Opium and the Opium Appetite. With Notices of Alcoholic Beverages, Cannabis Indica, Tobacco and Coca, and Tea and Coffee, in their Hygienic Aspects and Pathologic Relations. By Alonzo Calkins, M.D." (J. B. Lippincott & Co.)

The logical method of this work is uniform and simple: post ergo propter is its canon of argument. Thus, we are informed that the number of cigars used in Paris during the year 1852 was two hundred millions, while it had increased to seven hundred and ten millions in 1867. Consequently, according to our author, after fifteen years "a notable decrease in height, as in the physical stamina, is observable in the Parisians generally." We may dismiss the volume with the public warning that it lacks an index, and is prefaced by a table of contents so vaguely worded as to be worthless.

The questions that are stated, rather than discussed, in Dr. Calkins's book, require a new method of treatment at the hands of scientific men. Stimulants and narcotics are not less powerful factors in modern life than electricity and steam, yet our knowledge of the action of these fine yet potent forces is still very imperfect. In no department of science are we made more painfully aware of its limitations than in that which attempts to define the advantages and the disadvantages of their use. Few questions in physiology are of greater or of more immediate importance than those which relate to stimulants and narcotics; for hardly any concern our physical, not to say our moral, welfare more directly than they; and the considerations which we would offer have not, we think, been sufficiently taken into account in the debate which rages around them.

Wherever we find a thousand adult human beings, we shall find that more than nine hundred of them habitually use one or more of the stimulants we have named. The Chinaman uses opium, the Malaysian the betel-nut, the Indian hashish, the European alcohol; and most of the few who are strangers to these stimuli are to be numbered among the hundreds of millions who use tobacco, tea, or coffee. Stimulation by means of one or another of these substances is an act more nearly universal than any other which is not, like sleep or eating, a function of life itself. In America, considerably more than half of the adult population use either tea, coffee, or tobacco. A majority of the remainder use alcohol in one or more of its various preparations. Most of the small remaining minority are included among the not inconsiderable number of those who use opium habitually; and few of us cannot count on our fingers all the persons whom we know to be total abstainers from each one of the stimuli we have named. No fact in the physiology of habit is so extensive as that of stimulation. The love of stimulants would seem to be the correlative of the desire for nutriment; and to be a desire hardly less powerful, hardly less general, and hardly more eradicable than the instinct of self-preservation itself. We may almost venture to call the love of stimulants a character of humanity.

Whatever objection, therefore, may be urged against their use, it cannot be held as probable that they will ever be abandoned. The use of stimulants is likely to continue quite unchecked by the declamation of the reformers, who are unable to bring any decisive scientific testimony against it. For the authorities are still divided in the discussion of this question. Thus Magendie claims to have extracted alcohol from human blood; Percy concludes that alcohol has a marked affinity for the cerebral tissues. Coffee, tea, tobacco, hashish, and opium hold each their parliament in the world; and between the Right and the Left an angry debate continues. We know, indeed, that it is the function of alcohol and of caffeine to accelerate certain vital functions, while they check the transformation and waste of tissues. But science does not yet announce their laws of adaptation to the individual, the definite rules of temperance or of abstinence which are needed to guide the practice of the world. Neither those who denounce nor those who indiscriminately extol the use of stimulants can adduce, in the present state of physiological science, sufficient reasons for their belief. The data of a definite judgment are still wanting, and we must wait for their discovery through scientific observation and experiment.

But we are not obliged, meanwhile, to forego the possession of a rational opinion upon this question. We may frame a provisional hypothesis to serve as a sort of scaffolding for our convictions, while scientific men are slowly building up the edifice of a proven theory. If the employment of stimulants and narcotics is thus nearly universal, if it is not materially checked by any attempts to diminish it, and if the moderate use of stimulants, even in the most intemperate countries, is far more frequent than their injurious and excessive use, may we not regard these facts as indicating a feature of the human constitution itself—a character that can never be eradicated? In our judgment, we may; and the effort of the future with respect to stimulants and narcotics will not be to prevent their abuse by forbidding their use—an effort as unwise and futile, if this judgment be correct, as the attempt to stop railway accidents by discouraging railways—nor yet to urge a vague precept of temperance upon the public mind; but rather to discover the laws of special adaptation in stimulants; in other words, to indicate the temperaments and constitutions to which particular stimuli are applicable, and the stimuli which are dangerous to particular constitutions and temperaments. Little effort has yet been made in this direction; but this is the path which the scientific investigation of the question of stimulants is hereafter to follow. The law of healthy stimulation is now the philosopher's stone of physiological science. We commend its search to investigators, feeling sure that the quest will be rewarded much more completely than that of the Floridian Fountain of Youth.

THE MAGAZINES FOR JULY.

With a sort of perversity by no means unexampled, indeed, but which always strikes one strangely when observed in a person who has ability of a certain kind and degree, "George Eliot" continues to write in verse rather than prose. This month's Atlantic has a long poem of hers, entitled "Armgart." We are not of the number of those admirers of hers who think that her later prose works, even if "Romola" be classed under the head of late work, are up to the level of her earlier; but though "Felix Holt" is not "Adam Bede," it is surely far better worth doing than "The Spanish Gypsey" or poems like this one in the magazine, though, for reasons of various kinds, the critical world generally has declined to say so. Armgart is a young girl who aspires to distinction upon the lyric stage, and who, when we first see her, has just made her début and had a success. A certain count who loves Armgart, Walpurga her maid, and old Leo, her instructor in music, are the other characters, of whom the one best depicted is Leo, or, perhaps, we should rather say the one who is most distinctly before the eye after the poem has been read and has produced its own direct effect, and the indirect effect of reviving other portraitures of the same figure. He is an old neglected singer, living in much poverty, somewhat embittered by his failure to succeed with the world; hoping, if he can be said to hope any longer for anything, that his music may be discovered by posterity; sharp-tempered on occasion; disgusted with the new-fashioned ways of singers and the petty devices of popular musicians; and getting his chief gratification in life from training young singers according to the true principles of their art. He and Armgart in the first scene relate the story of her success—the best passage, and a fine one, though perhaps it needs careful reading to bring out the sense, being put into the mouth of the latter:

> "Well! the first notes came clearly, firmly forth,
> And I was easy, for behind those rills
> I knew there was a fountain. I could see
> The house was breathing gently, heads were still;
> Parrot opinion was struck meekly mute,
> And human hearts were swelling. Armgart stood
> As if she had been new created there,
> And found her voice, which found a melody.
> The minx! Gluck had not written nor I taught—
> Orpheus was Armgart, Armgart Orpheus.
> Well, well, all through the scena I could feel
> The silence tremble now, now poise itself
> With added weight of feeling, till at last > Delight o'ertoppled it. The final no'e
> Had happy drowning in the unloosed roar
> That surged and ebbed and ever surged again
> Till expectation kept it pent awhile.
> Ere Orpheus returned, phui! he was changed—
> My demigod was pale, had downcast eyes
> That trembled like a bride's, who fain would send > Backward the rising tear.
> Armgart. I was a bride,
> As nuns are at their spousals."

The count, who had before asked her to marry him and had been told to wait, now renews his proposal, thinking that, satisfied with her success, she may be willing to return from a stage she has conquered, and himself being even willing, in case she decides to continue in her professional career, to allow her to pursue it after marriage.

Armgart, however, declines, talking rather after the manner of a woman's rights woman in a state of full activity, and exhibiting a needless hardness of spirit towards the count, and indeed all men, as husbands and fathers. But she is soon more than repaid, for a physician, who treats her for a throat disease, ruins her voice, and she fails at rehearsal. A scene ensues, in which Walpurga, irritated at the kind of eloquence with which Armgart speaks of the lot of ordinary women, drudges, mothers, and the like, turns upon her, and very effectively rebukes her wilfulness, conceit, pride, and lack of sympathy and generosity. Armgart repents, and the poem ends by her going away to Freiburg, where she will teach music, be thoughtful for others, and be humbler. The rejected count meantime goes to India, sending a letter of condolence to Armgart in her misfortune, and it is left doubtful whether there will sometime be a marriage, though the probabilities seem to be that there will not, and that the upshot of the poem is the moral reformation through the lessons of sorrow of the self-willed and selfish heroine. This, it will be seen, is an affair that concerns the moralist and not the poet; and, as for literary forms, the novel affords an opportunity both for the presentment of the evil, and of the gradual process of cure, which no other form affords. The poem is, in fact, a short novel containing a cramped exhibition of George Eliot's power of moral insight, and destitute of the humorous delineations which show her at about her best, if not at her very best.

The Atlantic opens with a little sketch, excellent for its nervous style, and for some admirable touches of description, in which Mr. R. H. Dana, Jr., tells of a visit to the Adirondacks, where, years before Harper's Ferry became famous, he made the acquaintance of John Brown. The descriptive touches of which we speak might better have some other term applied to them, for it is by felicitous breadth and vigor that they are characterized, and not by small delicacies. Here is one of them—a model for "word-painters," and a warning to most of them to begin and learn their trade over again: "With this and the summit of Mount Washington, now probably but three or four days apart, the traveller can get the two extreme opposites of North American mountain scenery; the view from Mount Washington being a wild sea of bare tops, and sides with but little wood or water, while that from Tahâwus is a limitless expanse of forest, with mountains green to their tops, and all the landscape dotted and lined with the wide mirrors of large lakes, glittering bits of small lakes, silver threads of streams, and ribbons of waterfalls."

For its other contents, the Atlantic has its usual number of articles, most of them readable, and some very good. The poetry, however, is not very good, nor is "The Poet of Sierra Flat," nor "Our Whispering Gallery." In the latter, by the way, Mr. Dickens remarks that he does not recollect that he ever dreamed of any of his own characters. It would be curious to know if it is at all a common thing for anybody to dream of the personages of fiction; to know, indeed, if it ever at any time happens. "Castilian Days" is this time devoted to the bull-fighting, and will give most people a clearer idea than they had before of a matter that everybody fancies he knows all about. "Can a Bird Reason?" occupies itself with an assertion of some of the "sounder" of the old-fashioned ethical writers who fight tooth-and-nail against the opinion that beasts and birds are not guided wholly by instinct, but possess and use reasoning powers as men do. The author of the article gives some curious information as to modifications introduced into nest-building within the last few years by birds who very evidently had done some thinking about saving of labor. But in fact, one would say that the next bird-house that the ethical writers in question came upon should have been held a sufficient refutation of their position. Mr. Howells is especially good this month in "Their Wedding Journey," in which, in using some truthful language concerning New York, he subtly contrives the derision of Boston. In "Kate Beaumont" we have the duel between the hero and Tom Beaumont; a prospect of many miseries for the heroine; while her brother-in-law is killed, not too soon, it appears, at a "cracker" ball—a Southern institution, by the way, which Mr. De Forest describes only sketchily, but with truthfulness and some vividness.

In Scribner's, the most noticeable article refers to the ancient riddle which baffled the wedding guests at Timnath some thousands of years ago, and which, according to Mr. R. W. Wright, has ever since baffled all Bible readers who have accepted the Philistine solution. Once, when Samson was going down to Timnath to visit the woman with whom he was in love, he destroyed a valuable wine-press—a thing odious enough as a part of the wealth of the Philistine oppressor, and particularly odious to him as a Nazarite, a person vowed not to taste wine. Afterwards, when, with his father and mother, he went down to his marriage, he turned aside to look at the press and found that bees had built in it and that it contained honey. The riddling couplet with which the young Hebrew puzzled his contemptuous guests contained a reference to his destruction of their property—

"Out of the eater came forth meat,
And out of the strong came forth sweetness."

Unable to guess the meaning, they called in the aid of Samson's wife, in whom herself he appears to have trusted little, as believing her treacherous, and she supplied them with what she thought the true solution, which accordingly they put into an answering couplet:

"What is sweeter than honey?
And what is stronger than a lion?"

To this, Samson replies with a couplet containing a jeer at them and at his wife, whom he has found deceitful like all her tribe, and whom he forthwith abandons:

"If ye had not ploughed with my heifer, Ye had not found out my riddle"— which they had not found out at all. Briefly, their blunder was in understanding the term kephor-arâyôth, lion cup, to be kephir arâyôth, or lion cub. Our translators, says Mr. Wright, perpetuate the error of the Philistine youths, and so out of Samson's first exploit—which, like all the others performed, when "the Spirit of the Lord" came upon him, was directed against the life or property of the Philistines—they make a fabulous tale of his tearing in pieces a young lion, and of the honey-bee, a fastidiously clean creature, making honey in the decayed carcase. It is an ingenious piece of argumentation, upon which it is for Orientalists to decide.

The Rev. Horace Bushnell talks about the nature of Protection and Free Trade, and indicates his belief that the extreme Free-traders and the extreme Protectionists are equally impracticable personages, though they are not equally in error; for the free-trader's logical position, from the free-trader's point of view, he considers inexpugnable. Dr. Bushnell's views seem sound, and the clear exposition of them before the world of magazine readers will not fail to be of service. Dr. Bushnell, it must be confessed, has some peculiarities which interfere with clearness; tidings he almost always has to deliver, but "to stand like a man of this world and deliver them," is what he does not always do; and he has not done it particularly well here. "A Fête Day at Malmaison" is pleasantly done, with good feeling and good taste. Here is a successful touch—new, too, we believe: "A sombre-looking place, too, it must be confessed, seeming to bear the burden of a memory, with that wonderful expressiveness that all historic houses have, as if they were on the point of telling you their story." For the rest, Scribner's has "Backlog Studies," a piece of Mr. Charles D. Warner's humorous writing, which will be found agreeable reading, though a little thin in point of thought, as nearly all of Mr. Warner's writing is; an illustrated article about Japan, and another about Philadelphia; a very good hospital sketch by Miss Susan Edson; a "Plea for Chinese Labor" in our kitchens, by some one who has seen some harrowing cases of young ladies doing house-work; a "Tartar Love Song," by Mr. R. H. Stoddard; a negro dialect poem, done more than fairly well by Mr. T. D. English; and some very plain talk to Mr. J. T. Fields for saying what he did about Mr. Hawthorne's religious views.

People accustomed to laugh at "Ouida" will temper their justice with mercy and their contempt with respect and liking after reading her "Provence Rose," which is innocent, pretty, and touching. The Provence rose is a rose-tree in a poor girl's room. The story, or rather the latter half of it, is contained in this month's Lippincott's. Other things worth looking at in the same magazine are Mr. James Grant Wilson's recollections of the late Mr. Robert Chambers, as useful a man as Scotland has recently produced, and not the least able. A letter written to his father by John Quincy Adams, when he was minister at St. Petersburg, gives us a rather amusing account of an interview that he had with Madame de Staël. He seems to have had a sincere respect for the lady's talents, but it is evident, too, that he was not entirely rapt either, and she appears in some at least of her native semi-ridiculousness. There are also a story by Margaret Hosmer; and an article, entitled "Baltimore Beauty," in which may be seen, if the writer and the officers of the army and navy will allow us the expression, that messroom and wardroom sort of rather puppyish view of womankind, which seems to be the regulation view for young gentlemen of both services to take. It mingles quantities of sentiment with quantities of cheap admiration for young ladies who better represent "the sex" as toasted at dinners than any reasonable man's conception of what a woman is or what she should be, and is partly respectful and partly impudent; though its respect the best women would think rather impudent, and its impudence may be held to be respectful enough for those who get it.

Four good illustrated articles open the July Harper's, the most interesting relating to the Florida Reefs, or the subterranean researches at Jerusalem, or the Mont Cenis tunnel, or the United States Naval Academy, according as readers differ in taste. Boys who take an interest in strange beasts and birds will be sorry that the Florida Reef articles come to a close in this number, and will miss the pictures very much. The letterpress, too, has been good, the writer not only being, so far as we can judge, sound in his science, and having an interesting zoölogical field in which to work, but also being of a pleasant and companionable disposition, so that he likes to bring his fellow-explorers into his story, and closes the narrative by telling how one of them, a deserter under sentence at Key West, got his pardon on account of a gallant action which he performed, and is now in Vermont, safely married to a Florida girl.

"The Climate of the Lake Region" deals with the climate of the great lakes, and appears to be instructive; the "Scientific Record" and the other tables are full; and "The Editor's Easy Chair" discusses Thalberg and other pianists, reads editors a lecture on newspaper morality, and has some sound criticism on the "mounting" of plays, a business in which there has certainly been of late a "wasteful and ridiculous excess," which speaks very ill for the judgment and taste of the theatre-going public, and makes bad confession, too, concerning the real talent and vigor of those actors and managers who trust to it so much.

The Overland has for its first article a sketch, by Mrs. Thérèse Yelverton (Viscountess Avonmore), entitled "With the Sœurs at the Golden Horn." The writer informs us that her husband being before Sebastopol, and she being unwilling in her anxiety to live so far away from him as at Malta, got herself put under the protection of the Sisters of Charity at Galata, and there was a witness of their life. She describes it well and with feeling, and the article is worth reading. So also is Captain Scammon's "Pacific Coast Sea Views," in which there is much of the charm that, in so many books and stories, has made most people vow, now and again, once or twice in the course of their lives, to go and live in South America. Mr. John Manning tells something about the Maories which will be new to most American readers, and there is other good reading in the Overland's customary good quantity.

Old and New for July is called a commencement number, and has an interest for college men which it has not for the general reader. The general reader will, however, be pleased in reading what was the condition of learning in this country when the late Mr. Everett was a college student, and will take courage when he sees how sure has been the advance from bad to better in our American college system within the last half-century. We have small doubt that in the Harvard College of 1911 the student will be offered as wide a field of study, and as good instruction in it, as the student in any college in the world. In Old and New we have contributions from a dozen different professors and presidents scattered throughout the country as to the condition of things at their various colleges. The articles are not systematized, but information can be got from them.

The most agreeable reading in the Catholic World is an account of Father John de Brébeuf, a Roman Catholic missionary to the Indians in Canada and the West, some three hundred years ago. Agreeable, too, in a way, is a bloodthirsty attack on Mr. J. A. Froude, the historian, apropos of his recent speech, or oratorical essay, delivered before the students of St. Andrews, in which his subject was "Calvin and Calvinism." We do not profess great admiration for Mr. Froude nor for his histories, and we do profess some respect for this writer, who seems to us to have made out a case against Mr. Froude more than once, and to have shown him to be very inaccurate and very careless, if not a good deal worse than that; but we suggest that, if Mr. Froude deserves all of this writer's contempt, he deserves, then, rather less of his indignation and wrathful displeasure. It may not, by the way, be generally known, and it may, perhaps, be as well to know it, when considering how to take him when his business is the handling of this or that religionist, that Mr. Froude was at one time deep in the Puseyite or Newmanite movement at Oxford, and followed Newman far towards Rome.

In "The Italian Guarantees and the Sovereign Pontiff" the government of Victor Emanuel gets some invective of a kind which, in the ear of an American not a Catholic, sounds like the talk of a person in a dream. Here is the first "indictment" brought against Signor Venosta and his colleagues: "By this decree the door is thrown open to every sect that chooses to come and try to proselytize the Roman people. They must see as clearly as we do that the last clause of Article Second deals the most powerful and insidious blow at the spiritual power of the Pope in spiritual matters, encouraging his people to spiritual defection, or at least lessening him in their esteem as a spiritual teacher." The last clause of this Second Article reads as follows: "The discussion of religious questions is entirely free." In the opening of his article the writer appears to assert of Victor Emanuel that he personally displayed rather a violent form of reluctance when his ministers were endeavoring to persuade him to accept the Roman plébiscite; he kicked the furniture about at Florence, breaking chairs and overturning tables in his unwillingness to permit "the violation of the Papal territory, or to accept the plébiscite of the so-called people of Rome." But his legislators were too much for him, and success crowned the infamous policy whose sole object is to retain in the hands of the Sovereign Pontiff's enemies as much of their ill-gotten power over him as they can retain without incurring danger from his spiritual weapons.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books on the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Mulock (Miss D.), Little Sunshine's Holiday	(Harper & Bros.)
Olive: a Tale	" "	1 50
Pendleton (Mrs. H.), The Parent's Guide, 2d ed	(S. R. Wells)	1 50
Poor (H. V.), Manual of the Railroads of the U. S. for 1871–72	(H. V. & H. W. Poor)
Rankin (John, LL.D.), Fons Clavigera	(John Wiley & Son)	1 00
Schwartz (Marie S.), The Wife of a Vain Man, swd	(Lee & Shepard)	1 00
Spillan (Dr. D.), Livy's History of Rome, translated, 2 vols	(Harper & Bros.)
The Workshop, No. 5, swd	(E. Steiger)	40
Tyndall (Prof. J.), Light and Electricity	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Wallace (Mrs. E. D.), Strife: a Tale	(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)	1 75
Walworth (M. T.), Delaplaine	(G. W. Carleton & Co.)	1 75
Whitney (Mrs. A. D. T.), Zerub Throop's Experiment	(A. K. Loring)
Wilford (Florence), Vivia: a Tale, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.)	50
Won—not Wooed, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	50
Yonge (C. M.), Cameos from English History, 2d series	(Macmillan & Co.)	1 50

JUST OUT.

CHARLOTTE ACKERMAN,

A THEATRICAL ROMANCE

Founded upon interesting facts in the Life of a Young Artist of the last Century.

FROM THE GERMAN OF

OTTO MÜLLER.

Translated by

MRS. CHAPMAN COLEMAN AND HER DAUGHTERS,

The Translators of the

MÜHLBACH NOVELS.

Cloth, price $1 50; in paper, $1.

For Sale by all Booksellers.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,

822 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

BOOK-BUYERS.

Send for Catalogue of INTERESTING, USEFUL, and SCARCE BOOKS added to the Stock in hand of

FRANCIS EMMINS,

80 Nassau Street, New York.

NOW READY:

The American Law Review

FOR JULY, 1871

(Completing the Fifth Volume).

CONTENTS:

I. History of Admiralty Jurisdiction in the Supreme Court of the United States. II. The Reporters and Text-Writers. III. The Scotch Courts. IV. Digest of the English Law Reports for February, March, and April, 1871. V. Selected Digest of State Reports. VI. Book Notices. VII. List of Law Books Published in England and America since April, 1871. VIII. Summary of Events. IX. Correspondence.—Title and Index to Vol. V., Table of Reports, Table of Cases.

TERMS:

Single Numbers $1 25
Yearly Subscription 5 00
Vols. I.–V., in law sheep, each 6 00

LITTLE, BROWN & CO., Publishers,

BOSTON.

YALE and HARVARD use

Whitney's German Course,

Otto's French Course.

HOLT & WILLIAMS,

PUBLISHERS,

No. 25 Bond Street, New York.

The Publishers issue a very large assortment of works in the same department.

☞ A descriptive catalogue will be sent gratis to any one referring to this advertisement.

HENRY K. VAN SICLEN,

BIBLIOPOLE,

133 NASSAU STREET

Catalogues sent on application.

Special attention given to orders by letter.

THE WORKS OF THE

Rt. Rev. Ashton Oxenden, D.D.,

Bishop of Montreal and Metropolitan of Canada.

My First Year in Canada. 16mo, cloth extra, $1. (Just ready.)
The Lord's Supper Simply Explained. 18mo, cloth, 40 cents.
The Christian Life 12mo, cloth, $1.
The Pathway of Safety; or, Counsel to the Awakened. 12mo, cloth, $1.
Decision. 18mo, cloth, 60 cents.
Family Prayers for Four Weeks. 12mo, cloth, 90 cents.
Prayers for Private Use. 18mo, limp cloth, 40 cents.
Portraits from the Bible. Old Testament Series, containing twenty-three sketches of Bible Characters. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.
—— New Testament Series, containing thirty-four Sketches of Bible Characters, 12mo, cloth, $1 25.
Cottage Sermons; or, Plain Words to the Poor. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.
Cottage Readings. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.
Fervent Prayer. 18mo, cloth, 60 cents.
God's Message to the Poor. 18mo, cloth, 75 cents.
Short Lectures on the Sunday Gospels. Vol. I. Advent to Easter. 12mo, cloth, $1.
—— Vol. II. Easter to Advent. 12mo, cloth, $1.
The Home Beyond; or, A Happy Old Age. 12mo, cloth, 60 cents.
Words of Peace; or, The Blessings and Trials of Sickness. With Meditations, Prayers, and Hymns. 12mo, cloth, 60 cents.
Baptism Simply Explained. 18mo, limp c'oth, 40 cts.
Our Church and Her Services. 18mo, cloth, $1.

Any book free by mail on recipt of advertised price.

POTT & AMERY,
Cooper Union, Fourth Avenue, New York.

BOOKS FROM LONDON.

All buyers of Fine, Standard, and Miscellaneous Books should put themselves in communication with

J. SABIN & SONS,

BOOKSELLERS AND IMPORTERS,

84 Nassau Street, New York,

AND

272 Buckingham St., Strand, London.

They keep constantly on hand a large and varied stock, and are in constant receipt of Books from London. Orders or English Books will receive attention.

The Bibliopolist, a Monthly Catalogue and Library Register, contains a Catalogue of a portion of the stock. The numbers for June and July (continued) will be issued in ten days. Specimen sent gratis.

SOME OF THE BOOKS FOR SALE.

DEFOE'S WORKS. 20 vols. 16mo. Tree-calf. The best edition. $90.

HUMBOLDT, A. New Spain. 6 vols. 8vo, half-calf, uncut. London. 1811. $10.

CARLYLE, THOMAS. The History of Frederick the Great. 6 vols. 8vo, tree-calf extra. Splendid copy. $35.

LAMB, CHAS. Works of. 4 vols. 16mo, calf. London. Moxon. 1850. $11.

WALPOLE, HORACE. Royal and Noble Authors of England, Scotland, and Ireland. 5 vols. 8vo, tree-calf, gilt edges. A splendid copy, fine impressions of the plates. Binding by Rivière. $45.

THE BEST EVENING PAPER.

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

PUBLISHED AT 2, 3, 4, AND 5 O'CLOCK.

One year, invariably in advance.....$9 00
Six months, in advance..... 4 50
Three months, in advance..... 2 25
Per month, in advance..... 0 75

Single copies, for sale everywhere, at 3 cents.

Terms of Advertising in Daily.

Advertisements, Leaded or Displayed, on First, Second, and Fourth pages, 10 cents per line each insertion.
Local Items, on Editorial page, before Business Notices, 25 cents per line agate measure, each insertion.
Business Notices, 20 cents per line each insertion.
Notices after Money Article, or in Editorial columns, 50 cents per line, agate measure, each insertion.
Advertisements on Third page, Leaded or Displayed, 15 cents per line each insertion.
☞ All advertisements charged for the space they occupy, on a scale of 14 lines to an inch.
☞ No advertisement inserted in any part of the paper for less than 75 cents first insertion.

NEW YORK SPECTATOR.

The Cheapest Reading,
The Best Weekly,
The Largest for the Price.

TELEGRAPHIC, POLITICAL,
PERSONAL, LOCAL,
LITERARY, COMMERCIAL.

Its News, Market Reports, Financial Review, and Editorials are made up from the New York Commercial Advertiser, the leading evening paper of the country, the oldest, best, and most reliable journal published in the United States.

In the columns of the Spectator will be found matter interesting and instructive to the farmer and his family.

Its Financial, Commercial, and Market Reviews will be full, complete, and satisfactory to merchants and business men.

Especial attention is to be given to that department which will be most attractive to the ladies. The Latest Fashions, Household Miscellany, Stories, Poetry, etc., for the home circle.

Its Editorial Matter will be found fresh and sparkling, bold in tone, spicy in matter, accurate, concise, and read-

Terms of Subscription.

Single copies, one year..... $1
10 copies, one year..... 9
20 copies, one year, one address..... 16
40 copies, one year, one address..... 30

Terms of Advertising in Weekly.

Published on Thursday.

One month, or 4 insertions, 10 cents per line each insertion.
Three months, or 13 insertions, 8 cents per line each insertion.
Six months, or 26 insertions, 6 cents per line each insertion.
One year, or 52 insertions, 5 cents per line each insertion.

Advertisements must be received by 3 o'clock on Wednesday to ensure insertion.

Be particular and direct all orders,

HUGH J. HASTINGS,
Corner of Fulton and Nassau Streets, New York.

Weekly papers copying the above Prospectus, and sending us a marked copy, will be entitled to a copy of the Spectator for one year.

The Labor Question is the most important question in the Political Economy of the United States.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE COOLIE:

HIS RIGHTS AND WRONGS.

By the Author of "GINX'S BABY."

12mo, 380 pages, paper cover, price 50 cts.; in extra cloth (on thicker paper), price $1 25.

"This edition of 'The Coolie' has been expressly prepared for American readers, and has been corrected by the author's own hands. The subject of it is only one branch of a wide and deeply interesting question—one likely to increase in interest with the expanding energies of the Anglo-Saxon race through British and American dominions....It is well that Americans and Englishmen should feel a common interest in all great questions of social polity or of philanthropic principle."—Extract from Preface to the American Edition.

☞ For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of price, by the Publishers,

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,
416 Broome Street, New York.

SLAVE SONGS OF THE UNITED STATES.

A Unique Collection of Original Melodies—words and music—obtained among the negroes of the South; preceded by an account of these Songs, and an Essay on the Negro Dialect, as observed at Port Royal, by Prof. W. F. Allen, of the University of Wisconsin. Cloth, 8vo, price $1 50.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address

Publisher of "THE NATION,"
Box 6732, New York City.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

MAGAZINE. $4 00 PER YEAR EACH,
WEEKLY. $10 for the Three,
BAZAR. $7 for Two.

An Extra Copy of either gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE sent by mail on receipt of five cents in postage stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

T. C. SELLEW,
DESKS,
OFFICE AND LIBRARY FURNITURE,
103 Fulton Street, New York.

BANKS AND OFFICES FITTED UP.

PRATT'S Astral OIL. Remember that oil may be cheap, and give a good light, but be unsafe to use. Pratt's Astral Oil is the most reliable, purest, and, above all, the SAFEST illuminating Oil ever made. It does not take fire or explode if the lamp is upset and broken. It can be used in the ordinary kerosene lamp.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JULY 20, 1871.

The Week.

A LITTLE interviewing of prominent politicians is about as near an approach to activity as politics have been showing this week, and the principal personages interviewed have been Mr. Gratz Brown, of Missouri, and Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, both of whom had something to say about "the new departure." A very old departure, Mr. Adams said, it was in Massachusetts; and, indeed, it is to be noted, that both on the Republican and the Democratic side, Massachusetts was very early after the war to show sense and statesmanship. It was in 1865 that Governor Andrew laid it down as the only sound doctrine for reconstruction, that the natural leaders of the Southern communities must be allowed to take their natural place in that work or it could not be stable. To-day we have about learned the lesson which six years ago that truly sagacious statesman tried to teach us. That the Democrats in Massachusetts should have felt the inevitableness of accepting the results of the war, may seem not remarkable, considering what their surroundings are. But Connecticut has plenty of Republicanism in it and around it, yet see how unteachable the Connecticut Democrat is. Perhaps, with his generations of Calvinistic disputation behind him, he is more logical than his Eastern brother. Mr. Adams said that the Democracy must declare outspokenly in favor of free trade and a general reduction of taxation. Those Republican journals which are anxious to have the "failure of Grant's administration, which the Democrats talk about" pointed out to them, should listen to what Mr. Adams has to say about the financial policy of the Secretary of the Treasury, which Mr. Adams speaks of as "disgracefully incompetent," and a policy which, to so shrewd a people as ours, should seem unpardonable. As for the amendments, they must be accepted, and there was no reason that he could see why the Democracy should be frightened at them. Reconstruction could be modified under them. And it ought to be modified, for the undiluted ignorance of the negroes made them dangerous, as ignorant voters must always be; ignorance disfranchised about 50,000 men in Massachusetts, he was told, the State requiring its voters to know how to read and write; and ignorance should disfranchise in the South as well. No one charged Massachusetts with violating the amendments by demanding this educational prerequisite. As for candidates, Mr. Adams thought that, as the strength of the party is, and must be, in the West and South, the candidates should come from those parts of the country. Mr. Hoffman would be a good candidate in 1876. Mr. Gratz Brown simply had to say that "Grant is as dead as a door-nail," and that he thinks "Mr. Greeley will have no show in the Republican nominating convention."

The Civil Service Commission came upon the constitutional question before it had been many days in session, and adjourned after making a case for the Attorney-General's opinion. One of the Washington correspondents fired after them as they went off, as a parting shot, a statement that they had drawn fifty dollars a day for their services, which was not a bad story to set afloat, the inference from it being obvious, that Civil Service reformers, who began their work in this way by lining their own pockets, were a parcel of hypocritical pretenders. So they explain through the New York Tribune that Congress having appropriated $10,000 for the expenses of the commission, and four of the commissioners having been appointed from private life, the President assigned these $2,000 each, as suitable compensation, which they are at liberty to draw when they please; and as they had come great distances from their homes, and are entitled to no mileage, and spent three weeks in Washington in the middle of the hot weather, their going off with $500 apiece in their pockets, was not such a proof of a grasping, voracious disposition, and of complete indifference to the public welfare, as it seemed at first sight to the "reportorial" and editorial eye, particularly as they are going to devote themselves during the next four months to the study of the subject. But what a grand thing it would be if one of them could, before Congress meets, be detected in getting drunk or stealing a watch! Let us keep our eyes on them.

The differences between Mr. Boutwell and General Pleasonton have ended, as was anticipated, in the resignation of the latter, who is to be succeeded by Mr. Douglas, his deputy. This is the sole piece of Washington news worth mention, except the finding of an indictment by the Grand Jury against Messrs. White and Ramsdell, the Tribune correspondents, for refusing to testify before the Senate. What they have to do to save themselves from the terror of the law is to say where they got the copy of the treaty which they transmitted to their paper. This handing of them over to the court is, however, a very undignified proceeding. The Senate ought to have chastised them with its own sword, or else let them go.

Worse things might happen than the election of Mr. Adams to the Massachusetts' Governorship next year, for Mr. B. F. Butler has written a letter, saying that he intends to get the Republican nomination if he can. This letter is characteristic of him at his best, and is a pleasant mixture of fraud, guile, evasiveness, impudence, cunning, and malice, and will have the effect of making Doctor Loring very disagreeable company for his friends during the next few days. The editors of a Sunday paper wrote to the General asking him, in substance, these four questions: Do you intend to get the nomination if you can? When you ran for Congress in 1866, did you promise to help Loring to get the Governorship, and are you cheating him in allowing your name to be used now? Did you "inspire" a certain article in the Newburyport Herald, and may its views be considered yours? If you should be elected, what would you do about enforcing the Prohibitory Law? It is in his reply to the second question, where the General sticks pins into the doctor, that the letter is best. In answer to the first question, Mr. Butler says yes, he does desire the Governorship, for it is an honorable office and to be sought "by all proper means." And, he goes on to say, "Your second question I have answered in my reply to the first, because, if Doctor Loring had made any agreement with me, either express or implied, by which I was to give him any support, however feeble, for the high office of Governor in consideration of his advocacy of me for Congress, such an argument would not be a proper means by which that office should be attained." So that's clear. It would be naughty; and of course, if it was anything naughty, B. F. Butler is not the man to have anything to do with it. And here is a pin for Doctor Loring, who should not be greedy for office till he has been longer in the ranks: "The falsity of such assertion is seen when the element of time which the detractors of Dr. Loring and myself do not take into account, is observed. My first candidature for Congress, when Dr. Loring was at all in the field, was in 1866, two years only after he came into the Republican party, and when it is unreasonable to suppose he could have had any expectation or thought of being its candidate for Governor, or could have been making any arrangements therefor." The doctor is evidently no match for this sort of a letter-writer. But Butler is well hated by a good many Massachusetts politicians, and the disgrace of seeing him in Governor Andrew's chair may not improbably be averted. We should hope that, in case he is nominated, decent Republicans, instead of staying away from the polls, may go there and vote for any respectable Democrat. As the Chicago Tribune remarks, there is no reason why the Fifth District, having caught him, like the small-pox, should try to communicate him to the whole State.

At this writing forty-seven victims of the late riot in this city have died; the number of wounded will probably never be accurately known, as a good many cases have been kept private for various reasons, but it cannot fall far short of two hundred. It is safe to say that no occurrence has for many years, if ever, so thoroughly roused and united the intelligent and respectable portion of the community, of all parties. The Protestants are really angry and combative, and the better class of Catholics have been at least apologetic. The militia regiments which took part in the fray, and especially the Seventh, never turned out in greater force—a good evidence of the depth of the feeling excited by the Mayor's action. The mob seems to have been thoroughly cowed; it is doubtful whether so large a force of blackguards was ever before tamed in so short a time. The police, in spite of the discouraging circumstances under which they had to act, and in spite of the fact that a large proportion of them are Irish Catholics, behaved admirably. By the action of the soldiers, one little fact was established which is worth notice by all intending rioters, and all persons whom idle curiosity tempts into localities in which riots are expected, and that is, that calmness and self-restraint and a passive waiting for orders under strong provocation are not to be expected from volunteers as it is of regulars. When volunteers begin to feel the brickbats and stones, a volley from them may be reasonably expected. This is, perhaps, not as it should be, but it is well that it should be known and remembered by whom it may concern.

It seems to be established, we are sorry to say, that Governor Hoffman did know what Mayor Hall was going to do about the Orange procession, at least a day, or it may be two days, before the 12th, and that consequently the glory of rousing himself frantically, on hearing what was impending, and coming to the city in the night in the character of a raging American, to see that the Orangemen had their rights, is not justly his due. In fact, he appears to have come only when he heard of the torrent of indignation which burst forth when the Mayor confessed that he could not prevent the ruffians of the city doing what they pleased. He consequently is not receiving as much applause from the Americans as his conduct at first sight seemed to deserve, while to the Irish he is naturally an object of deep execration; nor is it likely the Ring will forgive him. On the other hand, the Mayor produces in his justification a letter from Mr. Bond, the Orange Grand Master, written to the Superintendent of Police several days before the 12th, begging of him not to let the procession come off if he could help it, if he thought it would be attended with bloodshed, Mr. Bond being evidently considerably frightened, and his fright being very grateful to the worthy Mayor. As it was, only a very small force of Orangemen appeared in the procession. This certainly does in some small degree palliate the Superintendent's order.

Whether all processions should not now be prohibited is a question under discussion before the Police Commissioners. There are weighty reasons for deciding in the affirmative; but we must say there are also very weighty ones on the other side. Processions block the streets, to be sure, but they make holidays for a class which needs holidays sorely, and in a community in which holidays are rare. They cherish feelings of fellowship and co-operation, and gave a little dash of the picturesque every year to lives that are apt to be very bare and monotonous. Besides, they all, except the Orange procession, help to promote peace and harmony; but we must repeat that the Orange processions are, in their very nature, demonstrations of defiance and hostility. This is a fact which no amount of pious declamation on the part of Protestants, and ruffianism on the part of Catholics, can cover up. Nevertheless, if the Irish Catholic associations here were not composed, as they so often seem to be, of inflamed idiots, they would, next year, escort the Orange procession through the city, and give the Orangemen a dinner in the evening. In so doing, they would do more to make the hated order harmless than eight millions of Irishmen, armed with two bludgeons each, and making six speeches a week, could hope to do in a century; and more than this, they would gain from the American public what they have not now—a reputation for common sense and decency.

We do not exactly know what it is in our views on Irish history expressed apropos of the late riot which surprises the World. It seems as if it thought we had fallen into a grievous error in saying that the result of the Battle of the Boyne was the establishment in Ireland of a "system of class rule which might fairly be called devilish," and which only came to an end at the time of the American Revolution. We did not suppose it would be necessary to explain that we referred to the "Penal Laws," which formed the only system of class rule resulting from the Battle of the Boyne which could fairly be called "devilish," and which did lose their stringency about the time of the American Revolution. We mentioned the American Revolution for the purpose of explaining to numerous gifted writers all over the country, who were following the luminous footsteps of the erudite Hall and Kelso, in talking of the Battle of the Boyne as a "local scrimmage," fought two hundred years ago—that not only was it a very important battle, one of the most important of battles, but that its consequences were felt by the Irish Catholics in the very marrow of their bones down almost to a period within the memory of living men. It is quite plain that it would do many newspaper men good to read some popular history of the Revolution of 1688, and some of them will be driven to it, if this Orange row lasts much longer.

Elizur Wright has written to the Boston Advertiser, maintaining, as we expected somebody would maintain—apropos of the recent opinion of the judges of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, about the eligibility of women to be justices of the peace—that a written constitution can be interpreted by anybody who can read it; that lawyers are no more competent to get at its meaning than any one else; that it is improper to interpret it by the aid of "custom;" that Governor Claflin is just as well able to decide as the judges who may be appointed justices of the peace, and so on. This doctrine about written constitutions has been held, if not proclaimed, by large numbers of Radicals during the last ten years; and it has at least the merit of simplicity and economy. Written constitutions were originally understood, in American polity at least, to be restraints on the will of the majority for the time being; and to ensure their being so, a body of professional judges was charged with the duty of interpreting them, and surrounded by every possible guaranty of honesty, impartiality, and ability. This being found inconvenient, the grand plan of choosing the interpreters for the express purpose of interpreting in a particular way, was resorted to, and in many States, even in the United States, is now in operation. But even this is found too cumbrous and troublesome; and we are now getting down to what may be called the "hard pan" doctrine, that everybody who can read a constitution can interpret it for himself. If the governor can, of course the sheriff and constable can, and à fortiori, the private citizen, who makes the governor and the sheriff. The French reached this point long ago, and get over the difficulties which occasionally arise as to whose interpretation is the right one by cutting each other's throats. We are too humane to settle matters in that way; so we shall vituperate each other in the newspapers and in lectures.

There is one other delightful invention, which may be called supplemental to the above, and which is intended to get rid of the effect of contemporaneous construction on the interpretation of constitutions, and it is this: When you want to find something in a constitution which is not there, and which you know as well as you know that there is a nose on your face, that the framers of the constitution never even dreamt of putting there, you must bring up the rule, "They builded better than they knew," which means that the framers did really intend what you wish they had intended, but that they did not themselves know they intended it—the words which according to you bear that meaning being put into the instrument under inspiration or other occult influence. In this way you get what you want without wounding tender consciences or laying yourself open to the charge of lying or equivocating, and not only without seeming guilty of want of respect for the constitution, but with the appearance of a deeper respect for it than the literal interpreters. A similar holy trick is occasionally practised by the temperance men when they try to prove that the wine made by Christ was unfermented wine, and by the Woman's Rights champions, who declare that, when Paul condemned women to silence in the church, he only meant the naughty Greek women. We need hardly say how much this process contributes to manly simplicity and truthfulness and candor in national and individual character.

The full accounts of the Corean affair have reached home, and it certainly wears a somewhat different aspect from that which it presented when it was first reported. We were told that the fight occurred because the Coreans had treacherously murdered the crew of an American ship, and would not give proper satisfaction; but it now appears that when the American fleet appeared in Corean waters it at once made preparation to survey the Corean coasts, rivers, and harbors, and entered on this duty with armed boats, and said nothing about vengeance or satisfaction, but, on the contrary, assured the Corean authorities that its intentions were pacific. The Coreans, however, on seeing "the boat parties armed with cutlasses, pistols, and Remington rifles," and "the Benicia launch carrying a 24-pounder in the bow, and the others with 12-pounders, and all having a good supply of shell, canister, and shrapnel," surveying their river, as hard as they could, without asking permission, did what any civilized people in the world would probably have done, and what a barbarous people, jealous of foreigners, was sure to do—looked on it as a hostile demonstration, and brought down troops and attacked the expedition, and were soundly thrashed and slaughtered for their pains. Of course, if it be lawful, or in the interest of civilization, to survey foreign rivers, whether the owners like it or not, the fight was a very honorable exploit; but if the Coreans have the right to prevent their rivers being surveyed, it was a great outrage. In fact, it is but a continuance of the policy begun, in the East, by Great Britain, and which we had hoped all Western Powers had abandoned.

In England, the collapse of the army bill has been followed by the success of the ballot bill in the House of Commons, and its success in the House of Lords is counted on, but not with certainty. The discussions over it in the press are interesting, as indicating the transition from the trust theory of the franchise to the "natural right" theory. The opponents of the ballot maintain that, as the suffrage is a trust, it should be exercised at least under the control of public opinion, which alone is capable of ensuring its proper exercise. They also fall back on the purely utilitarian argument, and predict the most horrible consequences, particularly in Ireland, as likely to flow from secret voting, but occasionally, in a wild way, cite the example of America in support of the doctrine that the ballot, after all, does not ensure secret voting. On the whole, if all the arguments about it were put together, it would seem as if it would do neither harm nor good. We think it might be said, as the result of American and all other experience, that where the constitution of society is such as to expose large classes of voters to intimidation, the ballot helps to protect them in the enjoyment of their liberty; and where there is no danger of intimidation, it practically loses its secrecy, and exposes the voter freely enough to the action of public opinion.

Appearances in France are all in favor of a trial, at all events, of the Republic—this time, as M. Thiers says, by the Monarchists, the Republicans having shown themselves unequal to the task. The trial will be made now, however, under unusually favorable auspices, for reasons to which we have already called attention, and notably the overthrow of Paris by the country. A Republican Assembly can now sit in the capital with an amount of security which none of its predecessors has enjoyed, though of course this might be said of any government which might be set up. Coups d'état by mobs will probably never again be blindly accepted by the provinces. The devotion of the Conservatives and Moderates to Thiers continues to grow in intensity—and even Mazade, who has always, except at the outbreak of the war, been very calm, calls him "le glorieux vieillard." Gambetta is appearing more prominently on the scene, and has taken his seat in the Legislature, but in a very chastened and sober frame of mind, and declared, according to an interviewer sent after him by the New York World, that ignorance has been the cause of French disasters; he used to think it was "treason."

M. Edmond de Pressensé, the well-known writer, contributes an interesting article to the Revue des Deux Mondes of June 15, containing his own reminiscences of the Commune, which he studied very closely, having remained in Paris during the second siege. His account of its origin and aims is substantially that which we have frequently put forward in the Nation—that it was, in the beginning, a regular Jacobin rising, in imitation of that of 1793, and having in view the establishment of a Red Republic all over France, to be governed by a Central Committee sitting in Paris. It was under the influence of this idea that the forces of the Commune marched out to disperse the Assembly at Versailles, but the plan was frustrated by the fire of Mont Valérien. It was then, when all hope of ruling France had to be given up, that the theory that they were fighting for municipal independence was got up with which they were so successful in gulling foreigners, though it seems all along to have amused French observers mightily. The internal conflicts by which the Commune was rent were due to the constant collision of the Socialist element, which wished to "reorganize society" with the merely rowdy and military element, which cared nothing about Socialism, but liked fighting, and tumult, and power. M. Pressensé's accounts of the administration of justice under the Commune would be very amusing if they were not so horrible. He quotes from the notes of M. Rousse, the batonnier (senior member) of the order of advocates of Paris, an account of a curious interview with Rigault, the Procureur of the Commune, with whom he sought to intercede in behalf of the imprisoned priests. Rigault was a hardened ruffian, of the type of our City Hall politicians, who used to amuse himself making out proscription lists, and used to attend the theatre, surrounded by a bevy of prostitutes, with whom he laughed and joked obstreperously during the performances, apparently enjoying the terror with which he inspired the audience. "Humanity" was relieved of the rascal's services by his summary execution after the entrance of the troops.

As regards the financial situation in France, it continues amazingly good, though the correspondent of the London Economist, an exceptionally good authority, says the greater part of the sum "demanded" by subsidies to the loan "was asked for without the slightest desire to get it, and without the means of paying for it if granted, with, too, the intention to sell on the Bourse the portions obtained without delay, in order to profit by the premium to which the loan had been driven." Perhaps the greatest danger the Republic has to run will come from the increase of taxation, which the cost of the war has made necessary, and which M. Thiers is aggravating by a return to a protective policy. The strong point of the Empire with the peasantry was, that it kept the taxes light by meeting its yearly deficit with loans, a device through which the peasantry ought to have seen, but, being ignorant, did not, and the new regime will doubtless suffer in their eyes from its greater honesty, as well as from its difference of views on the tariff question. The Consul-General at New York during the war, M. Place, has, in spite of his denials when here, been found guilty of fraud, peculation, and embezzlement. He misappropriated in various ways $254,000, and put thirty-five per cent. more than he paid on some of the arms he bought for the government.

THE IRISH AND THE RIOTS.

It is somewhat surprising, and is, indeed, fresh proof of the want of political capacity of the Irish Catholics in this city, that they do not defend themselves in the matter of their attacks on the Orangemen by the arguments which some of our radical brethren have put forward in defence of the Communists. The Irish can truly say that they do not try to kill Orangemen through any love of killing. They shoot and throw stones at them simply as a means to an end, and that end is the realization of an ideal, namely, the establishment of a social state in which there will be no Orangemen, or, indeed, Protestants of any description, but in which all will be Catholics, and confess their sins twice a year auricularly, and when they walk in procession will walk in honor of some saint. They may be mistaken in thinking that killing people is a good way of bringing this about, but they are at least earnest in an age when Protestants are nearly all lukewarm and half-hearted. Moreover, it must be admitted that the rioters, as they are called, are courageous; rioting, therefore, cannot be such a bad thing after all, when those who engage in it risk their lives as the gallant men and women did on the sidewalk and in the windows of the tenement-houses last Wednesday week. Let us add, too, that the police acknowledge that while the rioting was going on crime of all kinds in other parts of the city notably diminished. There was fighting in Eighth Avenue, but there were never so few assaults, batteries, or burglaries in the other avenues and streets. And the Catholics might ask the snivelling conservatives who are now denouncing them whether no killing has ever been done by Protestants, and whether the United States do not kill whenever it suits their purpose. The United States killed tens of thousands only a few years ago in order to realize their social ideal, and are the Irish population of this city not to be allowed to kill anybody to realize theirs? Those who affect to be horrified by their doctrines are usually men who live at home at ease, satisfied with things as they are, and thinking this the best of all possible worlds because their wants are supplied. The Irish Catholics of this city, however, are not satisfied with things as they are. In fact, they do not at all like the way things are going. They want more money, and less work, and fewer Protestants, and cheaper whiskey. Whatever marching in procession is to be done, also, they want to do themselves; and they desire these things with a passionate longing which ought to put to the blush the cold and sneering Yankee voluptuaries who are abusing them, and who desire nothing strongly enough to take off their coats and fight for it; and it ought to make progressive men hesitate about interfering with them. It may be that their ideal is impossible of realization, and that there will never be a world in which all will be Catholic Irishmen, but we advise those who think so to look back a little. The world moves, and we move with it. If anybody had predicted, fifty years ago, that nearly a third of New Yorkers would be Catholic Irishmen, he would have been laughed at for his pains, if not worse; and yet that has come to pass.

This view of the case is not, perhaps, an obvious one. It would not occur to most men, but neither did it occur to most men that it could, under any circumstances, become laudable or excusable for a Jeremy Diddler like Cluseret, and a little Bohemian like Paschal Grousset, and a theatrical claqueur like Bergeret, and a blackguard loafer like Rigault, and a pair of crack-brained visionaries like Delescluze and Assis, to take possession of Paris, and burn it in the interest of "humanity"; or that the cruelties of Thiers on the field of battle, and the atrocities of the Catholic clergy in various ages, could make it allowable or proper to murder sixty old and inoffensive priests in cold blood; and yet men in America, who call themselves "moral" and "religious," have been saying all this, or something very like it.

There have been various morals drawn from the riot, and, of course, first and foremost, the obvious one that there is a point at which the patience of Americans becomes exhausted, and that, when it has been reached, people like the Irish mob in this city had better go home quietly, and attend to their lawful callings; but there is another, which does not, perhaps, at this moment present itself so readily, and that is, that the duty of obeying the laws of the land, and the great laws of morality, is not one that can be taught spasmodically with any effect. The Irish were long received with open arms in the United States, in the conviction, which was firmer some years ago than it is now, that the possession of the ballot acted like magic on men, and could in a year or two convert ignorant peasants into intelligent citizens. This has been gradually surrendered; it is now generally acknowledged that naturalization leaves a man pretty much what it found him, and that the quality of the voter depends entirely on the quality of the person out of whom the voter is made, and that the ignorant and brutal have to become decent and self-restrained through much the same process on American soil as elsewhere. It has in like manner been supposed, and even preached, that winking at, or conniving at, their violations of law would, in some mysterious manner, gradually train them to respect the law. The Fenian organization, for instance, has been from first to last a standing outrage on the peace and dignity of the United States, and probably nothing better calculated to create and develop a lawless, turbulent spirit among the Irish population than the attempts made by that organization to make marauding expeditions into Canada could well have been invented. It is by no means wonderful that both those of the Irish who engaged in these attempts, and those who looked on and saw them made with impunity, should have come to the conclusion that there was nothing they might not safely attempt, if they only put their political or religious feelings in the foreground, and it must be remembered that it was not Mayor Hall and Bill Tweed who encouraged these monstrous violations of the law; it was leading Republicans. In fact, it is only four short years since the principal Republican papers roundly abused Andrew Johnson for a very mild attempt to hinder large bands of Irish robbers from marching into Canada, drums beating and colors flying, under orders from a junta sitting in New York. But although two of these Fenian performances have taken place, nobody has been really punished for them, and nobody has found fault with the Government for not punishing them. It may have been wise policy for the United States Government, so far as they were concerned, to let the matter drop, but it was very unfortunate for the city of New York, for it satisfied a large body of Irish here that they were really above the law as long as they acted in masses and on some religious or political theory of their rights.

We may add that we cannot help fearing that those who imagine that the slaughter of the rioters on the 12th has put an end to the pretensions on which the riot originated will find themselves very much mistaken. What has happened has been the result of a totally unlooked-for display of energy and independence on the part of Governor Hoffman. Had he chosen to remain quiet, the Orange procession would not have marched; the great assertion of American principles would never have been made; and whatever damage the triumph of the Catholics would have inflicted on the principle of religious and political equality would have been inflicted. It must be remembered, too, that it is this city which chooses the governor, and, for some time back, the Ring has found no difficulty in procuring a subservient legislature from the State at large—that is, from Protestant Republicans. Peter B. Sweeny is just as powerful in Albany as he is in the New York Common Council. It is by no means likely that Hoffman will escape punishment for the late revolt, or that his successor will get the Democratic nomination without a searching investigation into his views about the right of Protestant processions to the streets of the city; and on this question we may be sure he will be "sound," and will promise not to meddle with the action of the local authorities. Now, with a governor "of the right sort" at Albany, and such a legislature, say, as the last, there is not the least reason to hope that we shall have any permanent improvement in the state of affairs here. With a legislature such as the State of New York ought to elect, the great Catholic bogy in the city could be readily robbed of all its terror. The matter of processions, for instance, might be dealt with by general legislation in such a way as to prevent the streets being made the battle-ground of factions. But in saying this, we come back once more to the fact that behind the folly and wickedness of the Irish there lie American shortcoming, corruption, and indifference, without which Irish folly and wickedness would be of little importance and cause little inconvenience. Any reform which is to affect the condition of this city must come from the action of Americans themselves.

NORTH CAROLINA AND A NEW CONSTITUTION.

We hear from North Carolina the first sounds of a political strife which many thoughtful observers have anticipated as almost certain to follow the reconstruction measures by which the revolting States were restored to their normal relations with the Union. A bill is pending before the legislature—or perhaps has already been enacted into a law—which provides for a convention to revise the State constitution. The existing constitution, which was adopted in the spring of 1868, contains a clause in substance as follows: "No part of the constitution of this State shall be altered, unless a bill for that purpose shall have passed the legislature by a three-fifths majority of all the members, and shall have then been published six months previously to a new election of members, and shall have again passed the legislature next succeeding such election by a two-thirds majority of all the members, nor unless the amendments so proposed shall have been finally submitted to the electors, and shall have been approved by a majority of all those voting." The Republicans of North Carolina, at least as represented by the newspapers, pronounce this movement of the Democratic legislature to be utterly illegal and void. They predict, as we learn from Washington, that if the proposed plan is carried into execution, and a new constitution passes through the forms of adoption, and an election is held under it, the present State and county officers will refuse to surrender their offices to the claimants, and that the disorders and contentions which will necessarily arise from this conflict of authority will furnish a sufficient occasion for interference by the United States Government. This programme, which some of the correspondents have sent on from Washington, is certainly not a pleasant one to contemplate. All attempts on the part of the Republicans to create a public opinion which shall be triumphant at the polls, and which shall defeat the Democratic project of undoing the work of settlement and remodelling the organic law for mere partisan ends, would be legitimate and eminently praiseworthy; but another appeal to the general Government, another interference by Congress and the President in the domestic politics of the State, would be worse than anarchy. We pass this topic by, however, with no more than an allusion to its importance. We purpose to enquire whether the proposed convention to revise the North Carolina constitution, and the work done by it, will, in the face of the restrictions contained in the present fundamental law, be legal and valid; or whether, on the contrary, they will be illegal and void, revolutionary and usurping, so that resistance by the existing State officers will be not only proper but necessary.

The answer to this question will not in the least depend upon any theory of State or national sovereignty which we may adopt. Assuming that complete political sovereignty resides in the one people of the United States and nowhere else, still the exercise of this sovereignty in respect to a very large class of governmental objects and functions has been entrusted to the people of each State, to be wielded by them as freely as though they were independent in every sense of the term. Among these objects and functions the most important is that of forming a State constitution. With the manner, means, process, and time of creating a new constitution for a State, neither the United States nor its Government has anything to do; upon this subject the organic law of the nation is absolutely silent. The question then is simply this: Can the people of a State, by any self-imposed limitation, restrain themselves from the exercise, under the forms and processes of law and not in a revolutionary manner, of the powers of sovereignty which have been freely and fully entrusted to them?

We can conceive of a society as a mere aggregation of individuals without any government or law. With them the initiative in the formation of a constitution would of necessity be a voluntary act, of which nothing legal could be predicated. The same may be true when a government has been overthrown by revolution; the reconstruction may have no connecting link of legal validity with the past organization, and its commencement may be without any element of authority. But the ordinary process of revising a State constitution belongs to neither of these classes. There is no absence of government and law, and no break made by revolution. We instinctively assume that the new structure must be united to the old by a legal connection; that the work of rebuilding must proceed with all the forms of law and under the sanction of the government; and that the result shall have no operative force, shall be in fact a mere proposal, until it has been accepted and ratified by the people at large as the expression for the time being of their supreme will. This is the American idea and the American practice. In the vast majority of instances this legal connection and these regular forms have been simple, obvious, and unquestioned. State constitutions have generally contained no restrictions upon the power of amendment, and have either been silent upon the subject or have expressly authorized the legislature to take the initiative. A change appearing to be desired, the legislature, either by virtue of its general powers or of an express authority, passes a statute providing for a convention. This body, elected directly by the people, meets, deliberates, and produces a plan which is submitted to the electors for their approval or rejection; if approved, it becomes the organic law. The constitutional convention thus described is a regular part of our governmental machinery, as necessary and as legitimate as the ordinary legislature.

In some instances, State constitutions have affirmatively prescribed the manner in which amendments may be adopted or an entire revision made. Such provisions, unless they are expressed in a negative form and contain positive prohibitions, are plainly declaratory in their nature. They do not prevent a resort at any time to the fundamental action of a constitutional convention. But the constitution of a State may contain a clause respecting amendment and revision which is not simply declaratory, but, like that of North Carolina, is restrictive to the one manner and form prescribed, and prohibitory of any other. Is such a clause operative and binding upon the people's will, acting through the ordinary legislative channels, and finally expressing itself by a general vote? It may be instructive to refer to some examples. The Pennsylvania constitution of 1776 provided for the election, at short intervals, of a small body, to be called the Council of Censors, who were empowered to call conventions to amend or revise the organic law. The preamble made this particular method obligatory, and plainly forbade a resort to any other. These censors failing to exercise the authority conferred upon them, the legislature in 1789, without any previous vote of the people, called a convention which framed the constitution of 1790. The constitution of Delaware of 1776 contained the following section: "No other part of this constitution shall be altered, changed, or diminished, without the consent of five parts in seven of the assembly and seven members of the legislative council." The legislature was composed of two houses, the assembly, containing seven members, and the council, containing nine. As the language of this section was entirely negative and prohibitory, if operative at all it cut off any resort to a convention, or to a vote of the people, even though unanimous, and left but one legal and valid method in which the constitution could be revised, a concurring vote of the two houses, with a majority at least of five to two in the one, and of seven to two in the other. In the face of this peculiar and peremptory restriction, the legislature, in 1791, without any previous legal authority from the people signified by their vote, called a convention which constructed the organic law that became operative in 1792. The Maryland constitution of 1776 said: "That this form of government and no part thereof shall be altered, changed, or abolished, unless a bill to alter, change, or abolish the same shall pass the general assembly, and be published at least three months before a new election, and shall be confirmed by the general assembly after a new election of delegates in the first session after such new election." Here, too, as in Delaware, a convention was legally impossible under any concurrence of legislative and popular majorities, if this clause was as binding in law as it appeared to be in words. No change was made until 1850. In that year the general assembly passed a statute submitting to the people the question whether a convention should be held or not. In pursuance of the vote upon this statute, a convention assembled. Their work being submitted to the electors, and approved by them, became the constitution of 1851. The constitutions thus formed and adopted, in direct opposition to the negative and prohibitory restrictions of the former system, have always been regarded as valid. No one has doubted or questioned their complete binding force as the fundamental law of their respective commonwealths. They have received the obedience of the people and the governments as freely and fully as though the process of creation had been in exact conformity with the prescribed methods.

But it may be said that this was the result of mere acquiescence. We must then go deeper than the political fact and ask, Were the governments established by these constitutions governments de jure, or simply governments de facto? This furnishes the unerring test of the question whether the action of the legislature, the convention, and the people in Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, was legal or revolutionary. Did a government subsist in Pennsylvania from 1790 to 1838, and in Delaware from 1792 to 1832, and in Maryland from 1851 to 1864, by sufferance only, and without any foundation of absolute right? This question admits of but one answer; and yet that answer must be an affirmative one, unless these governments were de jure—that is, unless the conventions which constructed them were valid and legal bodies, and not usurping assemblies.

The section found in the constitution of North Carolina is identical in substance, though somewhat more elaborate in form, with the provisions quoted from Delaware and Maryland. It prescribes one, and only one, method of amendment or revision—the concurring assent, by majorities of three-fifths and two-thirds, of two successive legislatures, and the approving vote of the electors. Although the people should demand it with unanimity, and their demand should be seconded by the legislature, no convention is possible without a revolution, if any binding force and effect is to be given to the restrictive language. We are thus brought to the very point upon which the whole discussion must turn. No such limitation inserted in a State constitution, and attempted to be placed upon the supreme will of the people acting in an orderly manner through the regular and customary legislative means, can be effective; the action of the people in this manner and by these means must be legal and valid and not revolutionary. It should be carefully noticed that this proposition does not include the case—which once arose in Rhode Island—of an attempt, outside the existing government and unsupported by legislative sanction, to establish a new organic law under color of the people's voluntary action. This would be revolution, and would be none the less so although successful. Constitutions are but the expressions of the people's will. According to the present universal practice, they receive their sole authority from a direct vote of the electors and not from any assembly of delegates. It is the peculiar feature of American government that the people have reserved to themselves the power of creating, by their own immediate act, the organic law of a State. A constitution, being thus a creation and an instrument, cannot be above and superior to the creators who have given to it all its life and force. The very meaning of sovereignty implies this; and if we do not admit that the States possess sovereignty the conclusion is not changed, for the free exercise of the powers of sovereignty which have certainly been given to them implies the same truth. Sovereignty cannot exist under limitations, nor can its free exercise be controlled. This is plain if we consider that, from the very nature of the attribute and of an organic law, if a limitation may exist at all, it may be made absolute. If a State constitution may confine the supreme will of the people to one method and means of operation in reference to future amendments and revisions, it may prevent a recourse to any and all methods and means, and thus make itself permanent. While, therefore, conceding that the statute passed by the North Carolina Legislature, and the convention which may be assembled in pursuance thereof, will, in themselves, be tentative only, and that the instrument which this convention may adopt will be a proposal merely, we reach the conclusion that, when the electors shall have, by virtue of the same statute, approved and ratified this proposal, it will become, to all intents and purposes, de jure as well as de facto the constitution of the State. Continued resistance would then be rebellion, and interference by the National Government would be usurpation.

NOTORIETY.

We are only saying what nearly everybody has either said or thought, when we say that by no means the least marked of the effects on modern society produced by the newspaper press, has been the increase and diffusion of the love for publicity through all classes and conditions. This it has accomplished by putting publicity within nearly everybody's reach. The love of fame is of course a passion as old as the race, but it differs essentially from the love of notoriety in this, that fame rests on respect and admiration, in greater or less degree, while notoriety rests simply on the lowest order of curiosity. Now, it would be useless and unfair to deny that the press has done and does much for fame, but it would be also useless to deny that it has done far more for notoriety, and in doing it—that is, in making it easy for a man to become widely known without having achieved anything which would justify his fellow-creatures in occupying their minds about him—it has enormously stimulated the passion for being known and talked about, no matter for what reason, which seems to be inherent in a certain class of natures. For a good while this passion showed itself among us in a very mild form, by converting a few men into bores at public meetings and other gatherings, and leading to excessive display at watering-places, and even in these cases it was not easy to draw the line between it and an honest desire for admiration. But of late it has grown out of a mere weakness into a positive disease, and is fast producing among us a class of persons whom it is no exaggeration to term moral monsters. There is now hardly any class, or any institution however respectable, in which its ravages may not be traced. Take the church for example. If there be one doctrine of Christianity more persistently and earnestly preached than another, both by its founder and all its greatest professors, it is that religion is a thing which, to do its full work in the soul, requires above all things privacy—not to say secresy—not only a constant indifference to public opinion, but an active avoidance of all reference to it; prayer is to be secret; good works are to be secret; confession is to be secret; repentance secret. In short, they take constant note of the debauching effect, even on the best natures, of a life of publicity, and of the habit of subservience to the vain and fleeting judgments of men, and the steady decline of self-reliance which such a life is sure, in the long run, to bring about. All the philosphers tell the same story. They all say, if you would be pure and manly, and aim high, you must be simple; and if you would be simple, you must keep a very large portion of your life, and, above all, your motives, out of the market-place. Your self-examination must be private; revised copies of your judgments upon yourself must not be handed to the reporters; and you must steadfastly look for the reward of nine-tenths of your good deeds in a region where "first-class notices" are unknown.

If we were now to attempt to prove by illustrations how far this ancient way of building up character has been departed from in the practice of the modern church, how many noisy pastors help to produce noisy disciples, to whom the seclusion of the smallest corner of the soul would be agony; who cannot bear that even the least of their little thoughts about life, or death, or judgment, should not be "worked up" in some way; who can hardly pray without letting the newspapers know they are going to do it, or sorrow over a child's or wife's death-bed, or lose a friend, or go through any other deep, or bitter, or sweet experience of life, without having it made, or making it, the subject of an editorial, or turning it into a magazine article, and calling the whole nation to take a look at their emotions, we should raise a pretty storm about our heads. We shall therefore not do anything of the kind, and happily it is not necessary. There is no person who reads this who cannot supply dozens of such illustrations from the sphere of his own observations. We shall not, for a similar reason, seek them in other places than the church. We shall content ourselves with saying that those who imagine that the atmosphere in which these things are done is a healthy one, or one in which the seeds of noble character are sown, are not only mistaken, but may rest satisfied that it is an atmosphere highly conducive to the growth of noxious weeds, and that though it takes a good while for the plan of living, and praying, and working, and sorrowing, and rejoicing with open doors to show its full fruits, they come at last.

If we were to say that Fisk, and Train, and Woodhull, and Claflin, and a dozen others we might name—whose visible influence seems to be small, but whose career, depend upon it, is producing its effect on the silent and invisible army of young men and women who are pouring into our great cities year by year in quest of fortune, and determined to be known somehow—were the legitimate and natural results of the insane culture of publicity in thought, word, and deed which has been a very prominent feature for some time back in religion, literature, and reform, we should, perhaps, seem guilty of extravagance, and yet we cannot help saying it, and have no doubt of its truth. It is a system which develops the coarsest side of human nature, and appeals to the lowest class of motives, and subjects conduct to the least reliable of tests, and naturally and inevitably opens a career to knaves and charlatans which is full of prizes, and which every year is sure to be more crowded. Having once got into the habit of encouraging people to make themselves notorious, we cannot avoid rewarding them by notoriety, and notoriety has become, with the aid of the newspaper press, not simply a source of gratification, but of gain.

Take the case of Fisk. This man came to New York a few years ago, a smart, impudent, and ignorant pedlar, without morals or manners, and with a good deal of animal spirits, and in search of two things—physical enjoyment and notoriety. The physical enjoyment he might have had with a little money, but notoriety he could only get with the help of the newspapers, and this help they gave him to his heart's content. He went incontinently to work to do strange, indecent, and outrageous things, and they went to work to chronicle them and denounce him for them. This was natural enough when he first showed himself on the scene as a swindler and blackguard, but when it was discovered that he was really indifferent to public opinion, that he had no shame and no sensibility, and really enjoyed his bad reputation, liked to be thought lewd and smart and knavish, the press at once began to treat him as a curious phenomenon, and laugh over him, chronicle his movements, record his jokes, give him pet names, and devote an amount of time to the consideration of him as an entertainment simply, which proved the best advertisement any charlatan ever had, and gratified his dearest ambition. To be "in the papers" every day, to be thought wicked by respectable people, to be thought smart by brokers and drygoods-men and railroad men, are what he of all things most desires. The treatment he received, too, helped all his speculations. It advertised his theatre, his steamboats, and his railroads; it made the box in which he sat, and the carriage in which he rode with his strumpets, the objects on which all eyes were fixed. His fame, in short, filled the continent, and has now filled the civilized world. At last, too, the jocose treatment of him resulted in making him look less disreputable than he was at the beginning; from laughing over him a good deal, people got to thinking him "not such a bad fellow after all"; and, finally, we came to see business suspended at mid-day in the principal thoroughfare of the commercial capital of the country, whose courts and legislature he had corrupted, in order to see him ride down as elected Colonel at the head of a regiment nine hundred strong, composed of respectable young Americans. As colonel of this regiment, he, the other day, asked for a municipal invitation for himself and it from the city of Boston, and, amongst other things, expressed a desire to have "divine service" celebrated for his benefit on Boston Common. The newspapers, thereupon, took this up, and discussed it, and joked over it, showed the absurdity of it in article after article, and paragraph after paragraph, as if Fisk was really trying to play the hypocrite, and was trying to pass himself off as a religious man, the fact being that he was merely gratifying a showman's love of making a sensation, and by the newspaper exposures of him as an impudent dog got all he wanted, and probably far more than he looked for.

The last instance of the way in which the press allows itself to nurture this evil growth is the most flagrant and startling of all. Most certainly the late riot was, to any right-minded man, a very shocking and very solemn occurrence. The slaughter of nearly fifty persons and the wounding of two hundred others by the fire of soldiers in the streets of a great city in a time of profound peace is something by which nobody could well help being deeply impressed, even if it were the result of an ordinary riot raised by plunderers or brawlers. But, considering that the riot was an outbreak of savage bigotry and lawlessness on the part of a very considerable portion of the population of the city, and a portion, too, which exercises a powerful influence on the government of the city and State, it must be admitted that it furnished food for a great deal of painful reflection. Heaven knows, too, it furnished plenty of serious topics for editorial treatment. There is hardly a single interest of the city, political or social, which the mental and moral condition of this ferocious and brutal Catholic rabble does not touch at some point or other. It seems scarcely credible under the circumstances, and yet it is strictly true, that while the dead were still lying unburied, and everybody was filled with horror and indignation, and was trying to form a rational judgment about the cause and probable consequences of the tragedy, the point which most of our leading morning papers, and amongst the evening papers even the Post, treated as apparently second in order of importance, was the manner in which James Fisk, jun., bore himself in the fray. Did, or did he not, stand his ground? Did he fly, or, if so, was he disguised? If disguised, what was the disguise? Was he really hurt, or was it all a sham? Whither did he fly, and where is he now, and what does he think of the whole thing?—were questions which editors and reporters discussed, some gravely, and some jocosely, but all elaborately and at length. It having been finally ascertained that Fisk really was borne from the field disabled, and did really make a hasty escape through fear of the mob, we were treated to whole columns of banter and reprobation of him as a humbug and pretender, and a person wanting in military courage, as if there was something amazingly ludicrous or shockingly disgraceful in this wretched charlatan's unwillingness to expose his body in an honest cause; and as if his career had been of a kind to lead people to expect him to face bullets without flinching, and as if, too—and this is the best or worst of it—he was particular about his reputation for bravery, and would be overwhelmed with shame and mortification at having people believe that he showed the white feather. The whole thing might, perhaps, pass as a very poor joke, if it were not that it is joking of this kind which keeps Fisk and the like of him afloat, and which is likely to produce scores of his successors. We cannot make Fisk a personage of importance, and fill everybody's mind every morning with his doings and sayings, without making Fisk's career an object of secret admiration to thousands, and making thousands in their inmost hearts determine to imitate him. The newspapers ought to remember that, while for some offenders against public decency and security denunciation may be a proper and effective punishment, the only way of reaching others is not to mention them.

Correspondence.

SCIENCE AND ALCOHOL.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your issue of the 13th instant, a clever reviewer of Dr. Calkins's book on stimulants, referring more particularly to the action of alcohol and caffeine, says that "science does not yet announce . . . the definite rules of temperance or of abstinence which are needed to guide the practice of the world. Neither those who denounce nor those who indiscriminately extol the use of stimulants can adduce, in the present state of physiological science, sufficient reasons for their belief. The data of a definite judgment are still wanting, and we must wait for their discovery through scientific observation and experiment;" with much more to the same effect.

Those who either "denounce" or "indiscriminately extol" the use of stimulants cannot possess the true scientific spirit which recognizes neither right nor left, and refrains from judgment until sufficient data have been carefully observed and compared; but for those who side with neither tipplers nor teetotalers science does suggest something very like "definite rules" for the employment of alcoholic stimulants in health or in disease.

The denunciatory school founds its philippics upon the solitary proposition that alcohol is not convertible into any living tissue, and therefore, not being a "food," can subserve no purpose in the economy; the extreme partisans of alcohol, on the other hand, under the not very definite formula that it diminishes disassimilation, seem inclined to infer that the more of it one swallows, the greater will be the saving of tissue. Both appear to overlook the one great purpose of food and of living tissue—namely, the evolution of force. So demonstrable is this that the physiologist can predicate the amount of force obtainable from a certain quantity and kind of food with almost as much accuracy as an engineer can calculate the motive power procurable from a given weight of coal. Most of our aliments become integrated in the textures of the body before they fulfil their final function of generating energy; but some afford immediately and rapidly oxidizable material, and chief among these stands alcohol. If exertion be so suddenly demanded, or so prolonged that the ordinary processes of assimilation are inadequate to preserve the balance between waste and repair or to furnish fuel as quickly at it is wanted, alcohol may supply the temporary need, and thus prevent the exhaustion of structures required for other purposes. In some fevers, for instance, where combustion is going on so actively that the patient is actually, and without metaphor, burning to death, not only does alcohol save the solid textures from destruction by supplying other material for oxidation, but its appropriateness is frequently shown by the fact that larger quantities are tolerated in such sickness than in health.

The question as to the amount of alcohol which is consistent with "temperance" is of course to be answered by determining the maximum which can be oxidized—i.e., utilized for the evolution of force; all beyond this amount exerting a narcotic action, or, in other words, becoming a poison instead of a food. This maximum amount has been fixed by the careful observations of Dr. Anstie, and by the still later experiments of Professor Parker and Count Wollowicz, at about two ounces of absolute alcohol per diem (a quantity nearly represented by four ounces of brandy or whiskey) for a healthy man of average weight and stature; the proper allowance for women, and probably for "light-weights," being proportionately less. If more than this amount be taken, the surplus circulates in the blood either, as some physiologists assert, unchanged, or, as modern chemists believe, having been converted into aldehyde, the great affinity of which for oxygen impedes the proper aeration of the blood.

Of the positive utility of alcohol in well-selected conditions of disease, there can be no doubt. Its use in health may probably be circumscribed thus: If a man be so circumstanced that he need not overtax his energy, that he need only work when he "feels like working"—that is to say, if he lead a physiological life—or if his daily expenditure of force be no more than can be steadily supplied by the assimilation of more nutritious food, he will seldom, if ever, require the aid of alcohol; but in the brain-wasting and muscle-taxing strife of civilized communities so many sudden or wearying exigencies, whether of business or of pleasure, beset us that few of us can place an optional limit to our labor, and in such cases the moderate employment of alcohol—if taken to supplement, not to supplant, more enduring food—is not only harmless, but beneficial. The fact that a few exceptional individuals are able to accomplish great work on no stronger diet than vegetables and cold water, cannot afford a rule for the vast majority, whose instinctive desire must be regarded as the expression of a physiological want.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

A. L. C.

New York, July 15.

THE RUNAWAYS AGAIN.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your explanation of that famous passage in Romeo and Juliet, commencing "gallop apace," in No. 314 of your paper, is good. But it occurs to me that Juliet continued the "classical idea" more closely, and called the "fiery-footed steeds" the "runaways," and that that word should be plural possessive instead of singular.

As Shakespeare used the word "wink" to mean to close the eyelids, and to keep them closed, as in this passage, "And I will wink, so shall the day seem night," the idea would be that the "steeds" should "immediately" reach the end of the journey, and close their eyes in rest in the "close curtains" of darkness, and, as you say, "not betray the meeting of Romeo and Juliet."

The point I make is, that there is no need to bring in the sun as a "runaway," but let the steeds be the "runaways."

The change of an apostrophe from the left to the right of a letter s, or the reverse, is surely a very small typographical error even in our day.

Truly,

O. C. Blackmer.

Chicago, July 8, 1871.

Notes.

Messrs. Lindsay & Blakiston, the well-known publishers of medical works, issue a circular announcing for publication in August, September, and October next a long list of works valuable to the profession, and among them is one which may be of interest to the unprofessional reader. It is rather strangely described as being "by the author of 'Protoplasm'"—a title which one would say is the property of Professor Huxley—and is called "Life Theories: their Influence on Religious Thought." The author is Dr. Lionel S. Beale. The unprofessional reader may, perhaps, be interested in another of Messrs. Lindsay & Blakiston's books: namely, a translation of Dr. Duchenne's work on the use of electricity as a healing agent. The translator, who is Dr. Tibbits, Superintendent of the London Hospital for Paralyzed and Epileptic Patients, adds to Dr. Duchenne's treatise many notes of his own.

—In their Monthly Bulletin, Messrs. Lee & Shepard give some account of the Swedish novelist whom they are introducing to the American public, and quote a letter of hers to her American translators which presents her in a pleasant light. Madame Sophie Marie Schwarz began writing in 1852, in which year she published "The Preface," which had, she says, youthful defects, but also was thought to have merit, so that in the same year "Unprotected," the story of two illegitimate children, and written, says Madame Schwarz, "too much in the French style," was published and received with kindness. In the course of the next year appeared "The Marriage," "Self-Interest," and "The Passions," and, before 1858, such was the author's fertility, she had published fourteen works of fiction, besides numerous smaller writings. In 1858 appeared the first of her "novels of purpose," a variety of fiction that she afterwards cultivated a good deal, and then gave up, for the creditable reason, which we wish some of our story-tellers would consider, that, warmly as she felt her heart beating in behalf of some of the causes which she wished to promote, she perceived that she was not equal to solving the problems with which she had been trying to deal. This confession she makes so frankly—and upon her perception of its truth she acted with honesty—that it speaks very much in her favor, and determines us to think well of her books in spite of her productiveness, so ominous of ill, until we have read some of them. This we hope to do shortly, and to relate our experience to our readers. It was in this year, 1858, that she first became fashionable in her own country, and since then she has written no less than twenty-five stories, which have all been well received. She has had the honor of translation into Dutch, French, English, Polish, and German, and is said to be popular wherever she is known. Since 1865 she has been writing under two agreements with Otto Janke, a Berlin publisher, the first being one which bound her to publish with him in German one year before she publishes in Swedish, and to publish in Swedish under a pseudonym; the second, now in force, binding her, in consideration of a larger honorarium than she had been receiving, not to publish certain of her books in Sweden till they had been three years published in Berlin—rather singular compacts, which Herr Janke may, perhaps, be pleased to see in print. Madame Schwarz praises highly the work of Miss Selma Borg, a Swedish lady, and Miss M. A. Brown, an American lady, who have jointly translated her books for the Boston publishers. As it does not appear that she habitually uses English, it is not clear that her judgment on this head is of value; but authors have a way of passing such encomiums on their translators as contentedly as our philanthropists and clergymen, qua philanthropists and clergymen, testify to the relative excellence of pianos, or warrant chromo-lithographs to be "as good as the original"—which, indeed, they often are; but for a reason which the clergyman and the philanthropist suspect not.

—Under pressure of fear of the cholera, we here in New York, some years since, gave to our Board of Health as much power as the most paternal government could desire, and the board made some use of its despotic authority, and to good purpose, but in ordinary times we allow it to do as little as it likes, and other American cities are not so very much better than ours in this respect. Nor indeed are foreign cities. All chimneys in England do not yet consume their own smoke, despite the Act of Parliament enjoining it upon them, and, to hear Mr. Ruskin talk of English rivers, one might suppose that the sewage question and kindred questions had never been broached. But there are signs of improvement; though the public is not yet convinced that there should be such a thing as "state medicine," and the more enlightened classes represented by the Royal Sanitary Commission are not so enlightened as to prevent that body of medical officers from proposing that the supervision of the public health by enforcement of sanitary legislation should be entrusted to the Poor Law medical officers, of whom, says Nature, there are more than 4,000 in England alone. When we consider the character of the British medical student; when we recollect that it is not the medical student of the best type who goes into general practice in country towns; and when we think of the very slender acquirements upon which may be based, and oftenest is based, a successful claim for a license, it stands to reason that the poor-law authorities probably have in their four thousand physicians a very great many men who know little about medicine, and very little indeed about the best means and methods for preserving the health of towns. Indeed, for that matter a man may be an excellent physician, and yet be altogether incompetent to advise the state as to its sanitary legislation. Recognizing this truth, the university of Dublin has addressed itself to the task of supplying the state with medical men versed in state medicine, and a month ago held its first examination, which was open to all doctors of medicine of the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin. The course arranges itself under the heads of law, engineering, vital and sanitary statistics, meteorology, pathology, chemistry, and medical jurisprudence, and the successful candidate must show himself acquainted with the legislation relative to sanitary measures, to the conduct and duties of medical men, to vaccination, to inoculation, and to the management of lunatic asylums; he must have enough of engineering to know what are the sanitary laws regulating the construction, arrangement, and equipment of hospitals, barracks, troop-ships, prisons, water-works, and sewers; he must know what has been accomplished in the science of statistics as applied to the health of man; in chemistry, he must have studied the proportions of air, water, gaseous poisons, and of the principal disinfecting and deodorizing agents; in pathology, the laws of contagion and infection, and the influence of hereditary predisposition; in meteorology, the effects on life and health of various climates, and of changes of the weather. This, it will be seen, is a long and interesting course, and the successful candidate for a diploma will doubtless be able to do the state much service. The aimless young Americans, with money and leisure, "who do not enter on political life," and who, according to one of our religious papers, really have nothing to do, might profitably betake themselves to Dublin, and there prepare themselves to come home, and be efficient members of our boards of charities and correction and boards of health. Or it is not improbable that they may be able so to prepare themselves without crossing the water; the medical school of Harvard University, being, as it is, on the point of transforming itself, may see fit to establish a course of instruction such as "the silent sister," greatly to her honor, has established.

— It may be that the increased cost of making books in America enables English publishers to undersell American; or it may be that, because nature abhors a vacuum, English books rush in to supply the lack of American—for, since the days of Woolsey and Felton, American editions of the higher classics have been few and far between. Whatever may be the cause, there are several series of English text-books that have come largely into use in this country within a year or two, and by their cheapness, neatness, and intrinsic excellence are likely to be used more and more, and perhaps to preoccupy the field against future American editions. Of these is the Catena Classicorum, of which Messrs. Sever, Francis & Co. are the American publishers, and which, so far as issued, consists entirely of Greek works. The edition of Thucydides in this series is to be prepared by Rev. Charles Bigg and Mr. G. A. Simcox, in alternate volumes, the first volume, by Mr. Bigg, comprising the first and second books. The introduction contains a brief life of Thucydides and a discussion of the date at which he wrote, which is placed at B.C. 403 or 404, after his return from exile. Then follows an essay on "some characteristics of Thucydides," in which the historian is hardly rated so high as has been common among modern critics. The analysis of his defects, and the way in which they were connected with the circumstances of the time and the spirit of the age, is interesting and instructive, even if it should be thought that his merits have not full justice done them. The notes appear to be very judicious; we have been especially pleased by those which illustrate the politics of the Greeks in commenting upon the Funeral Oration of Pericles.

—"If an Algonkin place name is to be misinterpreted," says Mr. J. H. Trumbull, "the misinterpretation is usually made on the supposed authority of Eliot. When his version is referred to for the purpose of finding an Algonkin word corresponding to one in the English text, the chances are that an affix or primitive is mistaken for the root. There are few writers on American languages who have not somewhere been led into error by relying on statements made on the alleged authority of Eliot's Bible or of Zeisberger's Grammar of the Lenni Lenape (Delaware) language." And Mr. Trumbull goes on to convict of error Max Müller among others, Mr. Duponceau, Mr. Farrar, Vater, and Adelung, and adds that the Indian Bible has been a common place of resort for philologists with some shaky linguistic structure for which they have been unable to find support, unless something of Eliot's could be so wrenched as to be of service to them. Thus it happens that the missionary's great work often goes without the credit which is its due, and the Indians also have been unduly depreciated. Mr. Farrar, for instance, in order to illustrate "the primordial and unbroken barbarism of the North American Indians," and to exhibit "the almost imbecile deficiency of abstraction" which characterizes Indian languages, says on the authority of M. Duponceau—whose dictum is founded on a guess made by Mr. Hackewelder—that when an Algonkin wished to say, "I am that I am," the nearest he could come to that gratification was to say, "I do I do," for his language had no substantive verb. Now, it is to be admitted, says Mr. Trumbull, that the Algonkin tongues have no substantive verb; but to supply the want of one every Algonkin tongue has several verbs to express the where and the how of being—conditioned existence. Ohtau, for example, means he has, he owns; ohteau means it has itself; ayeuonk (place) ohteau is therefore Eliot's translation of Judges xviii. 12, "the place is;" the place has itself. So also Appu, meaning "he sits," is used in its various forms to mean he remains, abides, and so, continues to be. Ayeu is another modal verb, which is easily made to do some duty for the verb substantive. It means to be in some place designated. Another part of Mr. Trumbull's little essay—which forms a part of the last year's Transactions of the American Philological Society, but is here printed separately—is devoted to the error of maintaining that Eliot found and used in his version an Indian definite article—mo, "contracted from monko, and properly signifying it," and, by Eliot, still further contracted into m, which, whenever it occurs before a consonant, Eliot joins to the latter by a u or an e. Yet it may be easily shown, Mr. Trumbull remarks, that the m' prefixed to certain classes of Algonkin nouns is not a definite article, that it does not stand for mo, that mo is not a contraction for monko, and that monko does not stand for it. Metah, for example, does not mean the heart in Eliot's Bible, or elsewhere. Mo is a negative particle, standing in Eliot's vocabulary for not, but oftenest used by him as the sign of the preterit tense to denote completed action, that which was and is not. The office of the prefixed m' was just the reverse of that of a definite article. It was used not with all nouns, but a few only, and with the names of the body and its members, of articles belonging to the person, and of terms expressing relationship, and, as its force was always negative, it was used with these to divest them of all personal and individual appropriation. For example, when an Indian, spoke of the heart, it was his habit to use with it a pronominal prefix, as "my heart," "your heart," "his heart." So, when he wished to speak of heart in the abstract, he used a negative word, and said m'tah, which means "heart not mine, not yours, not his," etc. Mr. Trumbull contends also that it is an error to assert the existence of a vocative case in the Massachusetts and Delaware dialects of the Algonkin speech, whatever may be the truth as regards other dialects; and that it is not true that the Indian verb is never found without a pronominal suffix.

—Accompanying the essay on mistaken notions of Algonkin grammar is another which also was contributed to the Transactions of the Philological Society, and which, doubtless, was of interest to that body, and will interest other students of linguistics. "On the Best Methods of Studying the American Languages" is the title of it, and the author begins by pointing out that, if we look through the entire collection of materials for the study of our aboriginal tongues, we shall find that a great part of it is absolutely worthless to the critical student of language. A principal source of error in this, as in other fields of philology, has been that in the collecting and arranging of materials there has often been constant reference to some other languages previously known. Thus, one writer searches twenty American languages for Egyptian roots. Of course, he is just the man to find them in abundance, and it may be imagined of how much service his labors are likely to be. Another, after having, to use his own words, "pursued the comparative examination of the Haytien language and dialects upon all the languages of the earth," announces that the Haytiens are of "Pelagic origin," but that the Northern Algonkins are to be assigned to Central Asia. A third presents a list of words which exhibit the likeness of the Micmac to classical Greek. The rage for collecting words into vocabularies, with the Indian word set against the English, has also, in Mr. Trumbull's opinion, been of bad result. It is next to impossible, he says, to translate any Indian name or verb by any English name or verb. In English, the analytical tendency has attained its fullest development, and, by the use of independent words to express grammatical relations, it has reduced a great part of its vocabulary to monosyllables. The Indians, on the contrary, carry the synthetical method to its fullest development; as Gallatin says, to express in a single word "not only all that modifies or relates to the same object or action, but both the action and the object, thus concentrating in a single expression a complex idea, or several ideas, among which there is a natural connection," is their constant aim. Thus, if an Indian would say what an Englishman says in the words, "He, falling down upon his knees, made supplication to him," he would put it, as Eliot did, into this one word, wutappesittukqussunoowehtunkquoh. This is an extraordinary instance, to be sure, but there is an example still more remarkable in the Indian reading of the words, "Our well-skilled looking-glass makers," which is recorded by Rev. Experience Mayhew, a minister on Martha's Vineyard. It runs as follows: Nuppahknuhtopepenauwutehutchuhquokanehchaeninnumununonk. And this tendency to synthesis is to be seen in the very roots of the language, and characterizes the primary verbs as certainly as it does Mr. Mayhew's twenty-two syllabled word. For example: there is an infinitude of verbs to express being under all conditions, but there is no Indian verb over against which, in its vocabularies, we may properly set the English verb to be. So, too, of the verb to go; it has no Indian equivalent, but the Indian verbs of motion are almost numberless, as to go by paddle, on foot, jumping, flying, after a person, aslant, by a devious path, and so forth. Evidently nothing is gained when a man has collected his list of three or four hundred Indian words, and opposite such words as "to go-on a-foraging-expedition-on-horseback" has placed our verb "to go," "to travel." The Indian nouns, too, present difficulties to the mere maker of vocabularies, unless he sedulously obeys a rule which Mr. Trumbull lays down as of prime importance to the student of our American languages, and sets himself to the task of taking apart, by analysis, what the Indian has so carefully and skilfully put together by his agglutinative synthesis. An Indian noun may rather be said to have tenses than cases; it is predicative, and asserts something, and can seldom be translated into English without an adverb. Thus, the beaver is "the feller of trees" in one Algonkin dialect; another makes him the one "putting his head out of the water." Of general names, of abstract nouns, no Indian language knows anything, and each noun must be taken as a piece of true description—not description as "horse" is in the ears of most men who hear it, but as it is in the ears of an etymologist, who knows it means "neigher." The Chippeway word for the same animal literally means the creature "whose hoofs are all solid;" the Massachusetts word is "the beast that carries on his back a living burden;" while the Dakota is "the wonderful domestic animal." Mr. Trumbull concludes his essay with some directions as to the lines of investigation which it is most profitable to follow out, and, doubtless, would send the pamphlet to any enquirer who—like some of our officers on the frontier, for instance—is so situated as to be of service to philology. Such an enquirer could not fail to find it very useful to him, coming, as it does, from the authority who is recognized as the highest in this branch of philology.

—By a unanimous vote of the corporation of Yale College, Professor Noah Porter was elected to the presidency of that institution, the office having been made vacant by the resignation, after twenty-five years of service, of President Woolsey. President Porter, who is now about sixty years of age, has been a professor in the college for twenty-five years. With all that has been done there, and with all the working of the present system of instruction and government, President Porter is, then, thoroughly conversant, and, as he joins to his intimate acquaintance with the college a character which makes him widely beloved and respected, knowledge of the world as well as of books, it may be considered certain that he will make a highly successful president of Yale as she is. It is not to be denied that it may have been a disappointment to some of the friends of the college that the new president was not taken from among men who believe in the "new education" as it is called, and who think Yale is less like a university for men, and more like a school for boys, than she might be and more than she should be; and this whether the young men's interests or her own are considered. But there seemed to be no such candidate, and we take it to be certain that the public opinion at Yale and among her graduates does not yet approve of the proposed changes, and that the new president represents well the best judgment of nine out of every ten men upon whom the college must lean for support. As an instructor Mr. Porter has been more successful than as an author—though in virtue of his work entitled "The Human Intellect," he holds a good rank among American metaphysicians—and has the affectionate respect of innumerable pupils. The college will not witness violent changes in the course of his administration, but an equable and easy movement in the accustomed channels may be expected with confidence.

—The resignation of President Woolsey, the election of Professor Porter, and the admission of six of the alumni into the corporation, where they take the places of the six senior members of the State senate, were marked by the beginning of an attempt to raise a fund of five hundred thousand dollars, which is to be unrestricted and for the general uses of the college, and is to be called the Woolsey Fund. A committee of fifty, for the collection and provisional management of the fund, is to be formed, and the following named gentlemen are already appointed as members of it, the first ten in order being the original committee, which was empowered to raise its number to fifty, and which at once added the seventeen names that follow: Noah Porter, of the class of 1831; Munsell B. Field, of the class of 1841; Timothy Dwight, of the class of 1849; D. C. Gilman, of the class of 1852; Charles A. White, of the class of 1854; Wm. G. Sumner, of the class of 1863; Edward G. Mason, of the class of 1860; Mason Young, of the class of 1860; Joseph H. Twichell, of the class of 1859; M. Dwight Collier, of the class of 1866. Hon. Thomas L. Bayne, New Orleans; Hon. B. Gratz Brown, St. Louis; Gen. G. Mason Brown, Kentucky; Hon. W. A. Buckingham, Norwich, Conn.; Hon. W. M. Evarts, New York; Hon. Dwight Foster, Boston; Hon. Wm. L. Learned, Albany; Prof. F. W. Fiske, Chicago; Hon. H. H. Haight, San Francisco; Hon. A. Q. Keasbey, Newark; Hon. W. P. Lynde, Milwaukee; Hon. Wm. Strong, Philadelphia; Hon. H. H. Raymond, Charleston; Dr. Wm. H. Stokes, Baltimore; Hon. A. Taft, Cincinnati; Hon. A. D. White, Ithaca; Hon. R. P. Spalding, Cleveland. Half-a-million is a good deal of money, but doubtless the always ready patriotism of Yale will not be vainly called upon, and the committee will report favorably before its five years are out.

—"The Convention of Washington contrived for the Destruction, not the Reconciliation, of Great Britain and the United States," is the rather dismal title of a little pamphlet containing a petition which has been laid before the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty by Mr. John Hindle, Mr. Joseph Foden, Mr. E. Mensforth, and other persons, who represent themselves as acting under the orders of the "Foreign Affairs Committees"—whatever they may be—of Cheshire, Lancashire, Yorkshire, Birmingham, Maidstone, and St. Pancras (London). They seem to be not very strong as publicists. They say that "they live in daily terror lest England should disappear as a great power from Europe," for her strength is chiefly maritime, and under the benumbing effect of the Declaration of Paris it cannot now be put forth. They add that it is with them a subject of lasting gratitude that her Majesty has never in any way sanctioned that suicidal Declaration—though what they mean by this is not clear—and that they hope she will refuse her sanction to the equally fatal Declaration of Washington. They find it ominous that the treaty in question was signed on the 8th of May, for it was on an 8th of May that the Treaty of London was signed—a document by which the other powers interfered in the domestic affairs of Denmark, and paved the way for the dismemberment of that country, the demolition of the German Confederation, and the unhappy defeat of France. Their fourth cause of despondency Mr. Hindle and his friends find in the fact that the King of Italy is to be among the arbitrators, he "having obtained a great part of his dominions by means of the Garibaldian expeditions, which, being piratical, were similar in character to that of the Alabama," and thus being unfitted to sit in judgment upon a case so much like his own. They seem to hold the opinion which "some well-informed parties" were holding in Washington this spring, that Victor Emanuel would pack up his Grotius and Vattel and Von Martens and Wheaton and Mr. Seward's despatches, betake himself to the country, go into his closet, bring his own proper mind to bear on the controversy, and after some studious months come out with his award. In fact, their "sixthly" is not at all unlike the "apprehensions" of our "well-informed parties," who were in fear that the Emperor of Germany might die, in which case the arbitrating which he was to do would have to be done by his son, "who had married a daughter of Victoria, Queen of England," and would so decide as to ingratiate himself with his mother-in-law. The petitioners say that they fear for England, sixthly, "because the arbitrator in the San Juan Channel business is the Emperor of Germany, who has never fulfilled any of the treaties he has made, has broken up the German Confederation of which he was a member, has perfidiously annexed the Kingdom of Hanover, and has shown in his war with France a disposition so ambitious and unscrupulous as to make it impossible to rely upon his judgment in any matter, far less upon one in which a false issue is put before him." The conduct of the war against France is a curiously selected illustration of defective judgment. The petitioners, we may say in conclusion, though they do not exhibit great talents for diplomacy, appear to have plenty of good intentions; so far, at least, as concerns their own country and this.

—The Commune destroyed the Vendôme Column, the Tuileries, and the Hôtel de Ville; it tried to destroy the Revue des Deux Mondes, which would have been a greater loss to France and the civilized world in general, but in this it completely failed. The order of suppression was issued after the publication of the number of May 15, and before the next semi-monthly number was to appear, the Commune was no more. It must, however, be acknowledged that the Revue nobly deserved the order, and that its tenor during the nine weeks of the Communal sway was in every respect worthy of its character and its past. Not only did it continue to present to its readers regularly and calmly, as it had done during the German siege, its periodical budgets of philosophical, historical, and entertaining literature; but not in a single number did it hide its political convictions, or alter its tone under the influence of the terror exercised by the raving apostles of the millennium proclaimed on the 18th of March. The regular and able expounder of the political opinions of the Revue, Charles de Mazade, it is true, surrendered his pen for the month following that dies nefastus—for reasons not stated—to F. de Lagenedais, but before the 1st of May he was again at his post as the writer of the "Chronique de la Quinzaine," and both chroniclers were equally unflinching and outspoken in denouncing the origin, the follies, and the crimes, and foretelling the doom, of the insurrectionary government, though prudently refraining from all personal allusions.

—"The date and the form of the dénouement in Paris," wrote M. de Lagenedais on April 14, "are slow in becoming known; but the doubts about the dénouement itself have vanished. Paris will not oppress France. . . . Right will triumph; this is now assured to us; and, however painful self-felicitation on a success in these fratricidal struggles may be, over that victory we shall have to congratulate ourselves. The nationality of France, so grievously wounded, is in question; it must be saved at any price." "The great achievement of the fortnight is the army, reorganized by the skilful activity of M. Thiers, and through patriotism restored to its sentiment of duty; and if this achievement has not yet been crowned with a triumph in Paris, it is because it would be necessary to shed more blood to have it sooner, and because humanity commands patience when patience can no longer anywhere produce uncertainty." A fortnight later M. de Mazade wrote: "What would be the result if this situation could extend itself, if the sway established in Paris under the name of the Commune could expand, and assume an appearance of duration? It would be the moral, political, material, and national ruin of France; it would be the dissolution of French unity itself." And under date of May 14, he says of the chiefs of the insurrection: "They will have had their quarter of an hour of ephemeral domination only to mark their passage through ruins of their own making. They will have used their existence only for representing the violation of right and liberty under all their forms. If they were to triumph, they would represent only a vulgar usurpation." And as to the near future he adds correctly: "To judge by the signs of decomposition which manifest themselves in the Commune, the end is before us." It was these utterances which exhausted the forbearance of the Commune.

HENRY BROUGHAM.*

THIS first volume of Lord Brougham's autobiography, covering thirty-two years of his life, contains little that could help the reader to detect a chancellor en herbe, or foretell a great reformer. Not because it fails to show the lines of character already marked, and the theatre of action already prepared, but Henry Brougham, among all the men of his time, was the one who found occasions rather than made them, and one-third of his life had gone by before his great occasion befel. His genius was not constructive so much as modifying; in literature, he criticised and compiled, but did not create; in law, he amended more than he originated; in statesmanship, he cleared the paths that others pointed out. And if he has left no finished work, and perhaps no lasting fame, it is because his life fluctuated with the events to which he attached it, rather than developed steadily on fixed principles in some chosen course.

Born and trained in Edinburgh, fighting his way and satisfying for a time at least his highest ambition in the wider sphere of London, yielding to rest only so much as his declining years compelled in France, he had the true perfervidum ingenium Scotorum, the pushing energy, the shrewd calculation of interest, the firm grasp of opportunities, that have so often led his countrymen to success, and always saved them from failure. With weaker predominance of his intellectual over his moral nature, less intense personality, and more steady principle, he might have become great instead of remaining only extraordinary.

Brougham records the respectable mediocrity of his many ancestors, without making any clearer claim to that high descent which his enemies ridiculed him for affecting. Perhaps his assumption of the title of Vaux justified them in supposing that uncertainty rather than modesty forbade the claim. But from his maternal grandmother, the sister of the historian Robertson, remarkable for her masculine intellect and clear understanding, he inherited better things than rank or lands. He might have thanked her if she had transmitted her singular beauty too, and so spared him the conspicuous contrast between the handsome Lyndhurst and his almost grotesque successor. From her he derived his thirst for information and his persevering energy, and a far less active mind than his must have gained strength and expansion by intercourse with the able teachers and intelligent society that surrounded him. His companions, too, of his own age, men such as Jeffrey, Horner, Young, Cockburn, Mackintosh, were all youths of parts and ambition, and all rose to distinction in their several pursuits. A brief record made by his mother notes that his great mental powers showed themselves early, and his aptitude to learn continued progressive. From very tender years he excelled all his contemporaries. Nothing to him was a labor, no task prescribed that was not performed long before the time expected. At a very early age he showed considerable talent for speaking in public, and was distinguished for close argument and extreme quickness in reply, seasoned perhaps with a little too much sarcasm. But there was nothing of the prig about him or his companions. The debates of the Speculative Society were relieved by "high-jinks" at the Apollo Club; and the sea-green doors of the New Town, with their huge knockers and brass bell-handles, tempted the endless restlessness of these youths to pranks which Brougham, writing at ninety years of age, recalls with pleasure and even exultation.

Yet with all that they were fed upon, his powers at first took no definite direction. His early fancy of a special aptitude for science never left him in after-life, and it is not unlikely that exclusive devotion to those pursuits might have made his name eminent. At the age of sixteen he conceives himself to have hit upon the binomial theorem in algebra, and a paper on the Newtonian theory of light, which he sent to the Royal Society when seventeen, contains, he declares, the first suggestion of photography. But it becomes clear enough that such efforts were but tentative, and inspired by eagerness for distinction rather than pure love of science, when we learn that he produced about the same time an utterly useless paper on porisms. A porism is defined as "a geometrical proposition aiming to find the conditions that will reader certain problems indeterminate"—and not even Brougham, writing at cold ninety, can persuade us that a hot-blooded Scotch youth of seventeen years was ever as much in love with porisms as he was with paradox and publicity. What his strength of all kinds was at this time may be gathered from the unwilling testimony given some years later by Wilson, who never liked as much as he wondered at his eccentric countryman: "The Lord Harry has more brains than all the rest put together, and has watered them with more toddy, and latterly claret, than would float the whole kit to perdition."

On leaving the university, Brougham made a brief yachting excursion among the Western Islands, of which, to judge from his own account, frolic was more the object than science. "Every morning we shoot grouse, hares, and deer, till five o clock, then eat luxurious dinners, drinking claret, champagne, hermitage, and hock; at night we are uniformly and universally dead drunk." This was followed by a longer tour through Denmark and Scandinavia. There is little of interest in the journal of these travels, if we except a curious story of an apparition, which is dismissed with the matter-of-fact observation, "I believe that every such seeming miracle is, like every ghost-story, capable of explanation." Brougham was never likely in his most excited moments to yield an inch to imagination.

At the age of twenty-three he was admitted an advocate in Edinburgh. How little he was satisfied either with his residence or his profession may be inferred from letters written in 1800, declared that he "continued more and more to detest this place and this cursedest of cursed professions." Evidently the romantic city, pale Edina, wanted for him the spell it exercised over his more poetic contemporary, Scott. He declares that he had an invincible repugnance to the profession, and constantly wrote to friends in London, expressing his desire to escape from it, and to accept any opening in diplomacy. Brougham, in truth, was not meant for a lawyer. He was too petulant and hasty in temper, too impatient of rule and restraint, ever to have risen to the height of his profession unaided by politics. A merely great studious lawyer, like his contemporary Denman, or an oratorical one such as Erskine was, or a philosophical one such as Romilly, he could never have become. It was in cases concerning state interests, or public institutions like the press, that his ardor and passion made him truly great. It was in the vehemence of attack preceding reform that he found his real work. At this period of his life the death in a duel of a brother to whom he was much attached leads to the singular confession that he verily believes his mind was for a time unhinged, for he left Edinburgh and wandered about he knew not where. This unconscious admission is worthy of remark. It betrays a want of mental balance noticed at more than one point in his future course. Throughout his career, calculated eccentricity and strained originality contradicted Scotch sedateness, and made his enemies whisper and his friends grieve. During his early practice on circuit in Scotland, his excesses of audacity at the expense of the bench caused his wits rather than his wit to be called in question. And after his descent from the woolsack, the singularity of his conversation while in Paris, and his long brooding retirement in the country, gave rise to grave fears as to his sanity. His restless and irregular mental action more than once threatened to pass into aberration.

* "The Life and Times of Henry, Lord Brougham. Written by himself." In 3 vols. Vol. I. New York: Harper & Brothers. 380 pp. 12mo.

Brougham's sketches of the leaders of the Scotch bar at this period are full of generous discrimination. While tracing with much nicety of truth the special merits of the chief lawyers of his time there, he attributes the success of Jeffrey to the fact, mentioned without being explained, that literary reputation, which would prove fatal in Westminster Hall, rather aided than impeded a lawyer's progress in Edinburgh. Yet he adds illogically that Scott had no success at the bar, and that the works of Kaimes and Monboddo were the fruit of their leisure after being raised to the bench. Whether as an aid to success or from strong natural bent, he devoted himself more to literature than to practice. A compilation on the colonial policy of the European powers made his name known to the political world. Viewed in the light of later experience and studies upon the subject, this production seems crude and indefinite; but the topic was then new, and the idea of writing upon it at all made him marked. In 1802, he became, with Jeffrey, Horner, and Sidney Smith, one of the founders of the Edinburgh Review, of the origin and management of which he gives a detailed narrative, correcting the "fanciful account" of Sidney Smith. The Review was designed to promote sound and liberal opinions upon all questions in church and state at a time when protection reigned triumphant, parliamentary representation in Scotland scarcely existed, the Catholics were unemancipated, men were hung for stealing a few shillings, the horrors of the slave-trade were tolerated, and the prevailing tendencies of the age were jobbery and corruption. The first triumph and continued success of the Review astonished its projectors. The most accomplished men in every department of thought became its contributors. The price paid for articles was at first ten, and afterwards twenty guineas, for a sheet of sixteen pages; and all who wrote, no matter what their station, were required to accept payment. A history of the Edinburgh Review would fill a small volume; it is enough to say here that Brougham's support of it continued untiring and powerful for many years. To the first four numbers he gave twenty-one articles, and in the first twenty he wrote eighty; and he congratulates himself with reason and modesty on his share in creating its permanent and excellent influence. It might have amused his readers to find an authentic account of his onslaught in 1809 upon Byron's milk-and-water first effusions, and the compliment to "blundering Brougham" it provoked. Byron's own note to his satire indicates how little known out of Scotland Brougham was at that time.

In 1804, Brougham made a tour through Holland, with the professed object of obtaining information on the subject of the slave-trade. He extended his travels to Italy, going as an American with American papers and passport; but his journal contains little worth observation, unless it may be some simple but sensible criticism on the pictures and theatres of Venice, and a brief description of St. Peter's. Returning to England, and after an unsuccessful attempt to organize at Edinburgh a volunteer force —an attempt which was treated by the Government with a neglect that he justly resents—Brougham at length obtained his introduction into public life. This was through an appointment as the secretary of a special mission to the court of Lisbon, intended to counteract Napoleon's presumed design of invading Portugal. The mission was fruitless, as it deserved to be, for it was suggested by suspicion, and planned with insolent treachery. Its purpose, as explained in detail, was to concert aid against a French attack, and, if this should be refused, to seize and transport the Portuguese fleet and court to Brazil, and compel the transference of the government thither! A more mad and wicked scheme of national kidnapping it would be hard to devise. And yet Lord Brougham, while giving a minute account of the plot, and alleging that it was copied from Cortez's seizure of Montezuma, finds no stronger words of condemnation than to say that it was not grounded on good faith. Possibly not; but neither the failure nor the infamy deterred the English Government from as criminal a breach of international law in the seizure of the Danish fleet on a like pretext the year after. The secretary to the Lisbon conspiracy seems to have labored faithfully, and without any compensation from his employers, unless he may, perhaps, have counted it an advantage to have made his first acquaintance with the "tricks and manners" of questionable queens.

The opening of a public career thus gained was sedulously followed up by correspondence and intimacy with leading men of the Whig party. That choice of the party to which his instincts and his training both inclined him being once made, Brougham continued always faithful to it. Capricious and impracticable as he often was, there was nothing false or tortuous about him, and all his future political connections, abstinences, and enmities were dictated by passion, and not by interest. Already, in 1803, he had taken the necessary steps for admission to the society of Lincoln's Inn, and two years later he transferred his home to London. The memoir is vexatiously meagre as regards his first years of professional and social life. Among the Whig leaders, and at Holland House, "the favorite resort of wits and beauties, of painters and poets, of scholars, philosophers, and statesmen," he became a power, from his talent for conversation, his social dexterity, and his occasional sarcasm. But practice came slowly to him, and it was not until the year 1808, when he was thirty years of age, that the occasion arrived which may be said to have made his professional fortune. He was retained as counsel before Parliament for the Liverpool merchants, petitioning against the Orders in Council adopted in reprisal for Napoleon's Berlin decree blockading the British Isles, and for several successive days he spoke brilliantly and impressively before large audiences. It was still two years, however, before he took the next step in his career, by entering Parliament on the nomination of the Duke of Bedford for the pocket borough of Camelford. A letter from the Earl of Rosslyn, in answer to Brougham's request for advice on this occasion, is worth preserving for the good sense inspiring its views of English political and professional life. His maiden speech, made after a month of surprising silence, upon a motion to censure a member of the Cabinet for unconstitutional conduct, was remarked only for its moderation and mildness. He never afterwards exposed himself to a like criticism.

With this beginning of his parliamentary career, at the age of thirty-two, the first volume of Lord Brougham's memoirs closes, leaving the really interesting part of his life yet to be told. The book makes no pretensions to style, edited as it is under peremptory directions to his executor that nothing the manuscript contained should be altered or re-written. But the personal portrait is not the less firmly drawn because it wants miniature finish; and the naturalness of the traits, the side-lights lent by anecdotes and letters, fully make up for any carelessness in artistic execution.

WOOLMAN'S JOURNAL.*

JUNE of last year was a hundred and ten years since John Woolman, in the course of one of the most memorable journeys of his life, having crossed from Long Island to New London "in a large open boat," presented himself at Yearly Meeting at Newport. The proverbial "Quaker fog" which prevails at that season may have exaggerated his ungainly form in the eyes of his brethren, but it could have added little to the distortion with which fancy had prepared them to view so notorious a disturber of the peace of slaveholding and slave-trading communities. Of these, Newport was then one of the foremost, and the Friends were as deeply involved in ventures to the Guinea coast, and in buying, selling, and holding their fellow-creatures, as were the most reputable of the "world's people" their townsmen. Woolman's labors were direct and eminently practical. He spoke in meeting, he entreated members privately at their homes, he endeavored to get a hearing before the legislature. Thanks largely to his efforts, the movement had already begun in the Friends' Society which was, ere long, to purge it of complicity with slavery. The "short essay of a petition" which he had prepared to be signed for the abolition of the slave-trade in Rhode Island, and which he "felt easy to leave among Friends, for them to proceed in it as they believed best," was probably pocketed in the committee which Friends have devised for such emergencies. The good seed, nevertheless, was sown, and, in December, 1783, the Quakers were sufficiently advanced to petition the legislature to abolish slavery. An act was promptly drawn, accordingly, but consideration of it was postponed till the next session of the Assembly, and final action was reached only in the fall of 1787.

Mr. Whittier has traced in his Introduction, which is written with a purity of style that makes us regret his exceptional appearance in prose, the history of the connection, or rather of the disconnection, of the Friends with slavery. He conceals nothing of the truth, and only claims for them the just honor of being the first Christian denomination to feel troubled in conscience because of African bondage, and to establish a uniform practice in opposition to it by making it a disciplinable offence. We do not disparage the Quakers, but merely come to the rescue of human nature, when we dwell on the fact that Mr. Whittier's historical sketch proves that the Quaker creed was not, of itself, more saving than any other against what we now regard as the greatest crime of which man is capable. The peculiar tenderness and humanity which we associate with the character of Friends, while it doubtless mitigated the hardships of servitude under them, was not instinctively shocked by the very contemplation of the cruelties of the system as practised around them. Woolman, indeed—partly from expediency, it may be admitted, but doubtless also from the natural working of his mind as a sectarian—was wont to picture the slave as the object and occasion of wars sooner than as the suffering "man and brother" of the later Abolitionists. "As purchasing any merchandise taken by the sword," he said to the Yearly Meeting in Virginia (p. 111), "was always allowed to be inconsistent with our principles, so negroes, being captives of war, or taken by stealth, it was inconsistent with our testimony to buy them; and their being our fellow-creatures, and sold as slaves, added greatly to the iniquity." Even in the wilderness of Northern Pennsylvania, his sorrowful and constant reflections on the evils of slavery, which led him to feel, "in that which is immutable, that the seeds of great calamity and desolation are sown, and growing fast on this continent," took the shape of "a close, laborious enquiry" whether he, "as an individual, kept clear from all things which tended to stir up or were connected with wars, either in this land or in Africa" (p. 194). At this period (1763) the Quakers, professing to be in a peculiar sense followers of the Prince of Peace, differed in no particular from the other Christian denominations in regard to the rightfulness of slaveholding and slave-trading; in other words, their creed offered no test of superior Christian virtue or non-conformity with general usage.

* "The Journal of John Woolman. With an Introduction by John G. Whittier." Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1871. 12mo, pp. 315.

It may be worth while to illustrate this somewhat further by enquiring into the relations of Friends to slavery in the United States, after it had ceased to be permitted in the Society, but when it had become sacred in the public opinion of all parts of the Union. On this point we shall summon but a single witness, and that a saint not surpassed by Woolman himself—the late Rev. Samuel J. May. He, too, visited Yearly Meeting at Newport, in June, 1835, hoping to get from it some "testimony on slavery." The whole story is told on pp. 147-150 of his "Recollections of the Anti-Slavery Conflict"—how the wealthy Friends in the cotton manufacture secured the public halls of the city against him during the continuance of Yearly Meeting; how they even tried to have him excluded from the principal hotel, and, failing in that, had their meals served apart; how they refused him permission to attend their "Meeting on Sufferings," in order to state the objects of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and refused to give the desired testimony. What follows must not be abridged:

"An arrangement was then made by the members who were Abolitionists, many of whom boarded with me at 'Whitfield's,' that I should address as many as saw fit to meet me in the large reception-room of the hotel, in the evening of the second day of my visit. So soon as this was known, it was asked of me if I would consent to let the meeting be conducted somewhat in the manner of 'The Society of Friends,' so that any who should be moved to speak might have the liberty. I acquiesced most cheerfully, not doubting that I should be moved, and should be expected to address the meeting first, and give the direction to it.

"Fifty or sixty persons assembled at the hour appointed. Deeming it respectful to my Quaker brethren to sit in silence a few minutes after the meeting came to order, I did so; and in so doing, lost my chance to be heard. A wily brother took advantage of my sense of propriety, rose before me, and delivered a long discourse upon slavery, made up of the commonplaces and platitudes of the subject, about which all were agreed. He was followed instantly by another in the same vein, and, when the evening was far spent, and the auditors were beginning to withdraw, I was permitted to speak a few minutes upon the vital points in the questions between the Immediate Abolitionists and the slaveholders on the one hand, and the Colonizationists on the other hand."

When purposing a voyage to the West Indies, Woolman had argued himself into the conviction that he could take passage with a good conscience only by paying more than the usual rates, as the penalty for thus encouraging what he called the "excessive" and not very moral trade with those islands. Subsequently, crossing over to England, he preferred to go in the steerage rather than in the cabin, on the outside of which he had observed "sundry sorts of carved work and imagery," and, inside, "some superfluity of workmanship of several sorts." For he justly reasoned that, "according to the ways of men's reckoning, the sum of money to be paid for a passage in that department hath some relation to the expense in furnishing it to please the minds of such who give way to conformity to this world; and that in this case, as in other cases, the moneys received from the passengers are calculated to answer every expense relating to their passage, and, amongst the rest, of these superfluities"; so that he felt a scruple about contributing to defray such expenses. One who tries to figure Woolman restored to life and present activity will perhaps think of him as taking passage for Newport on one of Fisk's steamboats, and endeavoring to settle in his mind what extraordinary price he ought to pay as atonement for countenancing the rascalities of Erie, or what remote corner of steerage or depth of hold he ought to seek as a testimony against the decorations of the state-rooms and saloons. In his own day our Quaker saint fitted not too well with his surroundings, for it was thought when he wore a hat of the natural color of the fur that he "savored of an affected singularity," and Mr. Whittier, in one of his valuable notes, tells of the cool reception and almost repulse given him on his first appearance in Friends' Meeting in London, because "his peculiar dress and manner excited attention and apprehension that he was an itinerant enthusiast." It is certain, therefore, that, considering the transformations among the Quakers themselves, the New Jersey preacher would be sadly out of place if he stepped down from his niche in their pantheon into their meeting-houses and homes at the present day. St. Simeon Stylites at the Fifth Avenue Hotel would hardly appear more anachronistic. Doubtless, the suggested contrasts between our age and his, joined to Woolman's childlike simplicity and naïveté, his often inconsequential discourse, and his half-pitiful, half-amusing bodily afflictions, were what made his Journal favorite reading with Charles Lamb. And if we do not misjudge, they strike a responsive chord in Mr. Whittier's humor (a greater possession than the world gives him credit for); and he takes up the book, not always that he may deepen his moral sense and renew his standard of duty—what every one may do who reads his "Journal" devoutly—but as one, not a Quaker, would open "Don Quixote" or "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

A MEMOIR OF CHARLES MAYNE YOUNG.*

THE title-page of this volume does not well describe the character of its contents, for, of its nearly five hundred pages, something less than a hundred are taken up with the account of the actor, and all the rest of the book consists of extracts, some good, some not so good, from the very comprehensive and garrulous diary of the actor's son. Not that the volume is thus made less pleasant reading; on the contrary, it is a relief, as one reads on and sees Mr. Charles Young's life drawing so very rapidly to a close, and wonders how the remaining pages are to be filled, and fears that they are to be filled with theatrical criticism and greenroom reminiscences—it is a relief to find Mr. Julian Young coolly opening his journal, and, without asking leave or making apology, spreading out before us in all innocence his stories of ghosts and presentiments; his anecdotes of exalted personages, for whom, as a class, he has exalted respect apparently, although of such of them as he dislikes or disapproves he can tell tales; his account of his journeyings to the Continent, and of what and whom he saw there; his jottings everywhere of everything that interested him, from Theodore Hook's joke of calling Miss Matilda Jesse Miss Jatilda Mess, and Sir Dudley Hill Sir Hudley Dill, to the murder story which he relates on the authority of a member of the Aulic Council, and in which are novelist's materials that would have satisfied Werther himself.

We take at random some of Mr. Young's extracts, and think they will make most of our readers to be of our persuasion, that if his intention was to produce a book which should be very readable light reading for all kinds of readers, a garrulous book to be perfectly lazy over, yet over which one can hardly be said to waste time, he has been highly successful. No book of gossip is immortal, and plenty of cleverer books of gossip than this very unpretending one have been widely read and forgotten, but for the present this ought to have popularity. Here is something about a wit of greater reputation once than now:

"1831. June 18. Dined with Mr. Jesse. Met, as one always does, a most agreeable party at his house. None among them shone more brilliantly than James Smith, one of the joint authors of 'Rejected Addresses.' His talk—for conversation it was not—was very racy and witty, and his memory nothing short of marvellous. He quoted pages of Pope and Goldsmith; and sang some of his facetious songs to his own accompaniment. Jesse gave me a curious instance of his ready wit. When he was preparing for the press his 'Gleanings in Natural History,' James Smith one day unexpectedly burst in upon him. The moment he saw him, he said, 'My dear Smith, you have come in the very nick of time, as my good genius, to extricate me from a difficulty. You must know that to each of my chapters I have put an appropriate heading: I mean by that, that each chapter has prefixed to it a quotation from some well-known author, suited to the subject treated of—with one exception. I have been cudgelling my brains for a motto for my chapter on 'Crows and Rooks,' and cannot think of one. Can you?' 'Certainly,' said he, with felicitous promptitude; 'here is one from Shakespeare for you':

'The cause (caws), my soul, the cause (caws).'

* "A Memoir of Charles Mayne Young, Tragedian, with Extracts from his Son's Journal." By Julian Charles Young. Macmillan & Co., London and New York. 1871.

"After dinner we were talking of divers incongruities in language, genders and grammar, as a science. I had the effrontery to say that it always struck me that grammars might be very much simplified in their construction; and that there was one error common to the grammars of the one or two languages with which I had any familiarity which I should like to see corrected—namely, the giving the rule before the definition; that this was putting the cart before the horse; and I fancied that, if a number of instances were given first, from which the scholar saw that 'an adjective agreed with its subjective in gender, number, and case,' he would deduce the rule almost for himself; whereas, according to the present system, the pupil must accept the rule as arbitrarily defined, without understanding it, until the definitions made it clear. There was so much quotation from Horne Tooke, and Harris, and Priestley, and Lord Monboddo, that I began to feel that I was getting out of my depth, and therefore made a diversion by remarking the singular fact that, though the sun in most languages was masculine, in German it was feminine; and the moon, usually feminine, masculine. 'By the bye,' said I, 'if I recollect rightly, in Latin, the names of rivers are generally masculine.' 'I forget,' said James Smith, 'but that can't be the invariable rule in English, for the two great American rivers must be feminine—Miss-souri and Miss-sissippi.'"

Mr. Young's sense of the ludicrous appears to have been easily tickled, but very often the laughs that he records in his diary may be shared by the world in general. A friend of his goes to an Irish gentleman to buy a horse, and this dialogue takes place:

"Buyer.—'Have you got a clever horse to show me?'

"Seller.—'I have that, sir.'

"Buyer (looking at a horse that is brought out for inspection).—'Is he a good hunter?'

"Seller.—'Is it a hunter, sir? Why, then, sir, I'll be open with ye. He's a craving oss, but he's what I call a flippant lepper (leaper). I might say, he's the most intrickate lept oss in the south of Ireland.'

"Buyer.—'Is he a good hack?'

"Seller.—"Is it a hack you mane, sir? Well, sir, I'll be fair with ye. He could not, convaniently to himself, trot under sixteen miles the hour.'

"Buyer.—'And whereabouts is the figure?'

"Seller.—'Is it the figure, sir? Then, I'll tell you, by the virtue of my oath, I should consider it my duty to go a hundred miles to call anny man out who would preshume to offer me less than £80 for him.'

"Buyer.—'Is he good at water?'

"Seller.—'Is it wather, bedad?' (looking round, and standing up in his stirrups, and surveying the country, as if he were a stranger in those parts). 'Boys, is there anny canals about?'"

Perhaps we may best give an idea of the character of the volume, by quoting what immediately precedes and what immediately follows this conversation with the horse-dealer. That which follows it we quote first:

"1856. May 29. This day peace was celebrated. At Miss B. Coutts' to witness the illuminations and fireworks. I went up to the roof of the house with the Rev. Mr. Barlow and Faraday. It was a splendid position, for from its elevation one could see not only over the Green Park, but St. James's Park, Hyde Park, Primrose Hill, Highgate, and Hampstead. I was exceedingly amused by the childlike enjoyment of the fireworks shown by Faraday. He seemed to know the ingredients used in all the pyrotechnic wonders, and halloaed out, with wonderful vivacity, 'There goes magnesium,' 'There's potassium,' etc., etc."

The first of the passages we have mentioned repeats the substance of a letter written home by a boy of eighteen, who had served as a commissioned officer in the battle of the Alma. His mother, a widow, had been anxious to hear from him, but before getting a letter saw his name mentioned, with great praise of his gallantry, in a newspaper correspondent's description of the battle. She wrote to her son, and, as may be imagined, with fervor, calling him her hero boy. The reply was as follows, or nearly as follows, for Mr. Young had to trust to his memory, and, besides, had the story not from the mother, but from a friend of hers. But as he tells it it seems true:

"'Now, dear mother, that your fears about my safety are allayed, and that you have been cheered by favorable intelligence of me, I must undeceive you as to my having any right to such an epithet as you applied to me in your letter.

"'I must confess to you, that, when first I saw the Russian guns opening fire, and saw the smoke wreathing itself upon the heights, I felt disposed to run away as fast as my legs could carry me. I was not without thoughts of undutiful reproach against you for putting me into a profession for which I was physically disqualified. I felt I was a born coward! My tongue clove to the roof of my mouth: my heart beat against my ribs like a sledge-hammer: my knees knocked together; and I doubted whether my ankle-joints would not refuse to perform their office. I found myself unable to resist looking over my left shoulder to see how the land lay behind me; when, suddenly, I was conscious of a strong hand between my shoulder-blades, and of a kindly voice, in good broad Scotch, saying to me, "Come, laddie—forward, mon—forward! Duty, aye, duty!" At that moment, had I been twitted by him or any coxcomb of an officer, with what must have been plain to read in my ashen face and shrinking step, I should assuredly have run away. But there was something so encouraging in the tone of friendly expostulation, coupled with the brave bearing of our old sergeant-major, that I felt renerved, and as if I had had a fresh backbone put into me. On I went with redoubled courage for some little time, till, as I drew closer to the scene of action, and saw more of the hideous effects of shot and shell, I found myself once more looking over to the left; when, again, with the promptitude of a guardian angel, the same firm hand was at my back, and the same kind words repeated in my ears. "Eh, sirs. Come, come, laddie; ye've done vera weel. Forward, then! Duty's the word—aye, duty. Come, then; I'm just proud o' ye." Inspired with a fresh ambition to deserve his good opinion, and the more so because of his generosity and forbearance, I put forth all the energy and resolution I could muster, until the man on my right and the other on my left were shot down by my side. This was too much for my, coward heart. Nature asserted herself, and I deliberately turned round to fly; when both my shoulders were seized in an iron grip, and these words were hissed in my ears: "Fie, fie, laddie! Think o' yer mither!" Then it was that, stung with self-reproach, and a sense of shame unutterable, and wrought up at last to resolution by the magic power of that dear name, I remember springing forward, rushing into the very thick of the mêlée, throwing fear to the winds, ceasing to be a craven, and, I hope, bearing myself as a soldier should.'"

We have found Mr. Young a very agreeable companion, old-fashioned, with old stories to tell, some of them not very good, with more of the kindness of old age than its severity, with a not portentously wise head, and with a good heart, and we are glad to recommend his journal to our readers. They will find it better than a source of mere amusement—though mere amusement in this season seems to have uses that elevate it out of itself—for in reading it they will make the acquaintance of some very amiable and admirable people in the persons of the elder Mr. Young, his mother, his beautiful and admirable wife, his brother, and, by no means least, his son and biographer. And no one need apprehend too milk-and-watery a narrative. Here is a story about Mr. Julian Young's uncle, George Young:

"I have lately read the memoirs of a man I knew very well, Crabb Robinson. I see he mentions in them an anecdote of my uncle, which gives some slight insight into his nobility of soul. Vol. iii. p. 148: 'I spent a couple of hours with Mr. George Young. I took courage to relate to him an anecdote about himself. Nearly forty years ago I happened to be in a hackney stage-coach with Young. A stranger came in. It was opposite Lackington's. On a sudden the stranger struck Young a violent blow in the face. Young coolly put his head out of the window, and told the coachman to let him out. Not a word passed between Young and the stranger. But the former having alighted, said, in a calm voice, before he shut the door, 'Ladies and gentlemen, that is my father.' Young recollected the incident perfectly, but not that I was present.'"

This father of George and Charles Young's was a surgeon in excellent practice, a man of great abilities, but of a violent and brutal temper, and at enmity with his sons, who had been obliged to leave his house with their mother, because he brought his mistress home to live with him. It was this misfortune which drove his son Charles to the stage, where, however, he prospered, and, like his brothers, acquired a competence before he had passed middle life. Like them, too, he had all that should accompany old age, in the honor, love, and obedience of his son, dependents, and the affectionate respect of many friends.

The Modes of Origin of Lowest Organisms. By H. Charlton Bastian, M.A., M.D., F.R.S. (London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1871. 12mo, pp. 109.)—The sharp discussion carried on a few years since in France between the advocates of spontaneous generation, headed by Pouchet, and the opponents, led by Pasteur, ended in the virtual withdrawal of the former from the field. The contest has been transferred to England, where Dr. Bastian and Professor Huxley are the disputants, and has given rise to Bastian's articles in Nature, Huxley's address before the British Association, the present treatise, and also to some animated controversial writings in Nature. Any one who reads Bastian's essay will, we think, be impressed with the belief that he is diligent in making and conscientious in recording his experiments; but we cannot help coming to the conclusion that his method is at fault, and does not lead to definite and decisive results, and in some cases leads to no result at all. In the first set, comprising fifteen experiments, the contents of nine flasks were observed either not to change, or to show only some slight change of color, and one recorded as "still in my possession unopened." As regards the question of spontaneous generation, these are without value; for, unless a microscopical examination of the contents is made, and this must be done without opening them, what really happened in the flasks cannot be determined. A marked defect in his method is the omission for the most part of test experiments, which it is always important to have. We ought not only to know what follows a certain condition, but also what would happen, other things being the same, if this condition did not exist. Experiments I., II., III., and XXII., e.g., simply show that after four different solutions had been boiled ten minutes, and were left exposed to the air, infusoria appeared in them in from forty-four to forty-six hours. The reader is left entirely in doubt as to whether the boiling did or did not influence the result. This doubt might have been avoided if there had been used other flasks holding some of the same fluids, under the same conditions except the boiling. The opponents of spontaneous generation have always urged that the air supplied the low organisms or the germs of them which appeared in the solutions experimented with. Dr. Bastian tries to make it appear that these are greatly overestimated, and are of comparatively little importance; but, admitting them to be present as claimed, he asserts that there is no proof that some of them, at least, as bacteria, preserve their vitality when dried, and so, when added to a given solution, they cannot become active again. In a strictly experimental enquiry, as in a case like this, it would seem that the first and most natural suggestion would be to add some dried infusoria to a solution and watch the result. He has not only not done this, but says such an experiment would be uncertain, because "it soon becomes impossible to distinguish between those which have been added from those which arise in the fluid." This difficulty is real, if one restricts oneself to a single form of experiment, but could be avoided by means of a test experiment. If he will take two sets of flasks in equal numbers holding portions of one and the same fluid, and add dried bacteria to one and none to the other, and if at the end of a certain time living bacteria appear in large numbers in the first and do not appear in the second, as experiment shows will be the case, the only way of explaining the difference is by the added bacteria. To go still further, if instead of dried bacteria he will collect dust directly from the air, or take such as has settled on shelves, he will have the same result again, leaving no reasonable doubt as to the source from which the organisms came, and that consequently they had not lost their vitality. It is agreed on all hands that experiments intended to prove spontaneous generation must be made in such a way as to ensure the destruction of all living things in the substance used at the beginning, and to keep it free from all such from without during the progress of them. This last condition is easily secured by following Needham, and using hermetically-sealed flasks; but to destroy the organisms which are contained in the air, or the materials enclosed in the flask, involves the whole difficulty which has blocked the way to decisive results. It would seem to be an easy matter to kill such small things as monads, bacterias, and vibrios, but observation shows the contrary. Dr. Bastian believes that he kills them by boiling his flasks for a few minutes at 212° F., or, under diminished pressure, even at a lower temperature. As far as his experiments with ammoniacal solutions go, it appears that the vital activity of bacteria has been destroyed by subjecting them for a few minutes to a temperature of 140°. But as most of his own experiments, as well as those of others, are made with solutions of animal or vegetable matter, it would have been more to the point if he had used these instead of his alkaline ones, for what may be true in one case is very likely not to be true of the others. As recorded experiments show that bacteria and vibrios may resist the action of boiling water for three or four hours, it is certainly unsafe to say that bacteria which appear in a solution after being boiled ten minutes are due to spontaneous generation, or, as Dr. Bastian prefers to call it, archebiosis, and are not due, as Prof. Huxley claimed, to the organisms or descendants of such as were included in the flask when it was sealed. Dr. Bastian's experiments are many and varied, and have been made in part with reference to the connection between low organisms and fermentation, to the discussion of which he devotes a large part of his book, making a fair issue with Pasteur, and maintaining with Liebig that they are not necessary to it. He has also shown conclusively that the cotton filter and the crooked necks of flasks to which Pasteur, Tyndall, and even Huxley have attached so much importance, are by no means the safeguards they allege against fermentation and putrefaction, and that notwithstanding these safeguards infusoria appear when the above-named observers say they do not. Dr. Bastian's experiments with flasks in which infusoria appear in solutions exposed only to a vacuum seem most satisfactory, but his statement that he has seen minute "specks" at first about $\frac{1}{100000}$ of an inch in diameter" appear in perfectly clear fluid, and develop into bacteria and torulæ, will be challenged until some one else has seen the same thing, because it is too important a statement to be accepted unless confirmed by several observers. While we come to the conclusion that a case for spontaneous generation has not been made out, Dr. Bastian's book is certainly valuable for its facts and experiments.

The Life and Letters of Hugh Miller. By Peter Bayne. (2 vols. 8vo. Boston: Guild & Lincoln. 1871.)—It is in some respects unfortunate for the correct appreciation of Hugh Miller that his life has been written by Mr. Bayne. It is as a popularizer of science that Miller will hereafter be known rather than as a scientific pioneer; and undue stress is laid upon his enthusiasm for science, which his biographer naturally enough sets down wholly as originality. Not that we would deny the importance of the discoveries of Hugh Miller in the old red sandstone, the acuteness of his observations, nor the charm of his writings, which has given him such a strong hold upon all English-speaking people, and which has made him the envy of his scientific friends. When carefully analyzed, we find his fame rests more upon the dissemination of scientific truths than their discovery, upon the freshness, straightforwardness, and deep convictions pervading all his works.

When Hugh Miller was at the height of his fame, it had not become the fashion among scientific men to descend into the arena of the newspaper or the review, and come directly in contact with the masses of the people. Here he is a pioneer; he longs to let his people know of his progress, and to bring them into relation with the progress of science. He feels that science and religion cannot indefinitely advance side by side without having anything in common; he brings his strong moral sense, his deep convictions, to grapple with the conclusions of science, and is the first to break the ground for the crop of scientific writers of the present day, who, among the most eminent in their departments, no longer believe in a scientific aristocracy which holds itself aloof from the public, but give in simple language, and in an intelligible form, the results of their life and study, in hopes of its falling upon fertile ground.

The distrust with which all speculations relating to the early history of the earth were regarded when Hugh Miller began writing, and, at the same time, the dissatisfaction felt by intelligent people with the attempted reconciliation between the facts of science and current religious belief, found the Scotch well prepared to receive with genuine enthusiasm any one who would bring to this discussion what Hugh Miller possessed in an eminent degree: the confidence of scientific men, unswerving fidelity to truth, deep convictions, with a command of language which alone would have given him a rank in English literature, independently of his subjects and his mode of treating them.

It was mainly his personal influence, the attractiveness of his style, his strong religious belief, his honesty, which made it possible for Hugh Miller to obtain a hearing in Scotland for his favorite science. It is the editorial part of his life which Mr. Bayne shows us to best advantage; it was the least known probably to the general reader, and it gives us a clear insight of the motives animating him during so large a portion of his career. To us it is specially interesting, as giving an account of the views of a self-educated man on many of the problems now agitating society with a vehemence unknown at his time. They are not the views of a self-made man who is constantly recalling to you his humble origin, but those of one whose aim has been the highest culture, who believed in education, and has himself reached a degree of excellence rarely attained as the result of the most intelligent training. His opposition to Popery was as intense as that of a true Scotchman, and the Free Church ever found him one of its strongest defenders. It is remarkable to see how little sympathy he shows for the sentimentalities of the labor question or the educating influence of the newspaper, believing as he does that nothing will educate man as wisely as the study of nature, and strongly urging that new education which is fast taking the place of the old scholastic methods.

Too great a part of the volumes before us is taken up with his early life; it is pleasant reading enough, but has no special value as illustrating his intellectual development. It would have been better to reduce the life to a single volume, more likely to be extensively perused than these two which make a work unduly bulky. In Scotland, however, the case may very well be different, and the biographer may probably be acquitted of any error of judgment.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Brooks (E.), The Normal Algebra	(Sower, Barnes & Potts)
Bush (R. G.), Reindeer Dogs and Snow Shoes	(Harper & Bros.)
Collyer (Robert), The Life that Now Is	(H. B. Fuller)
Da Costa (B. F.), Rambles in Mount Desert	(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.)
The Moabite Stone	" "
Guide for Travellers by Railway, Stage, and Steamboat, in the Pacific States, swd.	(A. L. Bancroft & Co.)
James Gordon's Wife: a Novel, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.) $0 50
Maanel (H. L.), Metaphysics; or, The Philosphy of Consciousness	(D. Appleton & Co.)
New Map of Central California	(A. L. Bancroft & Co.)
Professors Huxley, Roscoe, Huggins, Dawkins, and Ward, Science Lectures for the People, swd	(D. Van Nostrand)
Professors Williamson, Carpenter, Green, Lockyer, Science Lectures for the People, swd	(D. Van Nostrand)

POTT & AMERY'S

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE INCARNATION AND PRINCIPLES of Evidence: A Theological Essay. By Richard Holt Hulton, M.A. With an introduction by

SAMUEL OSGOOD, D.D.

18mo, cloth.

FACSIMILE OF THE BLACKLETTER Prayer-Book. Containing Manuscript Alterations and Additions made in the year 1661, "out of which was fairly written" the Book of Common Prayer, subscribed December 20, A.D. 1661. Photozincographed at the Ordnance Survey Office, and published for the Royal Commission on Ritual.

Folio, cloth, price $20.

MUSINGS OVER THE CHRISTIAN YEAR AND LYRA INNOCENTIUM. By Charlotte Mary Yonge. Together with a few Gleanings of Recollections of the Rev. John Keble.

12mo, cloth extra, $2 50.

A CONCORDANCE TO THE CHRISTIAN YEAR. Uniform with the "Musings."

12mo, cloth extra, $2 50.

POTT & AMERY,

COOPER UNION, FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK.

JUST PUBLISHED.

AT LAST:

A CHRISTMAS IN THE WEST INDIES:

By Charles Kingsley. 1 vol. crown 8vo. with numerous illustrations. Price $2.

"In this book, as during his visit, Mr. Kingsley revels in the gorgeous wealth of the West Indian vegetation, bringing before us one marvel after another, alternately sating and piquing our curiosity. Whether we climb the cliffs with him and peer over into the narrow bays which are being hollowed out by the trade surf, or wander through impenetrable forests, where the tops of the trees form a green cloud overhead, or gaze down glens which are watered by the clearest brooks, running through masses of palm and banana, and all the rich variety of foliage, we are equally delighted and amazed."—Athenæum.

"The book is both instructive and amusing. Mr. Kingsley's powers of observation and description are great, and both botanist and zoologist will acknowledge that he has used eyes and pen to good account in order to produce this book, which will be very interesting and attractive alike to the scientific naturalist, the politician, and the general reader."—Globe.

"The comments of the author on the social condition of the islands, whose natural beauties afforded such exquisite delight to every sense, present many original suggestions, and on the whole, allowing for the intensity of his expressions, and his inclination to paradox, are of an instructive character. But the strength of his work, as well as its peculiar charm, consists in his descriptions of the animal and vegetable life, in the luxuriant wealth of which he revels with all the ardor of a vehement, poetical nature."—New York Tribune.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

WESTWARD HO! or, The Voyages and Adventures of Sir Amyas Leigh. $1 75.

TWO YEARS AGO. $1 75.

HYPATIA; or, New Foes with an Old Face. $1 75.

HEREWARD THE WAKE, Last of the English. $1 75.

ALTON LOCKE, Sailor and Poet. $1 50.

YEAST. A Problem. $1 50.

THE WATER BABIES; a Fairy Tale for a Land Baby. $1 75.

MACMILLAN & CO.,

23 BLEECKER STREET, NEW YORK.

BOOKS FROM LONDON.

All buyers of Fine, Standard, and Miscellaneous Books should put themselves in communication with

J. SABIN & SONS,

BOOKSELLERS AND IMPORTERS,

84 Nassau Street, New York, and 22 Buckingham Street, Strand, London.

They keep constantly on hand a large and varied stock, and are in constant receipt of Books from London. Orders or English Books will receive attention.

The Bibliopolist, a Monthly Catalogue and Library Register, contains a Catalogue of a portion of the stock. The numbers for June and July (continued) will be issued in ten days. Specimen sent gratis.

SOME OF THE BOOKS FOR SALE.

DEFOE'S WORKS. 20 vols. 16mo. Tree-calf. The best edition. $90.

HUMBOLDT, A. New Spain. 6 vols. 8vo, half-calf, uncut. London. 1811. $10.

CARLYLE, THOMAS. The History of Frederick the Great. 6 vols. 8vo, tree-calf extra. Splendid copy. $35.

LAMB, CHAS. Works of. 4 vols. 16mo, calf. London. Moxon. 1850. $11.

WALPOLE, HORACE. Royal and Noble Authors of England, Scotland, and Ireland. 5 vols. 8vo, tree-calf, gilt edges. A splendid copy, fine impressions of the plates. Binding by Rivière. $45.

CASSELL'S POPULAR EDUCATOR.

COMPLETE IN SIX VOLUMES.

PRICE, $15.

"We have gone over its pages with sentiments of real wonder. We know no work like it. It has occupied and filled up a field of education vast and most important to the community."—Dublin University Magazine.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,

596 Broadway, New York.

TRINITY COLLEGE.

The annual commencement will take place on Thursday July 13. The examination for admission to College will be on the Tuesday preceding (July 11). There will be a second examination for admission to College on the 13th of September next: the academic year will begin the day following (September 14, 1871).

Students whose means are limited can have the tuition ($90 a year) remitted. It is the aim of the College, whose Corps of Professors is now full and ample for the work of instruction in the different departments, to give a symmetrical development to the powers of the student—to educate his entire manhood, body, soul, and spirit—in order to fit him for engaging in business or for entering on the study of any of the learned professions.

For further information apply to the PRESIDENT OF TRINITY COLLEGE, HARTFORD, CONN.

BREAD-LOAF INN,

RIPTON, VERMONT.

A GOOD PLACE TO PASS THE SUMMER AT.

CATSKILL MOUNTAIN HOUSE.

This favorite summer resort, commanding a view of the valley of the Hudson, unsurpassed by any in the world, and so justly celebrated for its delightful temperature, will be open from June 10th to October 1st.

Stages connect at Catskill with the trains of the H. R. Railroad and the day boats from Albany and New York; also, with the steamboats, Thomas Powell and Sunnyside, leaving Pier 43, foot of Canal Street, New York, for Catskill, daily at 5 P.M.; Saturday at 2 P.M. CHAS. L. BEACH, Proprietor.

THE new way of doing the retail clothing trade adopted by Baldwin the Clothier, Canal and Broadway, brings its big results.

Instead of letting the stock run down in mid-summer, he replenishes, and now offers an entire new assortment adapted to the hot weather. He informs us that every day he places new lots of stylish suits on the counters, and sells three to seven thousand dollars a day—C. O. D. His stock embraces a full line of Men's and Boys' Clothing expressly for retail.

WILLIAMS COLLEGE,

WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.

Applicants for admission to Williams College will be examined on Tuesday, June 27, at 9 A.M., in Alumni Hall.

There will be another examination at the same place on Wednesday, August 30, and private examination will be given to those who cannot conveniently be present on either of these days on application to the President.

Pecuniary assistance will be given to all young men of character and ability who may need it.

MARK HOPKINS, President.

SCHOOL OF MINES, COLUMBIA COLLEGE. Practical and theoretical instruction in civil and mining engineering, metallurgy, geology, mineralogy, assaying, analytical and technical chemistry, physics, mechanics, mathematics, drawing, French, German, etc., with laboratory practice. Regular courses for the degrees of Civil and Mining Engineer, Bachelor and Doctor of Philosophy. Special students received without examination. Pecuniary aid extended to those students who require it. Reopens Monday, October 3. Examinations for admission to the regular courses, Thursday, September 29. For further information and for catalogues apply to C. F. CHANDLER, Dean of the Faculty, East 49th Street, New York.

CHEGARAY INSTITUTE.

English and French for Young Ladies and Misses, Boarding and Day Pupils, 1527 and 1529 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Will reopen on Wednesday, Sept. 20. French is the language of the family, and is constantly spoken in the Institute.

MADAME D'HERVILLY, Principal.

DARTMOUTH HOME SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES.

Instruction given in all departments. Apply for Circulars to

MISS L. J. SHERMAN, Principal, HANOVER, N. H.

RIVERVIEW MILITARY ACADEMY,

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.

Location healthy; Scenery unequalled; Building convenient; Teachers highly educated, earnest, working men; System of Order unsurpassed. A wide-awake, thoroughgoing School for Boys wishing to be trained for Business, for College, or for West Point, or the Naval Academy. Address OTIS BISBEE, A.M., Principal and Proprietor.

WOMAN'S MEDICAL COLLEGE

OF THE NEW YORK INFIRMARY,

128 SECOND AVENUE, N. Y.

Winter Session begins 1st of October. For particulars, address the Secretary, EMILY BLACKWELL, M.D.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JULY 27, 1871.

The Week.

BEFORE the bodies in Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Streets were well cold after the rioting the other day, it became a question of warm interest in the minds of some of our journalists whether Hoffman "had wilfully, foolishly, and deliberately lied" when he said he did not know there would be a riot, or no procession, until the 11th. As good Republicans, we suppose we must regret to say that he appears for this once to have come somewhere near the truth. A member of his staff, General McQuade, publishes a statement to the effect that he and the Governor came on from Newport to New York on Sunday night—which itself is a fact for the rural Republicans; "keep it before the people"—and arrived here on Monday morning, but too late for the Governor to catch the 8 o'clock train. So he drove to the Clarendon, breakfasted, and went to Albany by the 10.30 train, leaving General McQuade to converse with the municipal authorities, and telegraph what he learned to be the state of things to Albany in the course of the day. The General went to Mr. Kelso, who assured him the police would be ready, and so would the military, under General Shaler; General Shaler said that a proper force, under his command, would turn out to preserve the peace; and Mayor Hall, whom General McQuade did not see until three or four o'clock in the afternoon, "substantiated what had been said by Superintendent Kelso and General Shaler, that proper precautions had been taken to preserve the peace." General McQuade telegraphed to the Governor that everything seemed right, and that on the next day he would communicate with him by letter. On the night of the 10th came Hall's prohibitory order, and on the night of the 11th the Governor prepared his counter-proclamation, having come down here to do it, though there is no reason made clear why he might not have had it out in Tuesday's evening papers. It becomes a question, then, whether General McQuade was not mystified by Hall, who probably knew before three o'clock on Monday that he was going to forbid the procession. However that may be, it appears certain that some of the scathing which some of us gave Mr. Hoffman for having "been seen in the city on Monday," and "consulted with the Mayor," was not merited. The effect of his action on his political standing has undoubtedly been very bad for it in this city—and especially so far as concerns those important thousands of Democratic votes that are never cast, but are added to the returns by Mr. Tweed, and which Mr. Hoffman will never get again, as he has had them before—but, as undoubtedly, it has helped him greatly with the party at large, and will always be remembered to his credit. As for the Ring's caring for the national interests of the party, the whole membership of the Americus Club would wink at each other to hear it mentioned—"their only care but to increase their store."

As most of our readers know, Mr. Richard Connolly, the Comptroller, who disburses the money of this city and county, is required by law to make a quarterly statement of receipts and expenditures. That it does not at all suit the books of Mr. Tweed, Mr. Sweeny, Mr. Hall, and Mr. Connolly himself that this exhibit should be made, may be readily imagined. Mr. Tweed, for instance, was a bankrupt chairmaker a very few years ago, and now he has twenty-two or three horses in his stables, and, next to the Astors, is the largest real-estate owner in the city. So Mr. Connolly coolly disregards the law, and does not make his exhibits. But the Times of this city having, by hook or by crook, got hold of some of the Comptroller's figures, has begun publishing them, with the preliminary remark that Mayor Hall is a thief and a common cheat, that Connolly is another, and that if they dislike to be called so, they can bring a libel suit, and it will not only call them so, but prove them to be so, and prove Tweed and Sweeny to be the same. We may remark that a little more moderation of epithet would not detract from the weight of the Times's case. The bladder with beans in it, as well as the lash, is audible after some of its strokes. It began on the 8th of the month to present its case, which briefly is as follows: The city pays rent for twenty-four armories to the amount of $275,600. Their real annual value, at a liberal estimate, is about $79,000. The Ring pockets the difference. The hiring is done by J. H. Ingersoll, the partner of Tweed in the chairmaking business—a business in which Tweed has apparently made up his mind not to suspend payment a second time. The claims for rent are passed upon by Hall and Connolly; and it is presumable that the $200,000, more or less, is not divided without the knowledge of Tweed and Peter Sweeny. But the embezzling of the rents is not the only way of making the armories a source of profit. They are perpetually needing repairs—ten of them, by the way, are entirely unoccupied—and their bills for chairs and carpets are enormous. For equipping the ten unoccupied ones and keeping them in repair nine months, the bills foot up $941,453 86. During the years 1869 and 1870, the sums drawn out of the treasury on warrants drawn directly in favor of Ingersoll & Co., or endorsed over to them, amounted to no less than $5,663,646 83. For furniture, upholstery, and repairs most of this money was paid out, and it is a singular fact that much of the repairing was done on the new court-house, which has the remarkable fate to be under repair before it is finished. Its appetite for carpets, too, is enormous, for it is debited with nearly six hundred thousand dollars' worth. $565,731 34 are the exact figures, and supposing the carpeting to be worth five dollars a yard, here is money enough to carpet the City Hall Park all over with three thicknesses of carpeting. So careless were the thieves about their frauds, that in cooking up their accounts—some time after the fact evidently—they have in thirteen instances, as the day of certain recorded transactions, hit upon a Sunday, when the offices could not have been open, nor any work done of any kind, clerical or other. For plasterers' work and repairing done in the new county buildings during a period of little more than one year, a Mr. A. G. Garvey was paid $2,870,464 06. Some of these plasterers' or painters' warrants give curious evidence of the carelessness of our worthies. Two of them are drawn in favor of a certain Fillippo Donnarumna, and are endorsed over to Garvey in one case by the signature "Phillip F. Dummy," and in the other by the signature "Fillip Dummin." "The Secret Accounts—Warrants signed by Hall and Connolly under False Pretences," is the Times's heading for its revelations, which naturally make some stir, and which, for the first time in its history, we believe, have brought the Ring before the public in an elaborate attempt to show that its hands are clean. It usually has thought best to keep on and not say a word.

Very likely one reason why they have seen fit to attempt a reply is that there is talk in Wall Street and the Produce Exchange of going into the courts and making combined resistance to the payment of taxes until there has been a full showing of the state of the municipal accounts, and that since the riot of the 12th inst. there have been signs among decent people of some attempt to unite in favor of a general reform in the city government. The Mayor's reply is in two parts, the first of which appeared in his newspaper, the Leader. He begins by saying that every lawyer knows that if you can show that a witness has "a bad motive against the side which his testimony assails," it is folly to waste time on his statements; and that he can show that the Times has a selfish motive in attacking the city government. It has a bill of nearly $14,000 against the City, payment of which the Comptroller, by direction of the Mayor, has contested and is contesting, and it is only since this opposition that the Times has been so denunciatory—which does not explain Mr. Garvey's bills nor Mr. Ingersoll's. Then, too, says Hall, the city withdrew corporation advertising from the Times, and that made the Times angry, so that when a clerk was discharged from the Comptroller's office—for dishonesty, be it understood—and went about trying to sell extracts from the accounts of the office, the publishers of the Times eagerly bought them up, although other persons had declined them, and "mentally kicked" the proposer and proposal down-stairs. It is enough to say of this that it has not the least relevancy to the matter in hand. The Mayor does not deny that the transcripts are actual transcripts of portions of Connolly's accounts, and himself calls the bills of Garvey, Ingersoll, and the rest "large and perhaps exorbitant claims." Finally, he says, if there have been payments of exorbitant bills, the publisher of the Times is responsible, because when, in 1868, the Legislature had passed a tax levy authorizing and directing the Comptroller to pay a certain class of claims, and Governor Fenton hesitated to sign it because its provisions as to these claims would open a door to fraud, the Comptroller, in order to pacify and persuade that great and good man, informed him that he, too, feared there might be frauds, but that, if the Governor would sign the bill, he might rest assured that the Comptroller would pay not one of the claims in question. Thus these two gentlemen sat down after the Legislature had made a law, and did a little legislation themselves. This again has no relevancy, and leaves the eight or nine acres of carpeting as much unaccounted for as before the Mayor began writing.

His first reply being recognized as a dead failure—though some perfectly well-informed papers put on an air of great innocence that was at once amusing and almost intolerable—and the most favorable of privately expressed opinions being that "it was not the opinion anywhere round the City Hall that the Mayor personally got any of it," Mr. Hall came out with another reply. It is, in substance, as follows: The publisher of the Times broke down the Fenton-Connolly pledge, and opened the way for the Ring payment of exorbitant claims, setting people an example of attacking the city treasury by himself getting out a mandamus ordering Connolly to pay the Times its bill. The Times's reply is that it had earned its money honestly, and wanted it, and had law on its side, and, further, that the Mayor's point is totally irrelevant. The Mayor says, secondly, that all the accounts published in the Times, and stated to be "secret," have for some time been in process of printing, for the public inspection; but not a word of the withholding of the exhibits, no assertion that the Times's version of the accounts is not copied from Connolly's books, and no promise as to when we shall see these accounts, and whether we shall see them "undoctored," which we shall not. They have, at any rate, always been filed according to law, the Mayor says. Thirdly, he says that "the claims alluded to by the Times are large, and may have been exorbitant, but no responsibility for them" rests on either himself or the Comptroller, because their office is merely ministerial, and the law orders an audited claim to be signed—a monstrous doctrine, which would prevent Hall's refusing his signature to a bill of five millions annually for the care of the Hindoo bull in the park; and, of course, a doctrine opposed to the law. According to him, such a bill coming before him, he must sign without remonstrance, and "no responsibility" rests on him for signing or on the Comptroller for handing over the five millions—especially to Mr. Tweed's partner. Next, he urges that many of the claims in the Times's list were for work done in 1868, and audited by the old Board of Supervisors, meaning, by that, to convey the impression that a Board equally composed of Republicans and Democrats audited them, and that the Ring of four is not responsible. But this is not true, either as to the Republican party or the Ring. The Board ceased to be evenly divided in 1867, months before any of these claims in the Times's list were made; and Mr. William M. Tweed was the head and front of the Board. A New York Republican is not a being whose purity we would undertake to defend through thick and thin; but it is not necessary either to make him responsible for Mr. Tweed's labors. In short, the defence is no defence, and leaves the Mayor and Comptroller Tweed just where the Times left them, with all the enormous expenditure for armories, upholstery, furniture, and repairs still to be explained. Mr. Marshall O. Roberts, in particular, who found Mr. Connolly's accounts all so correct and satisfactory a few months since, must be waiting for an explanation, and so must Mr. John Jacob Astor and Mr. Moses Taylor.

Judge Hilton, one of the corporators who are soon to begin building the Viaduct steam railway, the most important public work that has been attemped in New York certainly since the laying out of the Central Park, has just been making a statement of progress, and giving to his fellow-members of the Executive Committee the views which, after consultation with the engineers, he now entertains "of the ultimate results which will attend on positively assuring rapid transit to the citizens of New York." They certainly need it. Outside of Cairo and camel-riding, the people of no city suffer what New York suffers in going from the counting-house at one end of the island to the dining-room and bedroom at the other. Vile street-cars, where filthy currency is given to the passenger out of filthier hands, jolting omnibuses, yawing and rattling over and across the pavement, or glass coaches fit for an Irish funeral, are the principal means of getting up and down town, and it seems almost too good to believe that we are to have a steam road with two branches—one on the east and one on the west side of Broadway, from Chambers Street, near the City Hall Park, to Harlem River, with a continuation down to Wall Street, trains running twenty miles an hour on two tracks for fast trains, and twenty such trains running every hour, while way trains, going slower, but as numerous, run on two other tracks. The cost of both branches, including the price paid for real estate, right of way, construction, and running stock, Judge Hilton makes out to be fifty millions. The gross annual income from the passenger and freight traffic of each line he estimates at $9,500,000; the average number of passengers carried daily being set at 140,000, and the average fare at 13 cents. The net income would be about $5,250,000. Everybody not interested in some one of the other proposed lines of rapid transit, whether he thinks well of all the details of this company's plan, will rejoice heartily that we are going to have steam communication with the upper part of the city; that we are to have two lines instead of one, and that Broadway is not to be ruined by being made the route. That we are to have all this, the names of the corporators would seem to give assurance.

Among them are A. T. Stewart, W. B. Duncan, C. L. Tiffany, W. T. Blodgett, Mr. Hilton himself, L. P. Morton, John Taylor Johnston, and others as much respected by their fellow-citizens for character, as well as for business ability, as any business man anywhere in the world need to be. But associated with them—and we may imagine how, in view of recent disclosures, they like the association—are no other persons than Connolly, Sweeny, Tweed, Hall, and O'Gorman. These operators are not among the directors of a company which is going to buy city lots by the hundred, and spend money by the million, without having certain views and expectations; and, beyond doubt, these views and expectations are such that we should say anybody takes a heavy responsibility who invites or advises anybody else, rich or poor, to invest any money in the company's stock. And let it be granted that in this city the saints themselves could do nothing without paying tribute to these four or five men who own it, and that they had to be taken in, and that they are joined with men so able that they will have small chance to exercise their customary functions, then comes up the question whether the hard blow to public morality which is given when our best men consent to work with these robbers is compensated by our getting our viaduct railway a little sooner than otherwise we might. Tweed and his friends, if they never steal a copper from the company's funds, may make the railroad a very dear one to us nevertheless.

In spite of the extreme ease and abundance of money, and of the combined efforts of some of the most powerful cliques ever known to Wall Street, it has been found impossible to maintain the price of securities at the Stock Exchange. As we long since pointed out, the speculative fever among the people has exhausted itself; and the fluctuations in all the great markets for some time past have been either due to purely natural causes, or else to the forced and artificial movements of rings and combinations in which the public absolutely refuses to participate. In the stock market, the majority of the leading stocks are thus held by rings of manipulators to whose power and influence has been largely due that reckless course of bank management to which we have frequently referred, and under which the loans and discounts of the city banks have risen, in the height of an unusually dull season, to the extreme figures of the greatest and most prosperous activity. Yet with the aid of the concentrated bank influence, with the entire power of the Government thrown into the scales in favor of inflation, and abundance of money, prices of almost every single article bought or sold in this market have for several weeks past been steadily declining. Stocks have had a very severe fall. Gold is lower by about one per cent. Cotton is less strong. Breadstuffs have suffered a sharp decline, and the general tone of most markets is depressed.

The prospects of the growing cotton crop have greatly improved. The accounts of the cereals are generally favorable, especially in Europe, where the earlier reports described a very discouraging condition of the grain crops. The dry-goods trade is fair for the season. The production of coal is enormous—at least fifty per cent. in excess of the reasonably possible consumption; and we are rapidly striding towards either strikes or extreme low prices, or both—most probably both. The real-estate market is in a condition very similar to that of the stock market. The great bulk of the marketable property on the island and throughout the adjoining counties is in the hands of great rings and combinations, who are incessantly trying, mainly at the expense of the public, by means of new boulevards, parks, viaduct railroads, and other schemes, to advance the price of that property, but who do not succeed in getting the public to buy. These real-estate speculations of the city rulers are a very interesting element in our local political problem, precisely as the railroad-combination scheme is in our national political problem. They are highly likely to end in the financial bankruptcy and consequent political impotence of the schemers, long before any reform agitation can drive them from the seats of power.

The event of the week in England has been Mr. Gladstone's manœuvre in abolishing the purchase of commissions by royal warrant. The Army Bill had collapsed in the House of Lords, and one of the two Government measures which alone had been saved out of the talk and strife of the present session seemed thus lost to a certainty. The surprise and indignation of the Lords at the new turn of affairs, and the cry of "unconstitutional" launched at the ministry from all sides, were to be expected. It cannot be said, however, that there is anything more humiliating in being checkmated by the crown, however fictitious the interposition, than in being obliged, as the Lords are now regularly obliged in their most important differences with the Commons, to smother their convictions and vote as the Lower House insists. Nor does the objection to the constitutionality of Mr. Gladstone's procedure lie against the nature but against the manner of it. We remarked the other day, in mentioning the reason why the confirmation of treaties should not be left to Parliament, that "the ministry lives by a majority in the House of Commons, but rarely has a majority in the Lords, so that, if so important a point of policy as a treaty could be made the subject of a serious assault in the Upper House, it would expose the ministry to a danger which might not improperly be called unconstitutional." It is useless to disguise the fact that Mr. Gladstone's manœuvre only hastens the decline of the Lords to a condition in which, not only on subjects of much greater importance than some treaties (like the Army Bill itself), but on subjects of much less importance, their opposition will be regarded as unconstitutional, and their opinion and advice superfluous. In other words, Mr. Gladstone has made a great bid for popularity, and will obtain it, and has strengthened the crown materially—at least for the present—by arraying it against the Lords. How justifiable he was in resorting to these exceptional tactics depends principally on the nature of the opposition which the Army Bill had received; and that it was factious and irrational, no one who has read the debates is likely to deny, or that the issue on the part of the Government was a truly national one. It remains for the Lords, in sober second thought, to pass the bill and thus secure indemnity to the holders of commissions.

On Saturday, the French Assembly debated at length, and finally referred to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the petition of the bishops for interference on the part of France to restore the temporal power of the Pope. The chief speaker was naturally Thiers, who was backed up by Gambetta, and whose position was, in a word, that while he would do everything to secure the independence of the Pope, he would do nothing to alienate Italy. This disposes of the omens drawn from the stay of the French ambassador at Florence, after his colleagues had followed the King to Rome; and if anything were wanting to confirm the Pope in his recently-uttered belief that only a miracle can now save the Papacy from being altogether lost, the instructions under which the Belgian ambassador kept company with the French would be sufficient. He was to go to Rome just as if Belgium had not already a representative there at the Papal Court; but he was not to be in a hurry. If any of his colleagues lingered, so should he. Such was the whole protest, from the only country in Europe with a Catholic majority in the government, against the violation of the Pope's territory by the removal of the capital. The Pope, therefore, must content himself where he is, or quit the country; and as there is a very general agreement that it would require a miracle to make his holiness contented, the faithful are casting about for a new seat for him. It is rumored in France that Corsica will be offered him.

Victor Emanuel, meanwhile, has had a pleasant house-warming in his new quarters; and thus far, no difficulty has arisen from having two sovereigns and two courts within the same walls. Nothing could exceed the grace and good sense with which Florence resigned the dignity which it had enjoyed since 1864. Her example has not been without its effect on Turin, whose magistrate, on being presented to the King at Rome, was greeted with the exclamation, "Turin! benissimo! now Turin will be satisfied." In fact, the removal to Rome promotes not only the unity of provinces but of parties in Italy, by putting an end to the Piedmontese faction, whose existence has been one of the most serious and unnecessary obstacles to the recent progress of the kingdom. The reassembling of Parliament will be the next event of interest, and for once the deputies may be comfortable in the thought that their foreign relations are on the best possible footing, and that the internal affairs of the country alone will demand their serious attention. For this, they must admit, they are not so immediately indebted to the Latin as to the Teutonic race beyond the Alps.

Taking the reports of the Germans themselves from Alsace, their progress in denationalizing or otherwise converting the people into loyal subjects of Emperor William is rather discouraging. The antipathy, to give it no harsher name, against everything German places the officials in a very uncomfortable isolation, which is shared in a full degree by native office holders who have held over under the new régime. They are, in fact, cut off from social intercourse much as were the Federal and Northern State officials in the South in the beginning of reconstruction. The gendarmes or rural police, however, have the worst time of it, being regarded as a continuation of the military subjugation. These feelings appear to have been fostered, even to the extent of causing some disturbances, by the French prisoners-of war, who have accordingly, when not belonging in the country, been ordered under arrest, if found in uniform without a permit. Some idea of the popular temper may be got from the fact that the authorities, in repairing the losses occasioned by the war, have been obliged to announce that the Government action was not from a sense of duty, but from motives of economy. The gratitude they fairly expected to reap is not manifested, and as all their amenities are looked upon as a sign of weakness, the French incapacity for self government assumes a very perplexing form. The advent of the great anniversaries of the late war must give rise to much sober reflection in regard to this corner of the new empire.

THE ANGLO-SAXON JUDGE.

In our notice of "The Battle of Dorking" (Nation, July 6, 1871) it was said: "The growth, too, of that almost unique character, the Anglo-Saxon judge, who has played so important a part both in English and American political progress, is due to the total want of familiarity both of the governors and governed with the arbitrary processes of military rule." A recent decision of the Court of Claims, in the case of E. M. Brown v. The United States, abounds with what may be termed English illustrations of this remark, some of which will be novel and even startling to many well-informed American citizens. Indeed, the decision, discussing questions of law not often before courts, and dealing with English nisi prius reports that rarely find their way into an American lawyer's library, seems to have startled lawyers, the Washington bar having requested its immediate and separate publication. The opinion shows by repeated contrast how the American judiciary and the American judicial sentiment alike have been drifting back toward barbarism; while in nearly all European countries they have been advancing toward a higher civilization. That our elective judiciary has fallen far from the standard of Kent and Spencer no one will dispute; but that our Federal judiciary, and more especially our national views as to judicial duties, have receded from our own standard, few Americans, not chronically despondent, will be disposed to admit. Still more difficult would it be to convince the mass of our countrymen that, while the best portion of our judicial system has been at the utmost standing still and holding its own, the judicial system of England has been steadily and rapidly advancing, so that it is now doing more for human rights and liberties than our own ever did; and that, for the protection of the weak as against the strong, and the citizen as against the government—albeit the government is in part a monarchy and in part an aristocracy—it now speaks in language so courageous and so elevated as might well shame every American court. The United States started nearly three-quarters of a century ago much in advance of other nations in things relating to personal rights and civil liberty; but the past generation—that is, the men of the last thirty years—have done little for the improvement of civil government beside boasting and bragging of what their fathers did for mankind. During these same thirty years, most European states have been moving, and particularly England, so that about the year 1850 she caught up with our most advanced State governments in matters of law reform, and at present is so far ahead that for some years to come we shall have little to do beside copying English statutes. Fortunately, one can hardly rouse the American conscience into healthy action better than by saying that the American citizen does not now stand as high before his Government and before the law as does the British subject. But to recur to the illustrations of the Court of Claims.

What would be thought of one of our citizens bringing a personal action against the Secretary of State because he neglected to act upon a certain paper? And what would be thought if this citizen should summon the Secretary as a witness and compel him to come into court and take the witness-stand, and be examined and cross-examined by lawyers? Yet, in 1862, such a suit was brought against Sir George Gray, Secretary of State for the Home Department, "and the plaintiff actually called the Secretary as a witness, who came into court and testified"; and none of the judges of the Common Pleas doubted "that if the Secretary of State had neglected his duty and done nothing, he would have been amenable at law for his negligence."

The idea that a public servant who has neglected his duty by doing nothing should be amenable at law for his negligence to a private citizen, undoubtedly will strike many of our "advanced thinkers" as civil service reform run mad. General Logan will be very likely to denounce it as belonging to the aristocratic governments of Europe, and not at all consonant with the free and liberal institutions of a great republic. Mr. Dawes will probably be pleased with it as an abstract idea, but unable to approve of any particular measure toward bringing such a state of things about, and especially doubtful of those measures that have been tried elsewhere and found thoroughly effective.

But take another case, and, as our "advanced thinkers" will say, a much more visionary one. What would be said if a citizen, late a regimental officer in the United States service, should bring his action against the Secretary of War (the late Mr. Stanton, for example) for having illegally and from improper motives summarily dismissed him from the service? What would be thought of the audacity of such a suit, albeit that the commission had been fairly earned by heroic service, by broken health, and, moreover, furnished to a worn-out man his only means of support? And supposing the case to be tried before Chief-Justice Chase and a jury, and Mr. Stanton to have come into court as a witness, what would be thought of the Chief-Justice if he should ask the Secretary whether any personal influence had been used or sought to be used in regard to the dismissal of the officer? Would not the late Mr. Thaddeus Stevens and all of his friends have roundly denounced such conduct as malignant in the highest degree, and sufficient provocation for a new amendment to abolish the Supreme Court, or make the justices thereof elective by the people on the nomination of the men inside politics? But in 1863, one Mr. Dickson brought his action in the Queen's Bench against the Secretary of State for War, the lord-lieutenant of the district, and the colonel of a regiment, "for causing by means of false charges the removal of the plaintiff from the office of lieutenant-colonel of the regiment," the regiment referred to being not of the regulars, but militia, and Mr. Dickson having been nothing more than a militia colonel who never rendered any actual military service other than being once called out for a few months. On the trial, the Secretary at War was examined as a witness, and Lord Chief-Justice Cockburn, who presided, put this question to him: "Was there any personal influence used, or sought to be used, upon you, to make you depart from the ordinary course?" Finally, the Lord Chief-Justice thus stated the case: "I shall tell the jury that if they believe that his [the Secretary's] intention was to oppress and injure the plaintiff, he is liable; but that if he made the recommendation to dismiss him out of an honest sense of duty, even though he may have been mistaken, he is not liable in law."

That such decisions as these should awaken surprise in the American mind, shows only how far the present generation has receded from the law-abiding and law-invoking character of the same people of two generations back. The military experience of the last decade and the encroaching assumptions of the legislative over the judicial power, have practically lessened every citizen's right to judicial redress, and conversely thrown a certain idea of immunity around public officers; or, as the opinion of the Court of Claims puts it, "there has grown up such a belief in the divine right of public officers so nearly resembling all that was ever believed of the divine right of kings, that it is vain to look for more than one personal action brought against a high officer of state." That the Anglo-Saxon judge has prevented this in England, the court fully shows. One noticeable case which might throw a shade of fear over the hearts of some of our military governors is that of the Governor of Minorca, who imprisoned and banished a poor Minorcan, "only by treaty made a subject of Great Britain." "It was in 1771—a hundred years ago; but an English jury soon after cast him [the Governor] in £3,000 damages, and the Court of King's Bench, with Mansfield at its head, sustained the verdict." Another curious case of military governors is one brought against the Governor of Gibraltar, who sent a company of soldiers to search a house for a Spanish general supposed to be there secreted. In an adjoining house lived an English merchant, who, coming to the door to see what was the matter, was stopped by a sentry's bayonet, and compelled to remain within for a few minutes. The merchant's house was not entered, nor was the Governor present at the search; but "for this constructive assault," and "this imaginary invasion of an Englishman's castle," "an English jury fined the Governor £50." "All of the judges of the Common Pleas held that the action would lie, and that the verdict should stand. Wherefore," concludes the Court of Claims, "the divine right of governors to do unlawful acts may be considered now, as in Great Britain, entirely at an end."

Another curious case was one before Lord Eldon, when chancellor. Sir William Congreve, the inventor of the Congreve rocket, acting under the orders of the Ordnance Office, had continued to use an article patented by a Mr. Walker, notwithstanding an ex-parte injunction had been granted. The Lord Chancellor said, with a frankness that to such eminent jurists as Justices Barnard and Cardozo must seem the weakest puerility, that he ought not to have granted the injunction ex-parte; that if he had read the affidavits with strict attention, he would not have done so. But he then added, "Speaking with all respect, I will treat government here as I would any suitor of the court. Let an account be kept," etc. And he then concludes with this very broad hint to the official power, "I would recommend to government to pay the costs of the present application, as there are grounds for believing the injunction violated. I can only recommend the government; but I would have it understood that if the recommendation is not attended to, I will make an order for the defendant, Sir William Congreve, to pay them."

A case cited from that somewhat anomalous court of last resort, the House of Lords, would furnish healthy reading for many of our judges, legislators, and public moralists—Ferguson v. The Earl of Kinnoul. Decided in 1842, it is "illumined with the concurring opinions of Lyndhurst, and Brougham, and Cottenham, and Campbell." Boldly rebuking the idea that a public officer, or any person whatever, can be held liable only for sins of commission, it strongly lays down the broad doctrine which includes all sins of omission in the legal liability. "If the law casts any duty," is the language, "upon a person which he refuses or fails to perform, he is answerable in damages to those whom his refusal or failure injures." And we are struck with another case where the decision of the Privy Council, "prepared by Sir John Taylor Coleridge, and read by Dr. Lushington," firmly meets those cases that appeal to our sympathies—cases where an officer under orders or in mistake, but acting in good faith, has violated the law and committed a wrong. In such cases the Congressional conscience has of late years been strongly inclined to take the bull by the tail instead of the horns, and, instead of indemnifying the officer out of the public treasury, to block up the jurisdiction of courts by taking away from the injured citizen all legal means of redress. The only sound and safe doctrine we deem to be that admirably stated by Sir John Coleridge in a single sentence: "In such cases, the government is morally bound to indemnify its agent, and it is hard on such agent when this obligation is not satisfied; but the right to compensation in the party injured is paramount to this consideration" (13 Moore, Pr. C. R. p. 236). Admirable, too, is the language of Lord Cockburn, in a more recent case (1865), in which he sums up the present views of English judges: "In our opinion, no authority is needed to establish that a servant of the crown is responsible in law for a tortious act done to a fellow-subject, though done by the authority of the crown—a position which appears to us to rest upon principles which are too well settled to admit of question, and which are alike essential to uphold the dignity of the crown on the one hand, and the rights and liberties of the subject on the other."

"Therefore" (is the conclusion of the Court of Claims) "it appears by the concurrent opinions of all the judges of the six great courts of Great Britain—the Exchequer, the Common Pleas, the Queen's Bench, Chancery, the Privy Council, and the House of Lords—that it is a fundamental principle that every British subject who has suffered a legal wrong shall have legal redress against some one—a lofty ground to be maintained, but the only ground to stand upon if vested rights are to be secure, or laws are to prevail over men."

Unfortunately, the contrast does not stop with the English judiciary. In cases of legal conflict between the solitary citizen and his government, the judicial sentiment of Congress seems narrow beside that of Parliament. A citizen of the United States has no legal redress against the government save in the Court of Claims, and there the jurisdiction is limited to actions on contract; while the only judgment which can be rendered must be in money, and neither interest nor costs are recoverable. The Court of Claims thus states the substance of English legislation: "Shortly before the reorganization of this court, Parliament passed an act, known as 'The Petition of Right Act of 1860,' or popularly from its learned author, the present Chief-Justice of the Common Pleas, as 'Bovill's Act.' By it, the creditor of the crown was reassured as to all the remedies of the common law for lands occupied, for goods withheld, for property taken and used, for contracts broken; and under it he may take defaults against the crown, and recover costs, and seek relief either in courts of law or courts of equity."

Nor does the contrast stop with England and English jurisprudence. In 1868, the Fortieth Congress, in order to complicate the Alabama difficulties in a covert way, being in happy ignorance of "the Petitions of Right Act of 1860," passed a statute prohibiting an alien from prosecuting "cotton cases" in the Court of Claims, unless his own government accorded a similar right to American citizens. So ignorant were our honorable legislators that the avowed object of the act was to exclude British subjects, and the belief was that it would exclude nearly all the rest of the world. The British claimants, however, were not slow to prove that their government accorded to American citizens a much broader right, and to receive the unanimous judgment of the Court of Claims, since unanimously affirmed by the Supreme Court. But this sagacious action of Congress threw upon all alien claimants the burden and delay of proving the law of their own country, and as aliens of nearly all nationalities had had cotton seized, so the laws of nearly all the governments of Europe had to be shown. The result is thus stated by the Court of Claims:

"The laws of other nations have been produced and proved in this court, and the mortifying fact is judicially established that the government of the United States holds itself, of nearly all governments, the least amenable to the law. First in this high civilization that protects the individual and assures his rights, stands the great empire of the German States. 'The state,' says a lawyer, also distinguished as a writer, who was examined as a witness in this court, 'represented in its pecuniary capacity as the representative of money and property affairs, is called the Fiscus. For the purpose of maintaining suits against the government, the Fiscus stands in the place of the government; for the purpose of compelling the payment of demands against the state, the Fiscus is substituted for the state itself. I know of no restriction of the rights of the subject of Prussia to maintain any suit against the Fiscus. . . . Judgments rendered against the Fiscus may be satisfied in the usual way, by execution.' In Hanover and Bavaria, the redress is substantially the same. In the republic of Switzerland, the federal tribunal takes cognizance of suits between the confederation on the one side, and corporations or individuals on the other, when these corporations or private citizens are complainants, and the object of litigation is of the value of at least 3,000 francs. In Holland, the Netherlands, the Hanseatic Provinces, the free city of Hamburg, and probably in all countries which have inherited the perfected justice of the civil law, the government is in legal liability thus subject to the citizen. Even in France, under the late Empire, there was a less circumscribed means of redress, a more certain judicial remedy, a more effective method of enforcing the judgment recovered, than has been given to the American citizen, notwithstanding the pledge of the Constitution. Of all the governments of Europe, it is believed that Russia alone does not hold the state amenable, in matters of property, to the law. Of all the countries whose laws have been examined in this court, Spain only resembles the United States in fettering the judicial proceedings of her courts by restrictions, and leaving the execution of their decrees dependent upon the legislative will."

"RAILROAD AXIOMS."

To deny that railroads very greatly facilitate the exchanges of products, and, consequently, contribute largely to the production of wealth, would be a palpable absurdity. But besides this one simple and indisputable fact, there is a number of so-called facts, or, more truthfully, assertions, which are now current as established axioms concerning the economic influences of railroads, which may be safely set down as delusions. It would not be easy to furnish a more striking illustration of the extent to which interest can succeed in blinding the public than that presented by the wild vagaries on the subject of railroads which a sober, conservative investing public has been gradually seduced into accepting as mathematical truth. So far has this process gone, that it results in perfect intolerance. To question the truth of the assertion that railroads open up the wilderness, or cause the desert to blossom as a rose, has come to be considered as a national heresy. Boldly to deny that the unlimited extension of our railroad system is an unmixed blessing, is a demagogic attack upon the vested rights of our greatest public benefactors.

Here is, for example, the "Manual of the Railroads of the United States for 1871–72, by Henry V. Poor," one of those industrious, careful compilations which, for completeness, promptitude, and general trustworthiness, form a pleasant contrast to the imperfect publications which but too frequently issue from our Government presses. With the general reservation that the information furnished is derived almost exclusively from the parties in interest, it is safe to say that a more trustworthy publication is not often put in the hands of the public. The work is prepared by a gentleman well known in railroad circles as an authority on the general subject, and as one who has probably done more to compound and popularize "railroad axioms" than any other one writer. Every series of this valuable manual is preceded by an introduction, containing a large amount of interesting and striking statistics and illustrations, neatly arranged in a form admirably suited for "editorial use"; and it would be doing the press of the country great injustice to deny that they have liberally and generously contributed towards bringing these matters to the public notice. Amid these statistics and illustrations, undeniable in their truth, lie scattered the seductive "railroad axioms," and among them some insidious but unmistakable errors. Says Mr. Poor, to quote a few of these remarkable axioms:

"With such a work (a railroad), consequently, the circle within which corn and wheat at the prices named (75 cents and $1 25 per bushel) will have a marketable value, will be drawn upon radii of 1,600 and 3,200 miles respectively. The area of a circle with a radius of 125 miles is 49,087 square miles; that of a circle drawn upon a radius of 1,600 miles is about 160 times greater, or 8,042,406 square miles. Such a difference, enormous as it is, only measures the value of the new agencies employed in transportation, and the results achieved, compared with the old." . .

"Wheat that will bear transportation 2,500 miles over railroads, will not bear transportation for more than one-tenth that distance over ordinary highways. Wherever they are constructed, they give immediately, and everywhere, a high commercial value to the products of labor." . . .

". . . . The construction of a railroad will add five times its cost to the aggregate value of the property of the community constructing it. The commerce and wealth which it will create annually (!) will exceed five times its cost. The country, consequently, is vastly better off for it, even should it produce not a dollar of direct revenue." . . .

If statements like these were merely the private views of Mr. Poor, we might afford to laugh at them as harmless delusions. But they are as far as possible from being individual notions; they have, on the contrary, been put forward with a boldness, a perseverance, and, unfortunately, with a success that has converted them into articles of the national faith.

It must be evident at a glance that the paragraphs just quoted are chiefly intended as arguments in favor of new railroads, as refutations of the fears or doubts of investors that the new roads might not pay. The leading assertion is, that a road of 1,600 miles in length would open up to traffic a territory of 8,000,000 of square miles, or 4,000,000 of square miles on each side of the road. Distributing the four millions of square miles equally over the 1,600 miles of road, we should have a territory 1,600 miles long and 5,000 miles wide. Now, to assert that a railroad opens up to traffic regions 2,500 miles distant from it, is such a palpable absurdity that it needs no serious refutation. But many readers may think that the author of that statement was only guilty of some error in his figures, some flaw in his calculations, and that the general fact is, nevertheless, correct, that railroads do open up large territories to traffic and commerce. Let us see.

The great argument of the railroad advocates is this: Corn can be transported over common roads at an expense of 10 cents for every 16 miles; over railroads it can be transported 264 miles for the same amount. Therefore, if corn is worth at any point 75 cents, the producer can afford to transport it 120 miles by common roads, and nearly 2,000 miles by railroad, but if the producer send his corn 120 miles by common road, or 2,000 miles by railroad, and then sell it for 75 cents per bushel, the whole proceeds will be eaten up in freight, and he will receive for his corn—exactly nothing. It is evident, therefore, that he cannot send it quite so far. It is estimated that the average cost of production of corn is not less than 38 cents. If the farmer is to realize cost for his corn, he cannot afford to send it more than 60 miles by common road, or 1,000 miles by railroad. If he is to realize a profit of only 15 per cent., he cannot afford to send it further than 50 miles by common road, or about 850 miles by rail. Now, if a railroad from a given market, like Chicago, for example, is pushed 850 miles out into the wilderness, the farmer who can raise corn to good advantage on the land directly adjoining the road at 38 cents a bushel could afford to send it 850 miles to Chicago to market. If he lived only one mile from the depot, he would have to cart it one mile at an expense equal to its carriage 17 miles by rail; in other words, he could only afford to send it 833 miles by rail. If he lived 10 miles from the depot, he could afford to send it only 680 miles; and if he lived 50 miles from the depot, he must find a market at the depot itself for his corn at 75 cents a bushel, or he cannot exist at all. At Chicago itself, he could afford to cart his corn 50 miles. But, 850 miles from Chicago, his farm must adjoin the depot. In other words, the average territory opened up to traffic by a railroad 850 miles long does not extend beyond 25 miles from the line of the road, as far as the raising of corn is concerned. But go farther. The calculation of 10 cents as the cost of transporting a bushel of corn 16 miles is based upon the experience of the Atlantic or older States, where there are good highways. In the new countries just opened up by railroads, it would be folly to suppose that transportation by carting could be had at any such price. It would be far more reasonable to calculate it at double the cost, and that would at once reduce the area opened to cultivation in corn by a new railroad to less than thirteen miles on either side of the road.

These calculations bring us to something like an intelligible basis of estimate. It is safe to say that any new railroad anywhere in the United States opens up to traffic the territory along its route to the extent of twelve or thirteen miles on either side of the road, if the territory is devoted exclusively to corn-raising. The limits will be extended to about twenty-five miles on either side if the product is exclusively wheat; and the limits will still further widen if other more valuable and less bulky articles are produced. But as throughout all newly opened territories the chief industry must necessarily be confined to the staple products of agriculture, as these will consist of a mixture of corn and wheat, and as a large portion of the territory opened will necessarily be unsuited to cultivation, we can confidently assert that the territory opened up to traffic by new railroads does not on an average exceed fifteen or sixteen miles on either side of the road. This would give for a road of 1,600 miles in length at the outside a territory of 48,000 square miles to drain, in place of Mr. Poor's 8,042,406 square miles. Such a difference, enormous as it is, only measures the difference between the preposterous statements of the railroad advocates and the simple truth.

Whether a new railroad opening up even this restricted traffic might not be reasonably profitable, is not now the question. We know that many roads in the densely populated and highly-cultivated Eastern States, draining a much greater breadth of territory, are far from profitable, and we scarcely believe that roads running in the wilderness will do very much better. But that is not now the question. The question is whether the deliberate statements put forth by the advocates of railroad extension are not gross exaggerations intended wilfully to mislead; and certainly these statements concerning the area thrown open to traffic are, to put it mildly, very far from the truth.

Mr. Poor further tells us, as quoted above, that the construction of a railroad will add five times its cost to the aggregate value of the property of the community constructing it. The estimated average cost of the railroads of the country has never been given below $30,000 per mile. We know that the Union Pacific was made to cost over $100,000, and the Central Pacific over $110,000 per mile. The average is probably nearer $60,000. At this figure the value added to the property of a community by the building of a road must be equal to $300,000 per mile. In the new community, the chief property is in the land; in the wilderness, the entire property is in the land. According to our calculation, that each mile of road throws open thirty square miles, or about 20,000 acres of land, each acre of land within fifteen miles of the road would have to become worth $15 an acre before Mr. Poor's figures could be reached—a result too preposterous for consideration! On the very next page, Mr. Poor tells us that the pioneer can afford to pay $10 an acre for land by the side of a railroad. Few persons stop to consider what $10 an acre means. The pioneer, if he works with borrowed capital, certainly pays not less than ten or twelve per cent. interest. If he works with his own capital, he ought certainly to earn what he might earn if he lent his capital. Ten per cent. interest on $10 is equal to $1 per annum. The interest on an acre of land costing $10 is equal to $1 per annum. If the land yields ten bushels of wheat, a liberal average in the wilderness, the interest will amount to ten cents on each bushel raised. But ten cents will pay for the transportation of a bushel of wheat for two hundred and sixty-four miles. In other words, rather than pay $10 an acre, the pioneer will go two hundred and sixty-four miles further, and settle on Government land. It is precisely in this way that the new railroads are for ever chasing an ignis fatuus over the wilderness. Government gives them the land. To make it of any value at all, they must ask a large price for it. The large price drives the pioneer still further West, or still further away from the line of the road. Then to reach these distant settlements still further lines of railroad must be built, which again drive the pioneer further on. But in the meantime property has indeed advanced. The railroad companies and the real-estate speculators make returns of fabulous values to the census-takers, and the wealth of these newly opened regions apparently increases in an unheard-of ratio; while the truth is that the first excitement of a new road builds up a thin narrow strip of sparsely-settled territory, which maintains for a few years a sickly existence as an inhabited region, and then gradually sinks back into a string of dreary settlements around the station depots, making a precarious living by supplying poverty-stricken meals to the passengers and officers upon the road.

Undoubtedly some of the newer States, like Kansas, Nebraska, Texas, and Arkansas have recently developed new sources of wealth, and have been materially aided in their cultivation by the new railroads recently constructed. How far the anticipated results of these railroad enterprises will be realized is a question yet to be settled by events. But it is very evident that much of the public sentiment by means of which the money has been obtained for their construction has been based upon statements essentially devoid of truth.

ENGLAND.—PARLIAMENTARY FILIBUSTERING—TWO POETS.

LONDON, July 7, 1871.

LAST night the intelligent foreigner might have been witness to a remarkable scene in the House of Commons. As soon as the debate on the Ballot Bill opened, the Liberal party calmly rose and walked out of the House, leaving behind them some half-a-dozen representatives. The Conservatives calmly proceeded to occupy both sides of the semi-vacant chamber. Some of them crossed over to the ministerial benches, and a long debate took place—if that may be called a debate in which one side alone sets forward its objections to a proposed piece of legislation. Once the operation known as a count-out was attempted; but immediately the Liberal members, who had been lurking in the various purlieus of the House, rushed in and prevented the threatened catastrophe. Ultimately, after a good many hours had been consumed in talking, the bill made a little progress, and the House adjourned. The explanation of this remarkable performance is simple enough. Mr. Gladstone had summoned a "caucus" of his party on the preceding day. He said, substantially, that the Conservatives were prepared to oppose the bill, by using all the means of delay given by the forms of the House. They were resolved, in short, to talk the bill to death. To meet this threatened manœuvre, it was proposed that the Liberal majority should maintain an invincible silence; that they should withdraw as much as possible the various amendments which they had proposed, and which might serve as a pretext for discussion; and that they should hold themselves in readiness to give a silent vote whenever it might be demanded. In this way it was hoped that obstruction would be overcome, and that the dead weight of the majority would force the bill upon the reluctant minority.

How far this policy will be successful remains to be seen. The proposal to force a bill through without debating is dangerous enough, and can hardly be successful unless it is generally recognized that the opposition is of a factious and unreasonable nature. Each party is, in fact, trying to draw odium upon the other. Mr. Gladstone's friends accuse the opposition of straining the forms of the House to obstruct a measure which is unmistakably approved by the majority; Mr. Disraeli's friends accuse Mr. Gladstone of trying to force through a measure of which nobody sincerely approves, by means of party discipline. I shall not attempt to decide which view of the case is most accurate, nor to prognosticate the probable fate of the measure. It may, however, be said, without much hesitation, that the spectacle is far from an edifying one, from any point of view. There is certainly much to be said for the hypothesis that the minority are indulging in a palpably factious mode of warfare. It is equally true that there is very little genuine enthusiasm opposed to them. In spite of all that can be said by the ministerial newspapers, secret voting is not one of those reforms which elicits any great amount of enthusiasm. Somehow or other, it has long been the proper thing for a radical to profess himself in favor of the ballot; but the number of those who sincerely believe that it will effect any important change in the purity of our elections is certainly small. The simple truth seems to be that we are all growing rather tired of the session, and rather disgusted with the singularly small legislative harvest which it is likely to bring forth. Liberals have tried to screw themselves up to pass, at any rate, one reform which has been long advocated; and, though they care little enough for the reform itself, think that its adoption will be some defence against the charge that they have done next to nothing in their six months' labor. The Conservatives, on the other hand, seeing how small is the intrinsic zeal displayed, are anxious to throw out the measure, to show the weakness of the Government; and thus the main question really is whether or not Mr. Gladstone is strong enough for the emergency. That, much more than any dispute as to the intrinsic rights of the question, is what really occupies men's minds, and, I presume, it will in time be settled one way or the other. That the world at large cares very much about it seems to be a most doubtful proposition. Meanwhile, we are seeing a kind of parliamentary warfare which has been unknown for many years, and do not feel very much edified by the spectacle. When all argument is resolved into the brute force of silent majorities, the struggle is not very animating, whoever may be chiefly responsible for bringing about such a state of things.

Meanwhile, English society consoles itself by talking about anything else that occurs to it. The one great and absorbing topic has been the cross-examination of the claimant to the Tichborne estates. On that point my mouth is still shut, or I could unfold tales which would astonish your readers, if, indeed, they did not prefer to set them down summarily as foolish bits of gossip—a judgment in which I dare say they would not be far wrong. When, however, this fruitful subject is exhausted, what else remains? The Emperor of Brazil and the Crown Prince of Prussia are at present in London, and help to fill columns of the newspapers. But for all practical purposes, they might as well be in their native wilds—an expression which I venture to use, not as implying a specially unfavorable judgment of their respective countries, but as a natural mode of describing any place outside of British territory. The only other topic which fills our columns just now is a ball at which all the grand people have been displaying themselves in costumes drawn from the Waverley novels, by way of celebrating the centenary anniversary of Scott's birth. The celebration may give some cause for reflection. It is now sixty years since the appearance of "Waverley," and already the ordinary English reader is beginning to pronounce "Waverley" dull. In that there is nothing surprising. Few, indeed, are the books, even of the highest order, which retain very lively attractions for the general public so many years after their appearance. If Scott has already become a little faded, that is no more than might be expected even by the warmest believers in his genius. My own faith in his surpassing merits is certainly not shaken. It is more melancholy to look round and ask what writer there is at the present moment whose works will have the honor even of being pronounced dull in the year 1931? We are in one of the intervals which separate the great outbursts of imaginative genius. There are many very agreeable writers who have no claim to be placed in the first class; but the mantle of the great writers seems to have fallen upon no living successor. George Eliot is, I presume, the one novelist who can be named as having produced work of a really first-rate order. Unluckily, that was a long time ago. The merits of "Romola" are a disputed point; and though to my mind it was an unfortunate misapplication of great power to an impossible task, I know that a good many people admire it exceedingly. But few even among the warm admirers of George Eliot can manage to extend their admiration to her poetry. Of course, the appearance of "Armgart" in this number of Macmillan's Magazine has sent the magazine through three editions, and produced the proper amount of respectful comments. When a writer has acquired so great a reputation, few critics, even though shielded by anonymity, dare to say frankly that she has made a decided mistake. But though public criticism is of the most gentle order, and indulges itself, at the outside, in a few temperate hints that George Eliot is not quite so admirable as she used to be, the private opinion of such critics as I know is unequivocally condemnatory. It is indeed as impossible to deny her very high order of talent and the loftiness of her aims as it is to believe that she is working in the path most suited for her. The latest sensation, by the way, in the poetical order comes from America. Mr. Miller's "Songs of the Sierras" has been received with very great applause by those who are now the most recognized authorities on such subjects. The school which looks up to Mr. Morris, Mr. Rossetti, and Mr. Swinburne as the greatest leaders of modern English poetry, is apt to be a little enthusiastic in its judgments; and some of them, for example, have spoken of Mr. Walt Whitman as if he was, on the whole, the first writer of the age —an opinion which, as I believe, has not yet been endorsed by his fellow-countrymen. This amiable tendency to an excessive warmth of approval makes persons of a colder temperament hesitate before falling at the feet of every new idol set up for our adoration; and I therefore wait before stating that Mr. Miller has carried English criticism by storm. I may, however, assert that it is a long time since any new poet has been received with such unanimous approval by the rulers of our Parnassus.

To return for a moment to politics. There is one other fact which I may as well chronicle. Two years ago an act was passed, amidst general applause, giving power to a commission to overhaul the present arrangements of the English endowed schools, and to turn the very large revenues which they at present enjoy to more useful purposes. The commissioners have set to work with commendable zeal, and, if their proposals can be carried out, we should get a long way towards providing the country with that which it most urgently needs—a thoroughly good system of schools between the highest and lowest grades. Unluckily, the commissioners showed more zeal than discretion by first attacking a school the patronage of which belonged to the corporation of the city of London. Now, the British alderman is—like some other people—intensely attached to his patronage, and has no notion of giving it up to please anybody. Moreover, the city of London has enormous influence; and, finally, though the school does very little good at present, there were no abuses in it of the graver kind. Thus Lord Salisbury was enabled to make a very formidable attack on the proposed reform in the House of Lords. By a very unfortunate arrangement, it was provided in the act that a vote of either House of Parliament was to be fatal to the scheme; and the consequence is that the peers, animated by their most determined leader, could upset without appeal the careful plan of the commissioners. The worst of it is that this vote will doubtless serve as a precedent, and that thus the whole system of reform runs very great risk. Lord Salisbury is, beyond all question, the ablest and staunchest of purely Conservative peers, but he is becoming rather too openly obstructive. His success in this instance is a real misfortune to the country; but I notice it now chiefly because Lord Salisbury's action may, perhaps, be of great importance in the remainder of the session. The question has to be solved whether the House of Lords will venture to tamper with either of the two main bills sent up by the Commons. If they do, a very awkward ministerial crisis will ensue; and the chances of such a catastrophe are certainly increased by the way in which their most determined leader seems to be taking the bit between his teeth.

FRANCE.—THE ARMY—THE LOAN—THE ELECTIONS.

PARIS, July 7, 1871.

THERE is a wind of optimism blowing, like a breeze, over France. We have held two reviews, one of our army, the other of our moneys. A hundred thousand men have been reviewed in the Bois de Boulogne, at the same place where not long ago the new Emperor of Germany reviewed his victorious legions. They passed before M. Thiers silently, without one cry, as if they felt that there was nothing to boast of in the mournful triumphs of civil war. In this regard, the soldiers showed a better feeling than the official journal printed at Versailles, under the dictation of M. Thiers, which, for three months, has been talking constantly of the heroism, the intrepidity, the élan of the troops. All that need be said of the army which is known under the name of the Army of Paris, is that it accomplished its duty. If the word of Nelson, "England expects every man to do his duty," addressed on the day of a battle with the enemies of England, has been admired, how much more does it find its meaning in the dark days of civil war. But there is in the eloquence of M. Thiers an inexhaustible fund of vanity, which the disasters of France have been unable to cure. The army fully deserves his praise, but his praise is not expressed in a manner worthy of its spirit. This army has crushed the most abominable rebellion with a stern courage and a painful sentiment of duty. You must not believe the stories which have been told of the cruelty of the soldiers; if you only saw them go by in the streets, so young (the army is entirely composed of conscripts of twenty years, with the exception of one corps, made up of the prisoners from Germany), so innocent and rural-looking, as they gaze on the monuments of Paris and on its ruins, you would place little credence in the stories which have filled so many correspondents' letters. A new spirit is pervading the army; there is a feeling growing among officers and men that the army must no longer be an instrument of despotism, the gorgeous and lazy guard of a tyrant; its duties are now performed with the regularity and the discipline of the Prussian guard. The officers are going to school, as it were, learning geography and topography; they spend less time in cafés; they understand that their defects have been in a great part owing to their ignorance and to their negligent habits.

The German Government has not been well pleased with the review of the Bois de Boulogne. There was still a French army, animated with a patriotic spirit; it was enough to bring back Manteuffel's headquarters to Compiègne; but we shall avoid giving any offence to the Germans, who occupy still a large part of our territory, and M. Thiers would not be excusable if he did not do everything in his power to diminish the heavy burden of the occupation in the northern and eastern districts.

The review of our moneys has been even more successful. The Government asked for two milliards of francs at one time; in less than a day, the country offered the double. And the subscriptions have been bona-fide subscriptions—the great majority of subscribers offering to make all the payments at once, so as to take advantage of the discount. One hundred and fifty millions in gold have been brought to the Treasury in one day, and deposited by the Government at the Bank. It is really wonderful that, at the end of so lamentable a war, after the extravagant government of Gambetta, and the forced expenses of the second siege of Paris, France should have been still capable of such a gigantic effort. The confidence in the credit of the country is such that there is no premium on gold, and the notes of the Bank of France have not lost a farthing in value. It is probably owing to the fact that in no party, not even among the Red Republicans, has there been a word said in favor of repudiation. I remember that after the Revolution of 1848, M. Fould advised the Government to make a banqueroute; this time the word was not even pronounced. With all her errors, France can be said to have preserved her financial honesty. We are consequently able to borrow the large sum of two milliards at six per cent., which is certainly a low rate of interest under the circumstances. There are, however, great embarrassments in store, when the time comes for the final payments of our ransom to be made to Germany. The Bank has been allowed to increase its circulation by nearly two milliards of francs, but Germany will only be paid in gold or in first-class paper, which will also be changed by her into gold. If the large capital of our ransom is kept in Germany to any great extent, the circulating medium will become scarce in France. For the present all seems easy, and M. Thiers's Government is credited with the victory over the Commune and with the success of the loan.

There is nothing definite in France except what is provisional, says a proverb. We live under a mild personal government, but it is a personal government. The country has just been called upon to name 123 new deputies. In Paris, where the passions have run so high for a year, and where the last elections had a decidedly Communist character, they have been this time of a conservative character. In the provinces, which sent a monarchical majority to the Chamber in February last, 80 Republican deputies have been returned; but among these 80 there are only 30 decided republicans; the fifty others might more properly be called Thiersians, for they are neither republicans nor monarchists systematically. They don't believe in a principle, they believe in a man, and accept the Republic de facto, with Thiers for president. We had already four parties, the Bonapartist—which, by the bye, returns only two members in the last elections, the Legitimists, the Orleanists, and the Republicans. M. Thiers has succeeded in creating a fifth party, which is his own, and which will, as long as he is in power, draw many adherents from all sides. The misfortune of France is that she is politically sceptical and timid; she does not believe in principles, she only believes in men. To-day she believes in Thiers. There is a general current setting towards the Orléans, but it will only remain an undercurrent as long as Thiers can inspire the country with confidence and preserve his health. The country is led by instincts, not by reason; and even these instincts are more of a negative than of a positive character.

It sounds rather odd to say that the last elections have been chiefly directed against the Comte de Chambord; but it is the exact truth. The Count had issued a manifesto of a decidedly clerical character; he would have been forgiven if he only had assumed the tone of a legitimate king; but his allusions to the Pope and to Italy have frightened the country. Even in the old provinces, like Brittany, where the Catholic clergy have still much influence, the peasants will not allow this influence to invade the domain of politics. The impious character of the Commune, the massacre of the archbishop and other distinguished priests, have excited a great horror all through the country; but still the country is not at all prepared to return to a state of things which identified the cause of the monarchy with that of the Catholic priesthood. I believe that the meaning of the elections will be well understood if they are considered as a protestation of the country against clericalism on one side, and Bonapartism on the other. But they are no more republican than monarchical; the constitutional questions are again postponed, and they probably will be for some time. If M. Thiers had consulted the best interests of France, he would, in my opinion, not have invented his theory of "reorganization, not reconstitution"; he would have thrown his influence on the side of constitutional monarchy. He has sacrificed the welfare of France to his own ambition, but, for the present, his faults are not yet perceived by the public. He is really looked upon as a saviour, and he can play at his leisure with all parties, and remain himself in power. It is certainly demoralizing for a country to open two or three ways to every ambition, to every hope, and to accustom itself to live from day to day without any settled principles or desires. But this very uncertainty, so irritating to an honest heart, has some charm for our politicians, who hate simplicity and are fond of intrigue. Our situation is not very different from what it was under the Directory, after the horrors of the Terror; there is a singular fatigue, a certain abhorrence of initiative, in the Chamber and in the country. After so many pains and sufferings, we are contented with breathing. The Prussians are still in France, and the Communists are still in Paris; but we are alive; all our houses are not burnt, all our fields have not been ravaged. What shall we do with France to-morrow? It will be time to-morrow to answer the question. Let us live quietly to-day, Thiers consule. A. L.

Correspondence.

THE PROHIBITIONISTS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Dear Sir: Will you please explain through the columns of your valuable paper the meaning of the expression, the "trickery and unreason of prohibition" (see Nation, No. 315, page 21, 2d column, 7th line)?

I am a regular and interested reader of the Nation, and have taken much interest in prohibition, yet have failed to see in it "trickery and unreason." Respectfully, Geo. H. Vibbert.

East Boston, Mass, July 20, 1871.

[We referred exclusively to the nature of the process by which it has been sought to put the doctrine of prohibition into practice. This has been throughout, in our opinion, marked by "trickery and unreason," and we have so often given our reasons for thinking so that we need not repeat them now. We had no intention of saying, or insinuating, that there was anything tricky or unreasonable in the theory that the sale or drinking of liquor should be prohibited by law.—Ed. Nation.]

CHARLES READE'S LAST PLOT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: We have heard much, at various times, of Charles Reade's plagiarisms. The term is harsh and unfair. It cannot be strictly applied to him any more than to Shakespeare or Byron. At the same time, it must be owned that he understands very cleverly prendre son bien où il le trouve, as a French writer said under similar circumstances. The germ of his present serial may be found in a magazine story written about thirty-three years ago. I have been vainly trying to recollect the title of the article and in what magazine it appeared (it was republished in the Albion), but of the plot I have a tolerably clear recollection. A lady who is in danger of losing the love of her husband—a country squire or nobleman—on account of her barrenness, passes off another woman's child on him and on the world as her own. Afterwards she bears a son, and is tortured at seeing her own offspring thus supplanted by her own act. She is unable to conceal her dislike of the pseudo-heir; he himself perceives it and expostulates with her about it. Meanwhile, his real father, who is a mauvais sujet, becomes connected with poachers, and in an affray between them and the gamekeepers, the son, now grown to a young man, kills the father. The real mother, in her frenzy, discloses the secret, and the supposed father goes mad from the effects of the shock. What becomes of the lady, I forget. In case any of your readers have curiosity and leisure enough to hunt up this old story, I can give them another slight hint and help towards finding it. It appeared about the same time (I should say within six months either way) of Judge Longstreet's "Scenes in Georgia"—a book which had some celebrity in its day as a picture of local manners, and is not altogether without value to the philological student.

Carl Benson.

Lenox, Mass., July 21.

Notes.

The last two sermons preached by President Woolsey before his retirement are in the press of Charles C. Chatfield & Co., New Haven.

—The hearty praise we gave a few months ago (Nation, No. 302) to Vol. III. of the United States Geological Exploration of the 40th Parallel, on "Mining Industry," must be repeated for the atlas which accompanies the text, but which was not completed at the time our notice was written. It is now issued from the Engineers' Department in elegant style, the mechanical execution of the plates being highly creditable to the engraver, M. Julius Bien, of this city. There are fourteen plates in all. The first is a comprehensive map of the mining districts, from Colorado to California, and, as it is the latest, we presume it is the most accurate map in all respects of the States and Territories embraced in it. The scale is small, but, with all its minuteness and even fulness, it is beautifully clear. There is a colored geological map (No. 13) of the Toyabe Mountains, in which Austin is situated, and another (No. 14) of the White Pine District. The rest are devoted to the mines of the Washoe District, the site of Virginia City and of the famous Comstock Lode. To the unpractised eye the horizontal plottings have almost a kaleidoscopic appearance, but a little study shows that this network of variously colored arms represents the different levels which in the longitudinal elevations of the same lode become perfectly intelligible. In fact, the ten plates taken together reveal the nature and extent of gold-mining as no number of visits to the mines themselves would do to an inexperienced observer. We believe, too, that no mines of corresponding magnitude in any part of the world have ever been mapped with so much accuracy and thoroughness; and when we say this, we pay a very high, but only merited, compliment to the gentlemen of the expedition, to the Engineers' Department, and to the Government of the United States.

—General Garfield has just published, in a handsome pamphlet, the oration on the life and character of Gen. George H. Thomas which he delivered last fall before the Society of the Army of the Cumberland. He had a great theme. How the next generation will apportion fame to the men who were leaders in our late war, it is probably too soon to say, except in the case of Lincoln, who, unless all signs fail, is for many reasons secure in the first place. Of purely military reputations, some will be likely to shrink and others to grow under the pens of military judges passing sentence in the full light of all the evidence as to this and that plan, and this and that battle; but we are inclined to think that the reputation of General Thomas rests on as durable a foundation of moral nobility and steadfastness, and of solid, though not distinctively brilliant, military achievement as that of any other soldier of the war. His story should be in all the schools, for, perhaps, there never was an American citizen who more signally displayed in his character and all his conduct in the field and elsewhere, firm-nerved, unfaltering, and clear-eyed devotion to high convictions of duty. He practised, as few of our great men have done, the moral righteousness which is so easy to be understood, and so capable of being inculcated upon the young, and which it is so hard to practise; and, therefore, both for the ease of teaching and the profitableness of what is taught, he may better be set before their eyes as an example than men of abilities more commanding than his and of careers more distinguished. General Garfield's work is well done; for, if it is not of the highest class of literary workmanship, it has the merit of entire freedom from the well-known faults of such things, especially when handled by Congressional orators. And it gives judicious praise and generous admiration, and displays a firmness of moral fibre and a kind of manly severity and dignity, joined to heartiness and unassuming frankness, which is well in keeping with the character of the man whom it celebrates.

—The story that General Garfield had to tell is well known. Thomas's early life; how he met the question with which he found himself confronted in 1860, when the South demanded his services, as she did those of his fellow-officers in the petted 2d Cavalry—Albert Sidney Johnston, R. E. Lee, W. J. Hardee, Earl Van Dorn, E. K. Smith, A. G. Brackett, C. W. Field, W. H. Jenifer, J. B. Hood, Fitz Hugh Lee, G. B. Cosby, J. P. Major—all of whom went over to the enemy and became generals in the Confederate service; how Thomas, Virginian as he was, thought he saw his duty clear, and unhesitatingly did it in circumstances of exceptional difficulty; how he saved the day and the army at Chickamauga; and how, finally, always at work and always in command of the centre regiment, the centre brigade, the centre division, the centre corps, or the centre army, an immovable pivot, he took Hood in hand and destroyed his army at Nashville, the only army in the war destroyed in battle—this is all well recollected, but can hardly be too often recalled. His admirable qualities never showed themselves more plainly than when, just previously to the battle before Nashville, he held out against the heavy pressure of the general-in-chief and the President, and refused to move against Hood till, in his judgment, the time had arrived. On December 9, 1864, he telegraphs to Halleck, who had informed him that he was to be suspended from command for not fighting: "I regret that General Grant should feel dissatisfaction at my delay in not attacking the enemy. I feel conscious that I have done everything in my power to prepare, and that the troops could not have been got ready before this, and if he should order me to be relieved, I will submit without a murmur." Grant's answer to this was that he had telegraphed to have the order relieving him suspended, and he added, man-fashion: "I hope most sincerely that the facts will show you to have been right all the time." A week after, Hood's army was substantially destroyed, and Grant, who had set out from City Point to take the command himself, heard the news at Washington that the facts had shown Thomas to be right all the time, and turned back to his own lines. As often happens in General Sherman's case, of all who speak of Thomas, General Sherman speaks as well as any one. He gives the necessary official orders, and then says: "The General has known General Thomas intimately since they sat as boys on the same bench, and the quality in him which he holds up for the admiration and example of the young is his complete and entire devotion to duty. Though sent to Florida, to Mexico, to Texas, to Arizona, when duty there was absolute banishment, he went cheerfully, and never asked a personal favor, exemption, or leave of absence. In battle he never wavered. Firm, and of full faith in his cause, he knew it would prevail, and he never sought advancement of rank or honor at the expense of any one. Whatever he earned of these was his own, and no one disputes his fame. The very impersonation of honesty, integrity, and honor, he will stand to us as the beau ideal of the soldier and gentleman."

—For some reason or other, the controversy about the use of the Bible in the public schools, which was so hot a year ago, has almost entirely died away, and not even the religious press has said much about the revelation made by one of the secular papers the other day, which showed that the school authorities in Roman Catholic quarters of this city connive at an utter disregard of the regulations ordaining that the Bible shall be read every morning. The last Baptist Quarterly, however, has a long article, which looks at the question from a Protestant point of view, and may, perhaps, interest some persons, and prove to be of value to them. The author undertakes to show that society can never be, and has never been, based upon a social compact, and that the state is necessarily a moral and religious entity, having, as state, relations with God. It owes him, then, the duty of homage, and though the writer does not attach a vital importance to any of our forms of governmental homage to God—the prayer in the Senate and House, for instance; the services of chaplains in the army and navy; the proclamations ordering days of thanksgiving and of fasting—still he thinks they have a decided didactic and moral value, and he would not have them given up at the demand of "the enemies of revelation" and of Roman Catholics. Where draw the line, he enquires, if once we give up the use of the Bible? Should we give up the Bible, it would not be long before these same enemies of revelation, joining with the Romanists, would demand the discontinuance of other acts of governmental worship; or if they did not so demand, it would assuredly be at the expense of consistency. Perhaps consistency seems to this writer's eyes a jewel of greater value than it intrinsically possesses. In the world of politics, it may easily be bought too dear, the world of politics being so practical a world as it is; and certainly in a republic, which dies if its citizens are not intelligent, the education of the young is a question closely allied to practical politics. To make education compulsory everywhere, to put the hand of the State, acting in obedience to the law of self-preservation, on the collar of every Jew boy and girl, and Roman Catholic boy and girl, and Protestant boy and girl, and make them all impartially get a certain amount of mental enlightenment, would seem to be the wise course to take. And to get this necessary work done with as little friction as possible, it may well turn out to be worth the State's while to refrain from shocking any one's feelings of religious partisanship by a ceremony usually very perfunctorily performed, and, when done with earnestness, often done with more zeal than knowledge. The Roman Catholic would not be pleased with this arrangement; but he would not, as now he has, have a very plausible grievance to plead every time that he wants public money for his sectarian schools, of which he is now the most active enemy. This same number of the Baptist Quarterly contains an article giving what purports to be a new and literal translation of the Chinese "Three Letter Classic," the famous primary school-book, in which millions of small Chinamen are to-day taking, as for centuries millions of others have taken, their first lessons in reading. It will be found not only curious to the casual reader, but of some interest to educators. It will, perhaps, cause some of them to consider for the first time whether it is most expedient to put into the heads of youthful learners only that which they can assimilate, or whether it may not be well to give them some things a little too high for them. It is a bad mixture of metaphors, but may not the germinant power of the corn make it better food than something more immediately digestible?

—With the exception of a new poem by Robert Browning, there is no work among the recent English publications and announcements that is particularly distinguished for its subject or its author, though not a few promise to repay the reader. Mr. Browning's poem will be called "Balaustion's Adventure," and will include a transcription from Euripides. "The History of England, from the year 1830," by William Nassau Molesworth, ought to be a valuable addition to a working library; and so ought "A Manual of Anthropology, based on Modern Research," by Charles Bray. Professor Nathan Sheppard, lately Paris correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette and of the New York Examiner and Chronicle, will republish some of his letters, doubtless, in "Shut up in Paris during the Siege," his feelings, as we recollect them, being akin to those of a man caged up in a menagerie with tigers and monkeys. "A Text-Book of Indian History," by Rev. G. N. Pope; and "The Highlands of Central India," by the late Captain Forsyth, will be acceptable to students and tourists of the East. Swiss tourists, on the other hand, may consult "Scrambles among the Alps in the years 1860-69," by Edward Whymper; and "Peaks in Pen and Pencil, for Artistic Students of Alpine Scenery," by Elijah Walton, F.G.S. Another noticeable book of travel or geography is Rear-Admiral Hornby's "Cruise Round the World of the Flying Squadron." A pleasant and learned writer, Rev. Charles Rogers, publishes his fourth work on the manners of Scotland, under the title, "A Century of Scottish Life: Memorials and Recollections of Historical and Remarkable Persons, with illustrations of Caledonian Humor," which may be recommended without reserve for light reading and something more. The theological list embraces: "Our Family Likeness: Illustrations of Our Origin and Descent," by the Dean of Carlisle; and a "Glossary of Ecclesiastical Terms," by various writers, with the Rev. Orby Shipley for editor. In music, we note "A Theory of Harmony, founded on the Tempered Scale," by John Stainer, Mus. Doc.

—The Gazette des Tribunaux states that a part of the immense archives of the Paris Prefecture of Police has been saved from the flames. Most of the historical papers relating to the Revolution were preserved, but some have disappeared, and it is asserted that certain persons who were very influential under the Commune appropriated a number with a view of selling them hereafter. If this be the case, the missing documents may in the course of time find their way back to the archives. As for the archives of the Commune itself, Dr. E. Pierotti edits "Décrets et rapports officiels de la Commune de Paris et du gouvernement de Versailles, du 18 Mars au 31 mai 1871," and a plan of Paris showing the fires and the devastation caused by the Commune during the same period.

—The orthography of the Flemish language has lately been somewhat modified by a royal decree, and a printer demands of the King an indemnity of 90,000 francs, on the ground that the decree prevents his selling his stock of dictionaries. "Orthographical liberty or my 90,000 francs," cries M. Greuse. Across the Channel, the great English manufacturers of Bibles have, for similar reasons, trembled for their sales in view of the new version of the Scriptures now in progress; while publishers of the Church Service are just now embarrassed by the prospect of a law authorizing the use of a new Table of Lessons, which, however, is not to become compulsory till January, 1879. This interval will probably permit the working off of the old stock. Now, we would suggest, is the time for the Emperor Wilhelm to signalize his accession to the imperial throne, and to secure as his laudators large bands of men of letters—best friends for sovereigns—by ordaining that hereafter all books printed within his realms shall be printed in Roman characters, and that German script shall be utterly abolished.

— The horrid deeds of the Commune, and the undaunted manifestoes of the Internationals, have caused every European nation some anxious reflections; and if among the intelligent classes there is a final assurance that modern society is proof against its avowed enemies, few can bear to contemplate the probability of a struggle and a victory like that from which France has just emerged. Italy, as the next neighbor of France, and sharer for many years of its political movements and ideas, is naturally much disturbed. The social problem has been made the theme of many articles in the newspapers, and of several books addressed to the working-classes. An able writer in the Gazzetta d'Italia has set forth fairly the complaints of the Communists and Socialists, in order to expose the fallacy of their doctrines and the dreadful consequences of their success. Professor Sbarbaro, besides publishing a tract, "Della Libertà," designed to build up a new conservative party as a bulwark against the disorganizers, joins his colleagues, Senators Rossi and Alfieri, in using the press for the same object. Such well-known authors as Niccolò Tommaseo and Cesare Cantù appeal by direct exhortation or in the guise of fiction to the understandings of workingmen—the former in "I doveri e i diritti d'ogni buon Italiano—Memorie e speranze per il popolo;" the latter in "Portafoglio d'un operaio," which is dedicated to Rossi. Both these are educational works of a high order, and well calculated to improve, as far as books can, the political, moral, and economical notions of the laboring class.

THE LIFE AND WORKS OF BISHOP BERKELEY.*

THE editor of the collected works of Bishop Berkeley has formed a correct and severe idea of his own duty, and has been faithful to it. His prefaces and annotations are brief, and are restrained to such remarks of various kinds as throw light upon the meaning of the text. His remarks are not critical, but exegetical. His criticism is reserved for a special essay in the fourth volume. The diligence and pains with which he has followed up every hint or trace are especially evident in the "Life," which is given in the fourth volume. The materials for this biography were, unfortunately, very meagre. Any one would be glad to know more of this Anglican ecclesiastic of the eighteenth century who was ready to give up a rich Irish deanery and go out to found a college in America. Nothing but genuine devotion to work could have led him to conceive of this enterprise, and endeavor to carry it out at immense sacrifice. Any American would be glad to know more of this man who took such an interest in this country, and who had such broad and enlightened views in regard to it at a time when Walpole was minister, and the policy of England towards the colonies was narrow and bigoted to an astonishing degree. It is satisfactory, however, to feel that, though we should like more, we have all which was to be obtained. The letters which have been preserved are few in number, and of no great interest. They are largely taken up with private affairs, in connection with a legacy which was left to him in a most romantic manner by Swift's "Vanessa." They were mostly written when he was in London preparing to sail for Bermuda, and show by incidental references how much his heart was set on that scheme. A few were written from Newport, R. I.; but we learn more of his life there from "Alciphron," which was written during his residence in this country. With Dr. Samuel Johnson (first President of King's [Columbia] College) he exchanged brief letters from time to time, mostly in relation to Yale College, but all manifesting genuine interest in the cause of education in America, although his own scheme had been utterly shipwrecked by the selfish and suspicious policy of the Government. All manifest a truly catholic and earnest spirit. He believed in truth, and sought it in independent thought, not in tradition. He had no narrow or dogmatic creed, and no ecclesiastical spirit, but sought good and truth everywhere, and recognized them wherever he found them.

The key to his philosophy is to be found in an instinctive revolt against the abstractions of scholastic tradition. The times in which he lived present no edifying spectacle to the reader of history. The most crabbed Toryism, which supports privilege and privileged institutions in the genuine protective spirit, and whose policy is to make fat places and then get into them one's self, was rampant in church and state. If any man had thought or enthusiasm, or believed in anything but "port wine and pluralities," he was regarded as a busybody. There was very little faith either in the church or out of it. Sermons were dry and stupid, and either thrashed over again the straw of scholastic theology, or else ran into disquisitions on Tory political philosophy. It is no mean merit in the young student of Trinity College that he revolted against all this, and set to work to find a fresh and free philosophy on an independent basis. He naturally fell into crude, exaggerated, and one-sided views. One man, or one generation, could not follow out such a theory as he started and criticise it in all its bearings. As for himself, he was enthusiastic, and his notions, when once adopted, became hobbies; but he broke boldly with what he saw was false, and his philosophy, though it has been much misunderstood, has had a wide influence on modern thought—far wider, in fact, than many who use it are accustomed to know or admit.

The notion which was current in philosophy when Berkeley grew up to a knowledge of it, and against which he protested most energetically, was that of an abstract something called "matter." The old mediæval distinction of substance and accidents still lingered in the schools under the form of "matter" and its "qualities," and to the former of these, though it was, concededly, unconceived and inconceivable, undefined and undefinable, was ascribed, in language at least, an efficiency to "cause" certain sensations in the human mind. Thus matter was only half-dethroned from its ascendancy over mind. In fact, this state of things yet exists. The mediæval philosophy of substance and accidents is at the bottom of the sacramental system which has produced a reaction in the Anglican Church. In Hume and Comte, the exclusive interest in physical phenomena, and the indifference to spiritual questions and interests, involve the same preponderating interest in matter as against mind. In materialism (in the modern sense), matter forms half the duality which rules the world. In Sir William Hamilton's philosophy, in the dogmatic scholastic form to which Dean Mansel has reduced it, materialism (in the sense of Berkeley) is once more revived. Certainly, if the republication of Berkeley's works could rekindle the study of this subject, and extricate us from this tangle, it would serve a most useful purpose. We may be permitted, with him, to revolt by instinct against all these apotheoses of matter, whether we are ready with a positive solution or not. In his case, the proposition that mind alone is absolute, and that matter is dependent, was a point of faith, a dogma, if we choose to call it so; and the aim of his life was to discover the true philosophy, matter being assumed to have an absolute existence. He no doubt made his assertions, in this respect, too absolute, and the dearth of philosophical thought at the time was such that he was not forced to the strict definitions which were necessary. Professor Fraser seems, in his critical essay, out of zeal for the reputation of his author, to change sometimes the contents of Berkeley's expressions. This is not worth while. There is a sense in which the objects of sense have no existence save as a human mind perceives them, and, therefore, have only an intermittent existence. Suppose that an orange lies somewhere unnoticed. It is not merely a visible colored extension, nor an odor, nor a taste, nor an object of touch, having extension in three dimensions, but the word "orange," as used by men, means all these sensations combined. As sensations, they can exist and be combined only in a mind, therefore the "orange" has no existence save as it is perceived in a human mind. But this is not what Berkeley meant. If it were, his speculation would have no practical value, but be a mere barren metaphysical subtlety.

In the philosophy which Berkeley elaborated, his belief in God, and his conception of God, form a religious or dogmatic basis, which is assumed. He finds three factors in human knowledge, the perceiving mind, the sense-perceptions, and the divine will, which exhibits these perceptions to the mind. To the obvious question whether material objects, having only a dependent existence, have an intermittent existence, or are not, when no human mind is perceiving them, he answers that they are perpetually perceived by God, and that their permanent existence is due to the continuance of the divine will in its intention that they shall exist (Providence). This is the doctrine of the dialogues between Philo- nous and Hylas, in which he first controverts the traditional materialism, and then, having reduced his interlocutor to scepticism, assails him in that position. In his view, the sensations in the human mind are due to phenomena which the supreme mind continually "exhibits" to the human mind, and he does not doubt of their permanency, regularity, and truthfulness, because he cannot doubt of the benevolence and truthfulness of the supreme agent. Here we at once perceive the ground for an apparent connection between his philosophy and more recent scepticism; for, although he set out to combat materialists and sceptics, it is certain that his doctrines have, historically, had more affinity with sceptical than orthodox philosophy. If any one accepted his general view of physical phenomena, yet omitted his assumptions in regard to the Supreme Being, he had only one step to take to apply the same doctrine to mind, and reduce all things to phenomena, and found a sceptical philosophy (Hume, Comte). Modern thinkers, devoting their attention mainly to physics, and seeking a solution even of metaphysical problems through physics, have omitted Berkeley's third factor from the account. They resolutely set aside the First Cause. Inasmuch as his aims, purposes, and motives are inscrutable to man, they have no proper place in human science. Of the correctness of this procedure, on purely scientific grounds, there can be no question: nevertheless, an element of which we make abstraction for a particular purpose, is by no means absolutely denied or put out of existence—an evident proposition which the most ambitious scientists are most likely to forget. Although, as a scientist, I may set aside the First Cause, and restrain my science to the second causes which are its only legitimate object, yet to me, as a man, the First Cause loses none of its importance or interest. The more definitely science removes God from the domain of science, the more definitely it shows that his existence cannot ultimately be ignored, and that it has its proper place in the domain of faith, where, in fact, with Berkeley, it remains. The history of philosophy since his time, and its struggles to rise to the height of its task without the help of this factor, bear witness to this fact, and the latest and best German philosophy has already recognized it. Science, as such, has nothing to do with faith, but philosophy, which aims to embrace the whole man, can never ignore faith and its data and phenomena. We may try to ignore the knotty problem of "causality," and take things simply as they are, without establishing any doctrine of their relations; we may try to ignore metaphysical and spiritual speculations, and confine our attention to sense-perceptions, but the phenomena remain, and the human mind is certain to revert to them and seek their solution. This assumption of Berkeley cannot, therefore, be condemned as unwarrantable and unphilosophical.

* "The Works of George Berkeley, D.D., formerly Bishop of Cloyne; including many of his Writings hitherto unpublished; with Prefaces, Annotations, his Life and Letters, and an Account of his Philosophy. By Alexander Campbell Fraser, M.A., Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in the University of Edinburgh." In 4 vols. Oxford: At the Clarendon Press. 1871. New York: Macmillan & Co.

Berkeley's speculations commenced during his undergraduate years. He founded a society which met weekly and debated philosophical questions, and whose proceedings were kept secret, probably from prudential motives. His first publication also shows a spirit of accommodation, by which it must have been much weakened in its effect. It is necessary now to bring his philosophy from later works to its elucidation. This first publication was the "New Theory of Vision." According as we view it, it is either an application of his philosophy or one of the observations on which it is founded, and, in one case, the philosophy which is applied, or, in the other, the philosophy which is deduced, remains unmentioned. He denied that distance was visible, or that extension in any one of the three dimensions, or that anything but color, was perceived by sight. With regard to the third dimension of space, he proves this satisfactorily enough, and no one denies it, but he passes lightly over the first two dimensions, and in regard to these it is certain that he was mistaken. He maintained that all our ideas of distance and dimension come from the sense of touch, including in this all locomotion and all movements of the muscles, even of those of the eyes. The sensations by which the eye judges of distance are, according to him, empirically associated with sensations of touch; hence only is this power to judge acquired. He denies the necessary or mathematical character of these judgments, and affirms that they are won by connecting an arbitrary sign with the thing signified. These signs are marks of relations which God has fixed, but not conditions under which God acts.

Of course the question here raised is as old as Aristotle and Plato, and involves the controversy as to the created and acquired powers of man. That controversy still remains unsettled, and Berkeley, in "Siris," the work of his old age, is more timid and cautious in his expressions which touch upon it. It is astonishing to us, who are accustomed to debate these questions only by adducing facts of observation and experience, to miss them in Berkeley's works. Many observations bearing upon this question, whether we start in life with an outfit of faculties, or whether all our faculties are acquired, have been collected, but they are strangely contradictory. It is certain that infants spend the first months of life in acquiring the arts of seeing and feeling, which are quite as difficult as those of talking and walking. Smelling and tasting are developed later. The skill and perfection attained in these arts vary as much as in writing, speaking, and drawing, and there is always the question of natural aptitude. Different talents are developed at different times in life, and different instincts manifest themselves as their appropriate organs are developed. Likes and dislikes are apparently innate, but also subject to education. Accords and discords, on the other hand, seem to be "necessary." Here is a point upon which much interesting investigation has been spent, but as yet without decisive conclusions. To take up still more elementary powers: The infant manifests an instinctive power to perform such action as is necessary for its sustenance, and the young of animals find their way to the teats of the mother. The child begins to exercise its legs in jumping long before it tries to walk. The young bird spreads and flutters its wings. Young ducks seek the water, while nothing can persuade chickens to swim. Thus perplexing are the phenomena. Some of them point to a germinal, innate power; others seem to reduce all to education. The same perplexity meets us in regard to conscience and many moral powers, which are often assumed to be innate, but are certainly liable to great influence from education, and also in regard to the oldest and apparently most universally interesting problems of human life—love between the sexes. These facts have been collected and criticised by Dr. Du Bois-Reymond, of Berlin, in a "Festrede" on the "Leibnitz'che Gedanken in der neuern Natur-Wissenchaft." He brings them into connection with Leibnitz's doctrine of the "Pre-established Harmony" as a general, if not in all respects an exhaustive, explanation of them. This is the present state of the question, and, in spite of the truth of much of Berkeley's argument about acquired skill in the interpretation of arbitrary signs, as an explanation of all sensations of sight, these facts show us that the doctrine has its limitations. One great difficulty is that probably no two of us have exactly the same sensations from the same object of sense. We have no means of comparing the sensations which we experience, save the clumsy one of language, and therefore, when Berkeley appeals to consciousness, he appeals, on his own principles, to skill in interpreting a certain symbolism (which varies in the apprehension of different individuals), in interpreting which their skill will vary as much as in the use of a painter's brush.

The last work of importance which Berkeley published is called "Siris." It is remarkable for its philosophical reflections, which offer his mature thought, but also because it is an elaborate argument for a panacea. Berkeley having noticed the undoubted purifying and healing effects of tar, seized upon it with his wonted enthusiasm, and rode it to death as a hobby. He prescribed tar-water for every ill, and advocated its use with benevolent zeal. It was widely believed in and used in Europe and America about the middle of the last century. The belief in a panacea was one of the most remarkable delusions of the Middle Ages; and it is instructive to see the broad and generous philosopher, the key to whose life was set by an instinctive revolt against the mediæval notion of matter, fall a victim to this faith in its efficacy.

There is always a certain sadness in reading metaphysical works: they impress on us so distinctly the fate of man to clutch always at the truth, yet never to grasp it. The history of these pursuits is that of a Sisyphus labor; and the philosopher in his study is, as is suggested by a quaint vignette copied in one of these volumes, like a child grasping at his own reflection in a mirror. Yet no man is fit for philosophy unless he has the faith and perseverance to go on until he at least finds out why the illusion appears before him.

CANON KINGSLEY IN THE WEST INDIES.*

Mr. Agassiz, when he was in Brazil, being out in the woods one day, got much enjoyment from the natural scenery, he tells us. He saw a forest of dicotyledonous trees with a monocotyledonous undergrowth. There is a good deal of similar scenery-painting in this book of Mr. Kingsley's, and we think it best to warn such of our readers as take our advice and get the new volume, not to be frightened away from it by such passages as the following, for example, which we confess we think an abominable imposition upon the public. Too much for our patience, at any rate, we have found them, and though we have, on the whole, been pleased with the book, we acknowledge a serious amount of skipping. This is the passage, and it is not an unfair specimen of about a quarter part of the whole:

* "At Last: A Christmas in the West Indies. By Charles Kingsley. With illustrations." New York: Macmillan & Co. 1871.

"It is impossible to describe the feelings of the botanist when arriving at a field like this, so much unlike anything he has seen before. Here are full-blowing large Orchids, with red, white, and yellow flowers; and among the grasses, smaller ones of great variety, and as great scientific interest—Melastomaceous plants of various genera; Utricularias, Droseras, rare and various grasses, and Cyperoids of small sizes and fine kinds, with a species of Cassytha; in the water, Ceratophyllum (the well-known hornwort of the English ponds) and bog-mosses. Such a variety of forms and colors is nowhere else to be met with in the island."

This is quoted by Mr. Kingsley—from a certain "poor Doctor Krueger," who apparently made a bad end—but it is not essentially different from very much of his own writing. If he had collected ferns with half the young ladies of his parish, when he had one, and had taken a pastor's interest in the aquariums of the other half of them, he could not have talked cheap botany and ichthyology, but especially botany, with more wearisome fluency and apparent interest. He will leave anything—obeah women, deadly snakes eight feet long, sharks, coolies' houses, poisonous shrubs, negro longshoremen's songs, lakes of liquid pitch which one may touch without defilement and even wash in, British civilization in the jungle, surf-bathing, wonderful caves, old tales of the buccaneers and pirates who made "the Spanish Main" words of such baleful import and such irresistible fascination to the boys of twenty years ago, stories of the cruelty of Maroons and Spaniards, of the invincible gallantry of English sailors, of the miserable sufferings of the Indians—some one or other of these things our author is constantly forsaking for a "bare tangle of stems and boughs," "a virgin forest," "a panicum divaricatum," "a hundred plants of yellow Allemanda, or purple Dolichos," "a cousin of our periwinkles, and a cousin, too, of the Thevetia," "a scleria latifolia," or some other vegetable growth as to which no person right in his mind should, it seems to us, assume that anybody not in botany as a business can take the least interest. Here is more of it—a favorable specimen:

"That tree with upright branches, and large, dark, glossy leaves tiled upwards along them, is the Mammee Sapota, beautiful likewise. And what is the next, like an evergreen peach, shedding from the underside of every leaf a golden light—call it not shade? A Star-apple; and that young thing which you may often see grown into a great timber-tree, with leaves like a Spanish chestnut, is the Avocado, or, as some call it, alligator, pear. This with the glossy leaves, somewhat like the Mammee Sapota, is a Sapodilla, and that with leaves like a great myrtle, and bright flesh-colored fruit, a Malacca-apple, or perhaps a Rose-apple. Its neighbor, with large leaves, grey and rough underneath, flowers as big as your two hands, with greenish petals and a purple eye, followed by fat scaly yellow apples, is the Sweet-sop; and that privet-like bush with little flowers and green berries a Guava, of which you may eat if you will, as you may of the rest."

While we are speaking "in this connection," as they say in Boston, we may mention two things that Mr. Kingsley says in the course of his interminable talk about what trees and bushes and flowers he has seen. He gives a hint which perhaps it might be worth the while of some of our decorators to take, when he says that many of the plants in the forests of Trinidad and the other islands which he visited are extremely beautiful in leaf and stem, and most of them are novel, and, especially as they grow together, naturally disposed, would be of excellent service in the arts of design. He also makes the remark that of all the vast number of West Indian fruits, none is so good as an English pear, apple, or strawberry. This we take to be true; we have found it verified by our experience, so far as that has gone. But it might have occurred to Mr. Kingsley when he observed, as probably he often did, a panting negro lying in the shade with his face buried in half a cool watermelon, that in all probability the black man preferred, for very good reasons, too, the West Indian fruit to all the apples of Devonshire. Mr. Kingsley's remark is an illustration—harmless enough, and not so British as most remarks made by the tourist in foreign lands—of that readiness of the traveller to apply his own little foot-rule to everything.

Two or three things we all, as citizens of this republic, keep laid up against Mr. Kingsley; and many of us, in other than our civic capacities, have him more or less in derision, so that it is disagreeable to some of us, and grates much upon our feelings, to praise him or hear him getting praise. But it will have to be admitted by the best amongst our patriots that people who want summer reading might do worse than take this book into the country or down by the seaside and read a good half of it at least—or all of it, if they care for the crimson Norantea and the purple dolichos and sapodillas and sapotas and the like. It gives pleasant pictures of the beauties of the islands and their surrounding waters; and though it is not very full nor very interesting on such subjects as the domestic, social, and commercial life of the West Indians; and though, as we have hinted, it might well deal at greater length than it does with some little known matters of past and contemporary West Indian history, it nevertheless is a pleasing book. It makes very little display of Mr. Kingsley's faults. Recollecting his talk about Eyre, the Jamaica Governor, and his prostrate admiration for the young British aristocrat, and the way in which, during the rebellion of the South, he backslid from his former unctuous faith in the negro, we were expecting to find some valuable screeds of political economy from him when he got hold of the sugar culture, and some remarks about Voudooism and laziness that would do the World's very heart good. But he is quite mild; and though he speaks far more highly of the coolies and Chinamen than of the blacks, and apparently has no very high hopes for the negro's future, we should say that he is not ill-disposed towards him, and not unjust. As for our young administrator, the Kingsleyan youthful Briton, with the Devonshire blood in him, and the clear blue eye in the head of him, and the whip or the sword equally at home in the hand of him, and the truth always on the tongue of him, and all the rest of it, he hardly puts in an appearance at all, though there is a little of him. It is almost entirely inoffensive, however, and some of it good, especially as there is next to nothing of the peculiar slang which the Kingsleys, attempting to copy Carlyle, first let loose on a suffering public of novel-readers. A touch of it we get now and again, as when the Cubans revolt against the Spaniards, being at last determined to see what they can "make of themselves on this earth"; and as when the government of one of the colonies is said to be "good work" got out of a man. Only a Kingsley, or Mr. George Lawrence, can tell why writers should talk of a revolt as being specifically "on this earth." To almost all other writers, the statement that Cuba was the scene of the insurrection would seem sufficiently specific, without mention of the planet. But, as we say, there is here very little of this sort of talk, though we do not know that we should yet trust Mr. Kingsley when out of the woods, and away from his philodendron lacerum, and tillandsia, and cinchonaceous plants; there is still some of the old gleam in his eye, and it would not be wonderful to find him in his next book writing as of old.

When one has condemned the inordinate and exasperating botany of "At Last," pretty much all the faultiness of the work has, we think, been mentioned. Unless, indeed, one were to grumble at the perfectly unmeaning title, which would be with difficulty excusable in a struggling young novelist, and clearly is improper in a writer of Mr. Kingsley's standing, whose name is enough to sell his books, and who has no need of such devices. Forty years ago, when he was a boy, Mr. Kingsley had the wish to visit the West Indies; from childhood, he says, he had studied their natural history, their charts, their romances and their tragedies, and had longed to see the Spanish Main, and "at last," in December of 1870, as we make out the date, he found himself crossing the Atlantic in fulfilment of his childish desire. He sets out well, with a blast out of the old Kingsleyan trumpet—not such bad music at times—which he blows in honor of a figure that has caused him very much of the joy and rejoicing he has had—a famous English sailor, namely, who is foul of many times his weight in Spaniards:

"And as we looked out into the darkness, we could not but recollect, with a flush of pride, that yonder on the starboard beam lay Flores, and the scene of that great fight off the Azores, on August 30, 1591, made ever memorable by the pen of Walter Raleigh—and of late by Mr. Froude; in which the Revenge, with Sir Richard Grenville for her captain, endured for twelve hours, before she struck, the attack of eight great Spanish armadas, of which two (three times her own burden) sank at her side; and after all her masts were gone, and she had been three times boarded without success, defied to the last the whole fleet of fifty-one sail, which lay around her, waiting, 'like dogs around the dying forest-king,' for the Englishman to strike or sink. Yonder away it was that, wounded again and again, and shot through body and through head, Sir Richard Grenville was taken on board the Spanish Admiral's ship to die; and gave up his gallant ghost with those once-famous words: 'Here die I, Richard Grenville, with a joyful and quiet mind; for that I have ended my life as a true soldier ought, fighting for his country, queen, religion, and honor; my soul willingly departing from this body, leaving behind the lasting fame of having behaved as every valiant soldier is in his duty bound to do.'

"Yes; we were on the track of the old sea-heroes; of Drake and Hawkins, Carlile and Cavendish, Cumberland and Raleigh, Preston and Sommers, Frobisher and Duddely, Keymis and Whiddon, which last, in that same Flores fight, stood by Sir Richard Grenville all alone, and, in 'a small ship called the Pilgrim, hovered all night to see the successe: but in the morning, bearing with the Revenge, was hunted like a hare amongst many ravenous houndes, but escaped'—to learn, in after-years, in company with hapless Keymis, only too much about that Trinidad and Gulf of Paria whither we were bound."

Of the coolie system, as he saw it in operation, Mr. Kingsley speaks highly, and unless there is another side to the story the coolies are well cared for during their voyage out, are mercifully protected by the law, and well treated by their employers, live happy and, on the whole, virtuous lives, and will do the West Indies a vast deal of good. They are, for example, so well pleased with their condition that it is not at all unusual for individuals among them to return from India when, in accordance with the contract, they have been carried home after their stipulated term of service had expired. Indeed, some of them have settled for life on the land which the government stands pledged to give any coolie who foregoes his right to a passage home. In writing about the first coolies whom he saw, Mr. Kingsley answers a question which, perhaps, will recur to some of his readers, and tells us that the coolie may be expected to hold his own against the negro, who, as a rule, does not like him:

"The third thing noteworthy in the crowd which cooked, chatted, lounged, sauntered idly to and fro under the Matapalos—the pillared air roots of which must have put them in mind of their own Banyans at home—was their good manners. One saw in a moment that one was among gentlemen and ladies. The dress of many of the men was nought but a scarf wrapped round the loins; that of most of the women nought but the longer scarf which the Hindoo woman contrives to arrange in a most graceful as well as a perfectly modest covering, even for her feet and head. These garments, and perhaps a brass pot, were probably all the worldly goods of most of them just then. But every attitude, gesture, tone, was full of grace; of ease, courtesy, self-restraint, dignity—of that 'sweetness and light,' at least in externals, which Mr. Matthew Arnold desiderates. I am well aware that these people are not perfect; that, like most heathen folk and some Christian, their morals are by no means spotless, their passions by no means trampled out. But they have acquired—let Hindoo scholars tell how and where—a civilization which shows in them all day long; which draws the European to them and them to the European, whenever the latter is worthy of the name of a civilized man, instinctively, and by the mere interchange of glances; a civilization which must make it easy for the Englishman, if he will but do his duty, not only to make use of these people, but to purify and ennoble them.

"Another thing was noteworthy about the coolies, at the very first glance, and all we saw afterwards proved that that first glance was correct; I mean their fondness for children. If you took notice of a child, not only the mother smiled thanks and delight, but the men around likewise, as if a compliment had been paid to their whole company. We saw afterwards almost daily proofs of the coolie men's fondness for their children; of their fondness also—an excellent sign that the morale is not destroyed at the root—for dumb animals. A coolie cow or donkey is petted, led about tenderly, tempted with tit-bits. Pet animals, where they can be got, are the coolie's delight, as they are the delight of the wild Indian. I wish I could say the same of the negro. His treatment of his children and of his beasts of burden is, but too often, as exactly opposed to that of the coolie as are his manners. No wonder that the two races do not, and it is to be feared never will, amalgamate; that the coolie, shocked by the unfortunate awkwardness of gesture and vulgarity of manners of the average negro, and still more of the negress, looks on them as savages; while the negro, in his turn, hates the coolie as a hard-working interloper, and despises him as a heathen; or that heavy fights between the two races arise now and then, in which the coolie, in spite of his slender limbs, has generally the advantage over the burly negro, by dint of his greater courage and the terrible quickness with which he wields his beloved weapon, the long hardwood quarterstaff."

We had intended to make more quotations, there being several things that our readers would like to see, and among others something concerning the hideous fêr de lance, a rat-tailed snake, sometimes seven or eight feet long, with a flat, triangular head, a heavy jaw, and an eye and lip expressive of the utmost malevolence and craft, whose bite is deadly to man, but which another snake, the cribo, which is harmless and a household pet, fights with for hours, and swallows when he has killed him. But we have space only for this passage, which suggests something of the charm and repose of life in the tropics, and suggests, too, the question which Mr. Kingsley, also, more than once asks himself at sight of similar scenes:

"The sea gives him fish enough for his family, and for a brawny brown servant. His cocoa-nut palms yield him a little revenue; he has poultry, kids, and goats' milk more than he needs; his patch of provision ground in the place gives him corn and roots, sweet-potatoes, yam, tania, cassava, and fruit too, all the year round. He needs nothing, owes nothing, fears nothing. News and politics are to him like the distant murmur of the surf at the back of the island; a noise which is nought to him. His Bible, his almanac, and three or four old books on a shelf, are his whole library. He has all that man needs, more than man deserves, and is far too wise to wish to better himself.

"I sat down on the beach beneath the amber shade of the palms, and watched my white friends rushing into the clear sea, and disporting themselves there like so many otters, while the policeman's little boy launched a log canoe, not much longer than himself, and paddled out into the midst of them, and then jumped upright in it, a little naked brown Cupidon; whereon he and his canoe were of course upset, and pushed under water, and scrambled over, and the whole cove rang with shouts and splashing, enough to scare away the boldest shark, had one been on watch off the point. I looked at the natural beauty and repose; at the human vigor and happiness: and I said to myself, and said it often afterwards in the West Indies: Why do not other people copy this wise Scot? Why should not many a young couple, who have education, refinement, resources in themselves, but are, happily or unhappily for them, unable to keep a brougham and go to London balls, retreat to some such paradise as this (and there are hundreds like it to be found in the West Indies), leaving behind them false civilization, and vain desires, and useless show; and there live in simplicity and content 'The Gentle Life?' It is not true that the climate is too enervating. It is not true that nature is here too strong for man. I have seen enough in Trinidad, I saw enough even in little Monos, to be able to deny that; and to say that in the West Indies, as elsewhere, a young man can be pure, able, high-minded, industrious, athletic; and I see no reason why a woman should not be likewise all that she need be."

THE MISERY OF LONDON.*

WHOEVER cares to be confronted with the dismal problem, recently discussed in these pages, of London poverty, needs but to read the "Episodes in an Obscure Life." The author of this book is a curate, who has had a lifelong habit of exploring the by-ways of the East End; and who, with alert observation, has held discourse for a lifetime with the strange population of misery that throngs its dark places. In the volume before us, he describes the "mudlarks," the "shore-workers," the "slaveys" of London, and records the bird-catcher's biography, and tells us of the "cadger," the tramp, the flower-seller, the dredger, and the starving girl, who is designated in the relief-registers, with an irony beyond art, as "gay." These, and a score of other characters, grotesque or pathetic, form the cast of the Beggar's Opera which this observant curate has produced. It is the material in which Dickens largely worked; and no such procession of low life has marched through the pages of a well-ordered book since Dickens's pen became silent.

To the gift of vivid description the East End curate adds that of a humor which he does not hesitate to use against himself. He seizes every funny opportunity, even though it make himself ridiculous. He utilizes his own early inexperience, his own tendency to sanctimonious speech-making, his own lack of tact in dealing with the quick-witted scamps whom it was his duty to solicit with religion. By his own showing, he was sadly inept at moralizing. Could anything be more professional than his rejoinder to Perkins, the bookseller, who declares that he hates history, and exclaims, "What do I care about what people did ever so long ago? None of them ever left me any money!" The curate picks up a copy of the New Testament, and replies, "You will find that you have had a legacy left you if you will but read His will." The raillery of the irreverent bookseller, in answer, is recorded without extenuation. In fact, our author seems to enjoy recalling the various "set-downs" which he has received at the hands of the reprobate. A Mr. Jones, an ungodly seller of birds, thus waives the discussion of religion with the curate: "We won't get into a argeyment, if you please. . . . I know all you've got to say, and that you must say it because you are a parson, just as you'd have to cry, 'Dust hoy!' if you were a dustman. . . . No, sir, as I said afore, we'll have no argeyment." Were it not for the evident power of the writing in this book, we should almost consider its author as a self-convicted prig—so frequently is he worsted in his "argeyment" with the denizens of his hunger-pinched parish.

The reader who may be unfamiliar with the conditions of the struggle for life among the lower and the lower middle-classes of the London population, can hardly realize the severity of that struggle. In no other city, probably, are those conditions so hard, the competition so merciless, the failures so frequent and fatal. A slackness of trade, a complication in politics, a passing cloud in business prosperity, cuts down human life not less surely, with hardly less speed and ravage, than a sudden frost destroys the insects in a meadow. From the situation of the dock-laborer to that of the salaried clerk in a mercantile house, there is hardly one over which the signal "Danger!" might not be hung out; hardly a dependent who is quite secure, in case of losing his work, of ever finding it again. Life itself is at stake in the case of thousands of struggling denizens of that city. A large population lives as if near the edge of a precipice, toward which a constant force is pushing them; and when from any cause the individual's power of resistance is impaired, he is forced with fatal sureness toward the brink. Sometimes he beats his way backward from the edge; frequently he is forced over it. Industry, sobriety, and capacity do not here form, as they form in less crowded communities, an assurance to the unskilled workman against starvation. There are many pitiable cases in which the starvation of entire families is accomplished by protracted stages, which include many years. At each season of destitution one, two, or three of the children succumb. The intervening periods are times of temporary relief and of fallacious hope on the part of the survivors; but finally the last survivor of the hopeless struggle is crowded into the gulf of starvation.

* "Episodes in an Obscure Life." New York: George Routledge & Sons.
"A Hand-book to the Charities of London. Revised to August, 1870. By Sampson Low, Jr." London: Sampson Low, Son & Marston.

Similar to this is the case described in the chapter entitled "Crowded Out"—to our thinking, the strongest part of the volume. The pathos and significance of Phillips's case is not diminished by the fact that the last scene in this sturdy, steady young man's struggle for life in London takes place upon the deck of an emigrant steamer, and not upon the straw pallet where his children, one after the other, starved to death. He was "crowded out," alive, to Canada. But thousands are yearly crowded out of life itself by the mere fact of their numbers—the fact that in these great centres life is in excess of the means of living, and the accumulation of life goes on with unchecked rapidity, nay, with a speed of which the rate increases constantly, like the multiplying horrors of a feverish dream—a geometrical progression of distress. The suffering defies all attempts at its alleviation. How extensive these efforts are may be known from the fact that "Low's Handbook to the Charities of London," for the year 1870, gives a description of the objects and character of more than nine hundred charitable institutions and funds. They represent a wide variety of purposes.

Besides a great number of colossal charities, there are not a few with eccentric names and objects. One society is called "London by Moonlight"; another, the "Metropolitan Free Drinking Fountain and Cattle-Trough Association." There is a "Dog's Temporary Home," and a "Guilt Gardens," besides a "Coral Missionary Fund." The very diversity of the philanthropies that are furthered by these nine hundred organizations indicates how large is the self-confessed necessity for amelioration in our modern life. But the necessity meets, as yet, with little satisfaction. The "Handbook" shows us the skeleton of the hunger of London. The "Episodes" clothe it with scanty flesh and tattered garments. No picture at once more interesting and more appalling can be placed before the student of sociology.

Why Did He Not Die? or, The Child from the Ebräergang. From the German of Ad. von Volckhausen. By Mrs. A. L. Wister, Translator of "The Old Mam'selle's Secret," "Only a Girl," etc. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1871.)—It is almost superfluous to speak at this late day of Mrs. Wister's merits as a translator, or to congratulate her on her uniform success in her selections of readable novels for translation. There is a peculiarity about her selections, however, which seems worth noticing, not so much because it is of any special importance, as because it appears to indicate that in her case translating is not the half-mechanical routine work which it often is, but that she finds in it a tolerably free expression for her own mind. There is as strong a family likeness between the five or six novels which she has put into English from the German of almost as many authors as if they had all been the work of one person. They resemble each other not only in the nature of their plots, and in the general style of their characters, but even more in the way in which their authors look at life, and the special views they hold on religious and social questions. By the time one has followed the four or five little Germans in whom Mrs. Wister has interested herself through their childhood of repression and outrage into their youth of noble aspirations after all sorts of freedom, and their very innocent and pretty love-making, and has seen how uniformly hypocritical and cruel are the religious people with whom they come in contact, and how necessary it seems to the peace of mind of their creators that the disgraceful mysteries which usually hang around their birth should be carefully cleared away, so that notwithstanding all the suspicious eloquence about the natural equality of all men, they should be in reality as well placed in all respects as their neighbors, it is impossible not to feel as if one had got almost as near to the sentiments of Mrs. Wister as to those of Miss Marlitt, or Miss Von Hillern, or Ad. von Volckhausen. She has almost as certainly identified herself with a particular kind of thought and literature as if she had been producing original works. As to the present story, it has the same virtues and the same defects as its predecessors. It is sprightly and entertaining, full of all sorts of generous sentiments, and pervaded as usual by that gentle, half-timid radicalism, which contents itself with aiming innocuous blows at safe objects; at German Protestant orthodoxy; at the hypocrisy of the "rigidly righteous"; at the excesses of the agitators of the Woman Question; and at the arrogance of an aristocracy which yet must not resign too many of its pretensions if it would please its fair opponents. We recommend the book to everybody in search of amusing summer reading.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books on the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Almost Faultless: a Tale, swd.	(D. Appleton & Co.) $0 60
Atlas accompanying Vol. III. on Mining Industry, U. S. Geol. Explor. 40th Par.,	(Washington)
Bastian (A.) and Hartmann (R.), Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, Vol. II., Nos. 4. 5, 6....	(L. W. Schmidt)
Benoni Blake, M.D.: a Tale.	(Geo. Routledge & Sons) 1 75
David Lloyd's Last Will: a Tale, swd.	(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.) 75
Dodd & Mead's Sunday-School Annual, for 1871, swd.	(Dodd & Mead)
Dumas (A.), The Iron Mask, swd.	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 00
Egli (J. J.), Nomina Geographica, Part 2, swd.	(B. Westermann & Co.)
Everything Serene: Verses, swd.	(American News Co.) 25
Greeley (H. G.). Letters from Texas, swd.	(New York)
Gillet (R. H.), The Federal Government; its Officers and their Duties.	(Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co.)
Huntington (W. S.) Roadmaster's Assistant.	(A. N. Kellogg)
Journal of a Young Lady of Virginia, 1782.	(John Murphy & Co.)
Mansel (Prof. H. L.), Metaphysics.	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Mount Washington in Winter.	(Chick & Andrews) 1 50
Packard (Dr. A. S., jr.), Record of American Entomology, for 1870, swd.	(Salem)
Professors Roscoe, Alcock, Jevons, Morgan, Science Lectures for the people.	(D. Van Nostrand)
Randolph (Sarah N.), The Domestic Life of Thomas Jefferson.	(Harper & Bros.)
Reade (C.), A Terrible Temptation, Part I., swd.	" " 25
Rogers (W. H.), Cat and Mouse, swd.	(Sampson, Low, Son & Marston)
Sugar Bread	" " " "
The Naughty Boys of Corcutt,	" " " "
Ice Peter.	" " " "
Ruskin (J.), Fors Clavigera	(John Wiley & Son) 1 00
Sand (Mme. G.), The Last Aldini, swd.	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 50
Stiebeling (Dr. G. T.), Naturwissenschaftegegen Philosophie, swd.	(L. W. Schmidt)
The Curate and the Rector: a Tale.	(Geo. Routledge & Sons) 1 75
The Island Neighbors: a Novel of American Life, swd.	(Harper & Bros.) 75
Tourist's Guide. Around San Francisco Bay, North.	(A. L. Bancroft & Co.)
Tourist's Guide. Around San Francisco Bay, South	" "
Tyndall (Prof. J.), Hours of Exercise in the Alps.	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Waddell (Prof. W. H.), Latin Grammar for Beginners.	(Harper & Bros.)
Wright (H. B.), A Practical Treatise on Labor.	(G. W. Carleton & Co.)
Zell's Descriptive Hand-Atlas of the World, Parts 1-5, swd.	(T. Ellwood Zell) 50

AGENTS WANTED TO SELL

EVERY HORSE-OWNER'S CYCLOPÆDIA.

This is the most complete work on the Horse ever published. It is by the best English and American authority, and illustrated with nearly 100 fine engravings representing every disease the horse is subject to, and portraits of the most celebrated horses.

Agents are meeting with unprecedented success, selling from five to ten copies a day. We allow Agents liberal discounts. Any good man can make $30 a week without trouble.

SOLD ONLY BY SUBSCRIPTION.

Send for Circular of Terms, etc., to

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,

PHILADELPHIA.

YALE AND HARVARD USE

WHITNEY'S GERMAN COURSE,

OTTO'S FRENCH COURSE.

HOLT & WILLIAMS,

PUBLISHERS,

No. 25 Bond Street, New York.

The Publishers issue a very large assortment of works in the same department.

☞ A descriptive catalogue will be sent gratis to any one referring to this advertisement.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE PUPIL OF THE LEGION OF HONOR.

BY LOUIS ENAULT.

Translated from the French by Mrs. CHAS. P. TUFT.

8vo, paper, $1; cloth, $1 50.

A most delightful story; pure in tone, elevated in sentiment, and of the greatest interest, it will undoubtedly prove one of the literary successes of the season.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

POTT & AMERY'S

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE INCARNATION AND PRINCIPLES of Evidence: A Theological Essay. By Richard Holt Hulton, M.A. With an introduction by

SAMUEL OSGOOD, D.D.

18mo, cloth.

FACSIMILE OF THE BLACKLETTER Prayer-Book. Containing Manuscript Alterations and Additions made in the year 1661, "out of which was fairly written" the Book of Common Prayer, subscribed December 20, A.D. 1661. Photozincographed at the Ordnance Survey Office, and published for the Royal Commission on Ritual.

Folio, cloth, price $20.

MUSINGS OVER THE CHRISTIAN YEAR AND LYRA INNOCENTIUM. By Charlotte Mary Yonge. Together with a few Gleanings of Recollections of the Rev. John Keble.

12mo, cloth extra, $2 50.

A CONCORDANCE TO THE CHRISTIAN YEAR. Uniform with the "Musings."

12mo, cloth extra, $2 50.

POTT & AMERY,

COOPER UNION, FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK.

GAZZAM'S TREATISE ON THE BANKRUPT LAW.

SECOND EDITION JUST OUT.

For sale at all Law-Book Stores.

SLAVE SONGS OF THE UNITED STATES.

A Unique Collection of Original Melodies—words and music—obtained among the negroes of the South; preceded by an account of these Songs, and an Essay on the Negro Dialect, as observed at Port Royal, by Prof. W. F. Allen, of the University of Wisconsin. Cloth, 8vo, price $1 50.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address

Publishers of "THE NATION,"

Box 6732, New York City.

THE NATION PRESS.

The Proprietors of THE NATION PRESS give notice that they have established a Book, Pamphlet, Job, and Newspaper Printing-Office in this City, and are prepared to execute at moderate prices, for cash, the best of work in any and all of these branches.

For BOOKS they will furnish Electrotype or Stereotype Plates, as desired, and will guaranty unusual accuracy in their preparation.

J. ROSS & CO., 27 Rose St., New York.

FINE BOOKS AT LOW PRICES.

SEND TO

J. SABIN & SONS,

BOOKSELLERS AND IMPORTERS,

84 Nassau Street, New York, and 22 Buckingham Street, Strand, London,

FOR CATALOGUES OF BOOKS.

They are in constant receipt of books from London, and, possessing unusual facilities for purchasing books at low prices, are enabled to offer them correspondingly cheap.

Selections from a stock of 40,000 volumes for sale by

J. SABIN & SONS.

Appleton's New American Cyclopædia. 16 vols., and 5 vols. of the Annuals—in all, 21 vols. half-russia. A fine set; good as new. $105.

British Poets. Little & Brown's Edition. 128 vols., half-calf, gilt. Nice set. $175.

Addison. Works. Including the whole contents of Bishop Hurd's edition, etc., and Notes, by G. W. Greene. New York, 1854. 6 vols. 12mo, half-calf, antique, $12.

Boccaccio. The Decameron; or, Ten Days' Entertainment. London, 1845. A nice 8vo edition, large clear type, half-morocco, gilt edges. $5 50.

De Foe. Novels and Miscellaneous Works. London, Bohn. 7 vols. 12mo, half-calf, gilt, $18.

Goldsmith. Miscellaneous Works. Including a variety of Pieces collected by James Prior. New York, 1854. 4 vols. 12mo, half-calf, $8.

Coryat's Crudities. Reprinted from the Edition of 1611; to which are now added his Letters from India, and Extracts relating to him, from various authors. 3 vols. 8vo, morocco extra, gilt edges. London, 1776. A very elegantly bound copy of this scarce book. $40.

Southey's Commonplace Book. Choice Passages, Collections for English Manners and Literature, Special Collections, Analytical Readings, Original Memoranda. Four series. Large 8vo, cloth uncut. London, 1850. $7 50.

The New London Jest Book. Edited by W. Carew Hazlitt. 12mo, cloth. London, 1871. Just published, $1 50.

Strickland, Agnes. Lives of the Seven Bishops of the Tower. 12mo, cloth. London. $1.

Adventures of Mr. and Mrs. Sandboys and Family, who came up to London to "enjoy themselves" and to see the Great Exhibition. By Henry Mayhew and Geo. Cruikshank. Fine large plates by the inimitable Master. Lond. 8vo, uncut, $3.

The Adventures of a Post-Captain. By a Naval Officer. With Characteristic Engravings (colored) by Mr. Williams. London, N. D. Large 8vo, uncut, fine copy, $6 50.

Ainsworth, W. H. Jack Sheppard: A Romance. Illustrated by G. Cruikshank. Lond., 1854. 8vo, uncut, $3 50.

Caulfield, James. Portraits, Memoirs, and Characters of Remarkable Persons, from the Revolution in 1688 to the end of the Reign of George II. Collected from the most authentic accounts extant. Lond., 1819. 4 vols. large 8vo, uncut. Fine copy. Several of the portraits are by Geo. Cruikshank. $24.

Colloquies of Edward Osborne, Citizen and Clothworker of London. By ye Author of "Mary Powell." Lond. Post 8vo, half-new, morocco extra, marbled, $2.

Dagley, R. Takings; or, The Life of a Collegian. A Poem, illustrated by twenty-six Etchings. Colored plates. Lond., 1821. 8vo, half-red morocco, neat, sprinkled edges, scarce, $3 25.

Falstaff. The Life of Sir John Falstaff. Illustrated by Geo. Cruikshank. With a Biography from authentic sources, by Robt. B. Brough. Lond., 1850. Royal 8vo, uncut, $10.

The illustrations to this book are some of the finest specimens of Cruikshank's masterpieces. Shakespeare's Jack Falstaff is inimitably rendered.

FOR SUMMER READING.

A MEMOIR OF CHARLES MAYNE YOUNG, Tragedian. With Extracts from his Son's Journal. By Julian Charles Young, M.A. With Portraits and Sketches. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2 25.

"Mr. Young is one of those pleasant diarists who, it is to be feared, are rapidly becoming as extinct as the delightful letter-writers of the past age. In this budget of anecdotes, fables, and gossip, old and new, relative to Scott, Moore, Chalmers, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Croker, Mathews, the Third and Fourth Georges, Bowles, Beckford, Lockhart, Wellington, Peel, Louis Napoleon, D'Orsay, Dickens, Thackeray, Louis Blanc, Gibson, Constable, and Stanfield (the list might be much extended), the reader must be hard indeed to please who cannot find entertainment."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"He has contrived to bring out a narrative often as detailed as Pepys, as versatile and lifelike as Boswell, and as full of recent personal interest as Crabb Robinson. It is not a barren record of facts, but a vivid and kindly chronicle of life and manners, and men and minds, running over the last half-century."—Saturday Review.

"There is hardly a page of it which was not worth printing. There is hardly a line which has not some interest attaching to it. When we mention that the extracts from Mr. Young's own journal abound in choice anecdotes of Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Scott, and many other of the great men of the last generation with whom he was brought into personal contact, we have said enough to prove the interest of the work, even if it had less of the grace and vivacity which characterize it from beginning to end. We lay down the volume with regret, and shall return to it in many a leisure hour."—Guardian.

"We have found Mr. Young a very agreeable companion, old-fashioned, with old stories to tell, some of them not very good, with more of the kindness of old age than its severity, with a not portentously wise head, and with a good heart, and we are glad to recommend his journal to our readers."—The Nation.

MACMILLAN & CO.,

38 BLEECKER STREET, NEW YORK.

RIVERVIEW MILITARY ACADEMY,

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.

Location healthy; Scenery unequalled; Building convenient; Teachers highly educated, earnest, working men; System of Order unsurpassed. A wide-awake, thoroughgoing School for Boys wishing to be trained for Business, for College, or for West Point, or the Naval Academy. Address OTIS BISBEE, A.M., Principal and Proprietor.

FITTED AND FURNISHED mean a great deal, but most travellers in this country are ready to endorse the statement that the AMERICAN HOUSE, BOSTON, is fitted with all needed conveniences, and furnished in accordance with the demands of the most exacting.

BREAD-LOAF INN,

RIPTON, VERMONT.

A GOOD PLACE TO PASS THE SUMMER AT.

CATSKILL MOUNTAIN HOUSE.

This favorite summer resort, commanding a view of the valley of the Hudson, unsurpassed by any in the world, and so justly celebrated for its delightful temperature, will be open from June 10th to October 1st.

Stages connect at Catskill with the trains of the H. R Railroad and the day boats from Albany and New York; also, with the steamboats, Thomas Powell and Sunnyside, leaving Pier 43, foot of Canal Street, New York, for Catskill, daily at 5 P.M.; Saturday at 2 P.M. CHAS. L. BEACH, Proprietor.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL. Those who regard the safety of their families use only Pratt's Astral Oil, the safest and best oil ever made. The daily accidents arising from burning impure oils should warn consumers to use the best only.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, AUGUST 3, 1871.

The Week.

MAYOR HALL has made a third defence of himself against the charge of being privy and consenting to the thefts from the City Treasury; but it is like his two previous defences—corroborates the charge and deceives no one. For a sample of it this will serve: He says that the Times makes a great parade of disclosing secret accounts, whereas in point of fact the very accounts which are now brought forward in that paper were long ago freely and fearlessly printed and published in the Reports of the Board of Supervisors. So they were, after a fashion; but when the taxpayer reads the words, "May 31, 1869, A. J. Garvey, Repairs, etc., $36,762," or, "July 5, 1869, G. S. Miller, $49,763 80," it conveys much less information to him than when he reads in the Times—as he would be able to read also in Comptroller Connolly's quarterly exhibits, if that official had not for two years declined to make any—that Mr. Garvey, in 1869 and 1870, for plastering and painting county buildings, got $2,870,464 06 of the public money; that J. H. Ingersoll & Co., during the same time, got for furniture and "repairs," $5,663,646 83; and that, in brief, the repairing, furnishing, plumbing, etc., of the County Court-house—as yet unfinished, and, according to Mr. Nordhoff, shabbily furnished—cost us, for the one building, all but seven millions of dollars—$6,997,893 24. The printed accounts, huddled into thick volumes, of which perhaps half-a-dozen are in existence, and which are in no sense accessible to the public, are not calculated or intended to convey any information whatever to anybody, and do not. It is the intention of the law that the Comptroller's exhibits shall do that; and, naturally enough, it is the intention of the Comptroller—whose books are of course kept with a technical accuracy equalling that of any set of books anywhere—to pursue the tenor of his peculiar way as noiselessly as possible, and not every three months attract attention to himself and his accounts. The Mayor, then, makes no defence at all, but gets into the box as witness against himself. More than that, he is defiant. Being interviewed, he took the line that "even if there was anything in it, it would blow over before the next election." "We have got the State," he says, "and we mean to keep it."

Perhaps he is right, and it may be that out of these disclosures no harm will come to himself, or Connolly, or any other of the set, unless, indeed, the exposure should interfere with the success of the Viaduct Railway. We do not observe that crowds are flocking after the shares of that stock, though, with a moderately honest city government, the books would hardly have stood open three days. Considering the length of our unfinished Court-house, and that the Viaduct road, in its two branches, would include something like fifteen miles of brick and mortar work for Mr. Garvey and the other gentlemen to construct and equip, the proverbially timid capitalist may be held excused, under the circumstances, for hanging back a little at first. A public meeting is to be held, it is said; but there is no saying that anything practical will come of it. It may be doubted if there will be any of the talked-of combinations to resist taxes, or any impeachment of the Mayor, or any criminal prosecution of Tweed. People buy the Times, and read the figures, but each passes on to business, and declines to pull down on his head heavier assessments, or lose time and money attacking swindlers in courts which they own. But it is certain that the publication of the accounts, whether or not it shakes the Ring in this city, has made many Democrats angry with it, and it is not unreasonable to expect, Hall's impudence to the contrary notwithstanding, that we may have are forming legislature next year and a new charter; which it is not so certain, we trust, as the World thinks, that Governor Hoffman will veto. Yet, when we think of Mr. "Hank" Smith, and of Mr. Charles Spencer, with his large family Bible, and the very wicked but still not unique Mr. Winans, it is but a chastened hope we indulge after all that the legislature can help us. Still, that there are many thieves is small reason for not pushing to the wall when you can all you can catch. We suggest the work as a good one for the Bar Association of this city when it gets Mr. David Dudley Field's case finally disposed of.

Mr. Marshall O. Roberts, a prominent Republican, to whom we referred last week as a gentleman who had vouched for the correctness of Mr. Connolly's accounts, has published a card, in which he begs to call the attention of the public to the fact that he did not examine into the condition of all the departments of Mr. Connolly's office, and that the certificate which he and his committee gave Mr. Connolly "referred only to the securities comprising the Sinking Fund, and the manner in which the accounts relative thereto, and to the debts of the city and county, were kept." The fact is, that in the stress of an election, when the Comptroller was accused of withholding his accounts, and of withholding them because he did not dare to publish them, so full were they of evidences of his own and his friends' dishonesty, he invited Mr. Roberts, Mr. J. J. Astor, and four other gentlemen of weight in the community, large taxpayers, to come in and examine his books. They complied with the invitation, and everybody said that we should now know whether or not Connolly was slandered. "We certify," said this committee, "that we have made an examination of the affairs of the Finance Department and Sinking Fund of said city—"Finance Department of said city," not of "said office"—"that the entire office was thrown open to us"—the "entire office," not "a single department of said office"—and "all the account-books, securities, and records of the said Department and Sinking Fund were submitted to our inspection and examination." . . . . "And we further certify," they say, at the end of the report, "that the account-books of the Department are faithfully kept." This is language which Mr. Roberts and Mr. Astor must have suspected would, by most people, be taken—as, in fact, it was taken—to mean that "Connolly was all right," and that, from partisan feeling, the Republicans had been clamoring false charges against him. But, however that may be, Mr. Roberts could have had no doubt as to what would be the interpretation of the last sentence of his report: "We have come to the conclusion, and certify, that the financial affairs of the city under the charge of the Comptroller are administered in a correct and faithful manner." Now they came to this conclusion either with such an examination as alone could justify their putting their names to such an assertion concerning such a man, or else they came to it without such an examination; and, in either case, the public may rightly be curious as to what could have induced them to sign the report. Tammany does nothing for nothing; why should prominent Republicans have done anything for Tammany? Mr. Roberts's card is not quite an explanation of his course on the occasion in question.

It is understood that the sub-committee appointed by the Congressional committee which was ordered to investigate the affairs of the Ku-klux Klan in the South are going to report, and are going to report that there is such a thing as the Klan in existence; that it does attack people for their politics; is composed of "Conservatives," and contains no Republicans; has committed many most bloody and shameful outrages, and that the Ku-klux law was necessary and is beneficial. We ourselves have no doubt that the passage of the Ku-klux law was inexpedient and wrong; and we shall wait for some time before believing that the law has practically been of any benefit, all the time believing that any benefit it has brought us has been very dearly bought. As for the rest of the report as above summarized, we are ready to accept it as the truth, and nothing but the truth; but it is not at all the whole truth. Here are some figures from Louisiana which we consider strictly germane to the matter which the Committee has in hand, and which will, at any rate, get some of the country's attention: Between 1850 and 1860, the State tax in Louisiana ranged from twenty-one cents on a hundred dollars to twenty-nine cents. In 1865 and 1866, it was thirty-seven and a-half cents; in 1867 and 1868, it was fifty-two and a-half cents; in 1869, it was seventy-five; in 1870, it was $1 45; and for this year it will be considerably more than $2. Next, it is to be considered that while the taxes have been thus increasing, the State's expenditures have been constantly in excess of the receipts. Mr. James Graham, the State auditor, certifies that the excess in the fiscal year ending in 1871 is $8,778,618 15—making the total debt of the State nearly $49,000,000. At the breaking out of the war, Louisiana had a debt of $10,000,000; in 1868, this was $14,500,000; in 1869, $22,500,000; in 1870, $41,000,000; and, as we have said, in June, 1871, nearly $49,000,000. But formerly, before 1860, a sixty days' session of the legislature cost from $100,000 to $200,000; the regular session and extra session of 1870 cost more than $750,000; and the regular session of 1871 cost more than $9,000,000. The State Treasury supported at a cost, in 1870, of $432,000, and, in 1871, of nearly $400,000, about thirty sheets (newspapers in name), printed in the country districts, and, in great part, conducted by members of the legislature. The State is, in short, as North Carolina has been, as South Carolina also has been, and as nearly every Southern State has been, the prey, since 1865, of grossly and shamelessly corrupt governments, whose officers have made fortunes, and of rings of railroad and other speculators.

Surely it is not wonderful that the respectable portion of Southern society, seeing what rogues and thieves their rulers and lawmakers are, should not be very earnest in putting down the bands of lawless young men who, if they do disgrace themselves, their State, and often humanity itself, do also sometimes whip a greedy tax-collector, shoot a bribed law-maker, and compel a disreputable office-seeker or office-holder to run the country. It was only this last week that the leading Republican paper of Charleston, while supporting no less Radical a candidate than Mr. Gilbert Pillsbury, an old-time Abolitionist, who is now the mayor of the city, and is up for re-election, pronounced a good part of the rest of the ticket an insult to the honesty, intelligence, and decency of the party. It was of necessity that, in a country like the South, violence should be the response to the frauds and rascalities carried on by such peculiarly sneaking and base rogues as were too many of the Southern "carpet-baggers." In view of the cost of reconstruction in money, in the reputation of the North, in the embittering of the South, in the wrenching which such legislation as the Ku-klux law has given our system of government, it is far from clear that it would not have been cheaper if we had abandoned Mr. Lincoln's system of galvanized States, and garrisoned the Southern country for five years, keeping it in order with soldiers till the Southerners themselves were ready to behave sensibly. It would have cost us fully as little in money, Constitution, and credit as we have had to pay out on the other system; and we are not done yet. However that may be, Louisiana's case will bear thinking of when the Ku-klux Committee comes to report. And how anxious as national Republicans we ought to be that the Republican party of Louisiana should get Dunn for manager—or chief warden—instead of Warmouth, or Warmouth instead of Dunn!

The authorities of the American Labor Union have convinced themselves that neither of the two great parties can be depended on, and that there must be a new Workingman's Party, in which persuasion they have called for a political convention, which is to meet at Columbus, Ohio, in October next, and nominate a candidate for President and Vice-President. The more usual and natural way of launching such a party would seem to be to set it on foot in the legislative or, at the most, Congressional, districts first, and not begin in the national field. By so doing, the class of gentlemen who are apt at first to control the political springs of such organizations as Labor parties, Eight Hour parties, Prohibition parties, Woman Suffrage parties, and the like, can get themselves nominated and, for making the run and drawing away votes from the other side, can secure fair wages from one of the two great parties; or may even secure an election, in which case there are various things that may be done. Such bodies are usually too small for the Presidential field. But the Labor Union men have decided otherwise, and have already made a sort of a platform for their candidates to stand upon, and are going to hold a non-political convention at St. Louis and discuss it. Some of their principles, as set forth in a printed "basis," may be thus stated: A man will work and earn money, and then, when a law is made so ordaining, he will lend it to B at a rate of interest that he does not like, although B, rather than not have it, will pay more interest than the law ordains; a man in Massachusetts will employ a million dollars a year in running a seven-hour factory at a loss, and will not transfer his money to ten-hour factories in New Hampshire or Rhode Island; the price of a miner's labor for a day may be fixed by statute at a sum three times as large as at the passage of the statute, and he will thenceforth be able to save much more money than before, because no other prices in the community will advance in the least; an irredeemable paper currency is the best currency for the poor man, and "a gold basis is a fallacy." There is not the least exaggeration in these paraphrases of the statement made by the "basis," as the discussions at St. Louis next week, to which we invite the attention of our readers, will make manifest. They are "advanced" ideas certainly. The leaders use our old method—but timorously. The legal mind infects them. As their platform shows, they recognize the omnipotence of the statute, but our simple, earnest, radical measure of moving the previous question, and their passing a bill ordering the Government presses to print for each citizen such quantity of greenbacks as will make him wealthy, they are not yet "educated up to."

The shocking accident, on Sunday, at the Staten Island Ferry had some peculiarly pathetic features. Many of the killed and wounded were women and children; they were poor hard-working people who were about to make a cheap holiday by taking a twenty-cent sail, away from the stifling air of the city into the coolness of the bay; of those who were not killed instantly by crushing or more slowly by drowning, many were agonizingly scalded. It is a long time since a more miserable accident has occurred. How it happened will only be known after the investigation, and may likely enough never be known, it not having been the way of such investigations to be very strict or very satisfactory. But who was the immediate cause of the accident, and what shall be done with him, are not questions that it is very profitable to consider on such occasions. As to punishment, juries will never do anything in such cases, because the intention to kill and maim is always utterly wanting; and even when there has been an error of judgment, or a neglectfulness, or even a carelessness, that we are almost justified in calling criminal, still the juries are apt to think, or, indeed, to see, that the offender's sense of guilt and remorse, and the usual loss of his place, and injury to his prospects, is punishment sufficient for his offence. The profitable thing to do in presence of such a calamity as this ghastly destroying of more than seventy men, women, and children, and the wounding and disfigurement of some hundred-and-odd more, is to consider whether or not some new safeguard, applicable generally, cannot be thrown round all our steamboat travel. To this end the knowledge and the usual methods of this particular inspector should be most rigidly examined in the light of testimony from experts, and as heavily visited as possible, if he has been inspecting with insufficient knowledge or insufficient care, and taking fees for sending people to their death. And the general subject of the management of our ferries—a very profitable franchise—may properly be examined thoroughly. On one or two of the lines of travel between the city and suburbs, the treatment of passengers—shut into a floating sty with cattle, and abused by ruffianly deck-hands; kept waiting hours in the ice because the employment of ice-boats costs money; made to wait sometimes a whole night away from home because a boat is taken off without warning—has been a disgrace to the city. Of some of the companies no harm is to be spoken; of others, nothing else; and the general reputation of this Staten Island Company is not in all respects enviable.

The great export staples of the country—cotton, breadstuffs, meats, and petroleum—continue to decline slowly and steadily. Neither the ease in money (so-called) nor the general belief in the prosperity of the country can rouse the spirit of speculation; and, in the absence of speculation, large stocks of merchandise are gradually producing the inevitable result—a decline in price. The prospects of the growing cotton crop are improving; and although the unquestionable reduction in the area planted will probably diminish the crop to some extent, even with the most favorable weather, yet the sensational statements of a month or six weeks ago no longer find belief even among the credulous. Breadstuffs have fallen but slightly, owing to continued uncertainty about the condition of the European crops. But in meats and hog products the decline has been sharp, the market for these having been upheld for months past by a bold and tenacious speculative combination which must have resulted, or will yet result, in severe losses. In fact, scarcely any business is at this moment carried on with great profit; and it is no wonder that the hotels at the seaside and watering-places complain of the limited number of their guests, and still more of their limited expenditure. The coal producers continue their insane course, sending to the market at the rate of twenty-six millions of tons per annum, although the largest consumption never yet exceeded seventeen millions. The iron men are faithfully keeping them company. Real estate is dull, as usual at this season, except in the case of "Ring" operations in Westchester County and elsewhere, supposed to be based upon the probable effects of the Viaduct Railway.

Wall Street is sighing for movement of some kind to relieve the dreary dulness. Just as in the merchandise markets, everything is on the decline except Government bonds and the stocks of half-a-dozen great roads, which are forcibly upheld by the great manipulating cliques, aided by some over-confident bank-managers. The latter, misled by the overabundance of money, as it is called in Wall Street (but which in reality is nothing more than an overabundance of bank credit, arising from the simple fact that nobody wants it), are furnishing the means by which these clique combinations are carried on, and are thereby simply still further deferring the day when these gigantic rings will be obliged to follow the example of the pork and grain merchants—and sell. This policy of the banks—an unwise policy, on which we have commented for a year past—is attracting attention in commercial circles, whose interests have during the last few years been systematically subordinated to those of Wall Street cliques, whose operations are invariably injurious to the whole community. Foreign exchange has declined, chiefly in consequence of some of the bank operations just referred to. The export of specie has correspondingly fallen off, and gold is barely steady. While "bank credits" are obtainable at two or three per cent. per annum, "choice" first mortgage railroad bonds are obtainable at prices that net nine and ten per cent. per annum, and nearly the same interest can be obtained on mortgages on city real estate. Yet the talk of the City is the cheapness and abundance of money!

Mr. Gladstone has found in the House of Lords all the support he needs, if not all that he could desire, for his method of checkmating that body in regard to the purchase of commissions. On Monday a vote of censure was moved by the Tory leader, and sustained by the ablest of his party, as well as by Earls Derby and Russell, but was opposed by Lord Penzance, among others, who maintained the constitutionality of the measure resorted to by the Premier. It was defeated by a majority of 80, making Mr. Gladstone's triumph complete. An attempt to couple with this censure a rebuke for the ratification of the Treaty of Washington without consulting Parliament, shared the fate of the motion. The English Commissioner under the Treaty has just been appointed, in the person of the Hon. Russell Gurney, M.P., Recorder of London. He was one of the commissioners sent to Jamaica to take testimony concerning the rule of Governor Eyre.

In the recent news from abroad, nothing is more striking than the reappearance of Gambetta as one of the rulers of France—a virtual member of the Thiers government, a sort of minister without a portfolio. With General Faidherbe he seems to have formed an alliance for political purposes, and a scheme which they have devised for reorganizing the army and the civil service is said to have been approved by Thiers and MacMahon. For the present, undoubtedly, he can better accomplish his ends indirectly than as a Cabinet officer. The elections have shown him to be a favorite with the army, and he has sufficient popularity, both in and out of Paris, to retain his seat in the Assembly. It would be easy to predict for him a steadily broadening and even brilliant career if only his ability were in question; but the lack of honesty and of wisdom which characterized the dictator will, in our opinion, prove fatal to his pretensions to statesmanship. We have the less hesitation in thus prejudging him because he has been revealing his plans to the radical delegates at Bordeaux, and has gone back to '89 for a working model, and has the same extravagant belief in the virtue of the name Republic that he showed during the war—a faith just as respectable as that in the name Commune—and looks to the recovery of Alsace and Lorraine in ten or, at the most, in twenty years. The one thing he seems to have learned is, that the peasants must be educated, and military service made compulsory on every citizen.

It is only fair to set against the picture of Alsace which we drew last week some of the later representations of the German press, which if they do not disprove the general correctness of the statements on which we relied, at least do something to lighten up the prospect. The first explanation of the prevailing discontent is, that everything is in a transition state, that the débris of the war is not yet cleared away, and consequently that material interests absorb for the present the chief attention of the government. The courts not being yet fully organized, it is difficult for creditors to enforce their claims, and business is further deranged by the mixed currency, by the blocking of the railroads (busied in transporting prisoners of war), by the higher fares and charges, by the alterations in the tariff, and by many other attempts at and results of adjustment and reconstruction. The war indemnity has been delayed, as if, apparently, the money must first be drawn from France, and reports of differences between the civil and military authorities add to the general distrust and dissatisfaction. On the other hand, in spite of numerous invitations to emigrate to Algeria and elsewhere, the Alsatians show no disposition to budge, and the number of inhabitants who are wholly German in blood and speech is so great that it seems impossible that they should not eventually be won over. When the war-damages have all been settled, the courts opened, and the schools established (not, doubtless, without considerable opposition), and the normal condition of the territory has been reached, it will be time to take a fresh survey, and then judge if the people are irreconcilable. Of the elections which have just taken place, we have, by Cable, contradictory reports from Paris and Berlin. The war, however, has made us accustomed to these.

The radical reforms in the public instruction of Russia which we lately gave some account of, have received the sanction of the Emperor, and are now being carried into effect by the joint efforts of the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Public Instruction. The Emperor was called upon to decide a difference of opinion in his Council in regard to the admission of scholars from the Realschulen to the universities. In these schools Latin and Greek are not taught, but the majority, nevertheless, favored admission, while the minority on this ground opposed it. The Emperor took the side of the classics and refused admission, and, probably, acted wisely. His reign has now witnessed two of the greatest political and social changes which could be effected in the polity of any people, the last being the proper complement of emancipation, and only second to it in importance. The popular reception of the new scheme is very gratifying, and St. Petersburg has led off by devoting an annual sum of $60,000 to establish and maintain twenty primary schools. Nor is the educational movement confined to one sex. Permission has, after some shyness on the part of the Government, been given to found a sort of high-school for women in Moscow, the chief promoter of this enterprise being the rector of the university. It is designed for all women, whether married or single, who choose to attend the lectures, and who have passed the necessary examinations.

IS CIVIL SERVICE REFORM CONSTITUTIONAL?

THE Washington correspondents of the newspapers informed us that the Civil Service Commission had met with a serious difficulty in their consultations, which threatened to defeat the whole project of reform; and, seeming to catch the prevailing official tone, they did not disguise their gratification at this desired result. In a recent number of Harper's Weekly, the accomplished chairman of the Commission has published a statement which explains the exact nature and extent of the difficulty. It seems to have been conceded that there could be no reform, at least in respect to the vast mass of administrative offices which may be called inferior, unless admissions to these offices "should be determined by competitive examinations open to all applicants who should have satisfied certain preliminary enquiries in regard to age, health, character, etc., but excluding political or religious opinion." While this matter was under discussion, it was suggested that the proposed plan would be unconstitutional. The question thus raised necessarily separated itself into two branches:

First. If a statute should require that every vacancy, as it occurs, shall be filled by the single person who, from among all the applicants, shall successfully pass the examination, would this statute be valid, or would it not rather have the effect to take away the appointing power entirely from the hands in which the Constitution has deposited it?

Or, second. If a statute should require that a class of persons fit for a given office, or for a given grade of offices, shall be determined by competitive examination, having the President or the heads of departments to fill the vacancies, as they occur, from this class of successful competitors, would this statute be valid? The Commissioners, not wishing to construct and recommend a system which might turn out to be illegal, requested the President to obtain the official opinion of the Attorney-General upon these points, and adjourned until October.

The objection which has occurred to members of the Commission had not been discussed with any fulness in Congress. On one occasion, in answer to a doubt expressed by Mr. Cox, Mr. Jenckes compared his measure with the system which has, for a long time, and without objection, been established in reference to the appointment of officers in the army and navy, declaring that the principle and methods of his bill were identical with those prevailing in the military service, and arguing that if the latter were constitutional, the former also must be. The analogy, however, between the military and the civil services is not complete upon a mere superficial view, because the Constitution, in express terms, empowers Congress "to raise armies," "to provide and maintain a navy," and "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." These clauses confer an ample authority upon Congress to provide for the appointment of officers in the army and navy in any manner which it deems best; but, unless it has, from the necessities of the case, the same implied power over the administration of the civil service that is given to it, in express terms, over the military, we cannot argue from the one to the other. If, however, this necessary implied power exists, then the analogy is complete and the argument is perfect, so far as the acts of the legislature can establish a precedent.

The first branch of the question raised by the Commission we shall not discuss, because it has no practical value. A system which should require a separate examination of all the applicants for each particular office, and the appointment to that office of the single successful competitor, would be utterly impracticable; it would break down from its own unwieldy weight. This is not the method which prevails in England, nor has it, so far as we know, been suggested in the United States. We shall assume, then, that all the inferior offices, at least, are to be divided into a number of groups, according to the nature of the official acts and duties, and that these are to be again separated into grades; that a standard of qualification is to be established for admission into each grade of the various groups; that all applicants for a place in any grade are to pass a competitive examination, to the end that their qualifications may be ascertained; that those who are successful will not become ipso facto officers, but that they, in the aggregate, will form a class of persons from which the President or head of department must select in filling any vacancy in the particular grade. This, omitting all matters of mere detail, is substantially the system which prevails in Great Britain, and which was proposed by Mr. Jenckes.

> "The President shall nominate and, by and with the advice of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

Neither the President alone, nor the heads of departments, nor the courts, draw any absolute power of appointment from this provision. Authority issuing from the organic law itself is only given to the President and Senate in conjunction, and if the Congress should fail to pass any statute upon the subject, all offices, with a few designated exceptions, must be filled by their joint action. But the Constitution creates the possibility of another method. It permits the Congress to legislate, and to withdraw a certain class of offices from the President and Senate, and to entrust them to the President alone, or to the heads of departments, or to the courts. Congress is not compelled to adopt this method, nor is it limited to any class or species of offices, provided they are inferior; the whole subject is left to its discretion. When, therefore, the legislature has acted in this manner, and has passed a statute conferring powers of appointment upon the heads of departments, they derive their authority wholly from this law, and not from any affirmative grant of the Constitution. This proposition is fundamental, and governs the whole position. Congress, by virtue of a permissive clause in the organic law, confers authority upon the heads of departments to appoint persons to inferior offices. This is an ordinary act of legislation, and is to be controlled by all the considerations of expediency and propriety which apply to other measures of policy. The power may be granted or withheld, exercised fully or in part, given without limit or placed under restrictions, left entirely free or hampered with any conditions, according to the judgment of the legislators themselves. As the heads of departments draw their authority from a law of Congress alone—which law that body may pass or not, as it pleases—they must be bound by its terms, and cannot complain if the power conferred is a narrow one, and is hedged about with many safeguards, because, without the law itself, they would have had no power at all. This point being established, the conclusion is plain that, in conferring authority to appoint to office upon heads of departments, Congress may adopt any means and measures which its judgment suggests to prevent the authority from being abused, and to secure by its use the efficient and faithful discharge of official duties. The whole subject belongs to the legislature; it may give much or little, and may accompany the gift by conditions which restrain and control its exercise. The plainest, simplest, and most necessary of these conditions are those suggested by the Commission, which would apply directly to the qualifications of office-holders, and would tend to secure an honest and capable service.

The foregoing observations apply with special force to the inferior offices, which may, by the act and procurement of the legislature, be filled by the heads of departments. We now proceed to treat the question in a broader manner, and as involving the power of Congress over offices and officers generally. It should be carefully noticed at the outset that the Constitution itself creates but a very few offices. It declares that there shall be a President, Vice-President, and electors thereof, Senators and Representatives, and determines the manner of their choice. It also provides that each House shall have exclusive power to select its own officers. With these exceptions, the whole system of administration, whether military or civil, is in the hands of Congress. That body alone must create all offices other than the few just mentioned; must determine upon the necessity for their existence or their abolishment, and must fix their number, functions, duties, terms, and emoluments. In short, over the subject of creating and regulating the means of administering the laws, it has as complete control as over the subject of making the laws to be administered. The Constitution must, from the very necessities of the case, be so construed as to include and confer the power by implication. This principle has always been acted upon, and no one has ever doubted the propriety of such action. It can now be seen that the legislature possesses exactly the same control over the civil service as over the military service. The clause permitting it "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces" was not essential, because it was implied in the prior clause empowering it "to raise armies," and "to provide and maintain a navy," but was inserted simply out of an excess of caution, to restrain any possible usurpation by the President as Commander-in-Chief.

Holding the authority which we have thus designated in a plenary manner, Congress may determine the conditions under which the duties of a particular office shall be discharged, and may affix them to the office itself, even though these conditions may greatly limit the number of individuals from whom a choice can be made to perform these duties. This is plainly included within the general power to determine the duties themselves which are to be performed, and is, in fact, only another way of stating that power. In other words, Congress may prescribe the qualifications of office-holders, as prerequisites to their being entrusted with the functions of administration, and may thus create a class or classes of persons from which the President or heads of departments must make their selections. To say that Congress may not thus prescribe qualifications of some sort, is to say that the President and heads of departments are absolutely free from control, and cannot be confined even to citizens of the United States in making their appointments; to say that Congress may prescribe any qualification, is to admit that it may impose all which its judgment approves. If we examine the statutes creating offices, we shall find that the legislature has uniformly acted upon the assumption that it was authorized to impose conditions and qualifications. The principle has, therefore, been asserted through the whole course of our political history. Thus, a pecuniary qualification has always been demanded, in the shape of official bonds or securities, for the faithful discharge of public duties. The giving such a security is made a condition precedent of the performance of any functions. This is nothing but the demanding a pecuniary qualification, and it places a limit to the free action of the President, and restricts him to a class of persons from which to choose. Again, the qualification of loyalty has been required and enforced in a very strict manner by means of the test-oath. This also limits the power of the President, and restricts him to a class. It certainly does not lie in the mouth of a Republican administration or Congress to deny the validity of a statute creating this particular qualification and class. Would any one, for a moment, pretend that the legislature cannot in like manner, when creating an office, demand the qualification of citizenship, or of proper age, or of sex? The principle has been established by the unvarying and unquestioned practice of the Government. Civil-service reform only proposes to extend the principle in a different direction, and to apply it in other and equally important instances. If Congress may demand the prerequisites of pecuniary responsibility, loyalty, citizenship, age—or, in other words, may confine the President and heads of departments, in their appointments, to a class of persons possessing these qualifications—it may certainly demand the equally important prerequisites of knowledge, skill, special fitness, integrity, and, if so, may establish the means for ascertaining and certifying the existence of these facts. This is all that the civil-service reform seeks to accomplish, and to deny that it is possible to attain these ends in the manner suggested by the Commission, is to deny that Congress may demand loyalty and adopt suitable measures for ascertaining it, or require pecuniary responsibility and prescribe the official bonds by which it is secured. These conclusions are strengthened by a reference to another clause of the Constitution. Congress may "make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." The final object of the appointing power is certainly not the mere placing a person in office. Its proper execution implies that the individual shall be fit and capable, so that the public affairs may be correctly administered. Any laws which tend to accomplish this design are concerned with the carrying into execution of the power of appointment, and are eminently necessary and proper measures therefor.

We have thus demonstrated that there is no constitutional difficulty or obstacle in the way of the suggested reform in the civil service. Congress may certainly demand qualifications, and a competitive examination is the most sure and equitable method of ascertaining whether the applicant for office possesses these qualifications. Those who pass the ordeal are thereby certified as fulfilling the conditions imposed, and they form a class—which may be large or may be small, according to the number, character, and attainments of those who apply—from which the President or heads of departments may be required to make their selections.

MINORITY REPRESENTATION.

Mr. Edward Stanwood, writing in the current number of the North American Review on the subject of minority representation, alleges certain facts and arrives at certain conclusions as to which we find ourselves in disagreement with him. Mr. Stanwood admits the correctness of the principle of minority representation, but denies that the theory can be carried out in practice. The principle, indeed, when correctly stated, forces admission. That a representative body should represent all the citizens, and not a part; that the right to representation and the right of government are two distinct and separable things; and that, while representation appertains to each individual, the right to legislate appertains to a majority of the representatives—are truths which recent discussions have placed almost beyond the province of controversy. But, says Mr. Stanwood, the problem to be solved is not an easy one, because the reform to be adopted "should not be much less simple and easy of comprehension than that which it supplants."

> "It must abolish all district lines, or make the districts so large as to give a greatly increased range of selection. It must be flexible enough to adapt itself to large and small districts alike. Political managers must be deprived of power to defeat its purpose, as they have succeeded in doing with the district system. It must not, under the guise of minority representation, introduce minority government."

To all of this we answer that minority representation, to justify its application to practice, must be a reform of some of the existing political evils, and not bring in its train greater, nor as great, evils as it cures. Some critics have imagined that they have found a triumphant argument against the practical introduction of this reform when they have invalidated some one or more of the couleur-de-rose ideas of the reformers. But, suppose them to show that there is some little waste of votes even with minority representation, or that something less than a mathematical quota may secure a representative, or that political managers, who now absolutely ride us, may still hang on by the tail, does all this raise a shadow of a valid objection?

A friend of personal representation says: "I object to the present system because it wastes the votes of the community to the amount, in some constituencies, of a fraction within a half of all votes cast; and in others seldom less than one-third of the votes are wasted. I propose a reform which will cure this evil." Is he answered when the critic says that the plan he proposes "will not represent everybody"? It would seem that, to the extent that it will represent more persons than are now represented, it is a manifest good. The friend of personal representation says: "The existing district system places the few intelligent voters entirely at the mercy of the ignorant masses who compose the bulk of the parties, and the reform we contemplate will enable those few to combine with others and secure representation in proportion to their strength." Is he answered by the critic when told that, even if he secures representation, the majority will outvote him when his representative gets into the legislative body? It would seem that some representation is better than no influence, and to the extent that such better class of representatives can mould public opinion and legislation, the people are the gainers. The friend of personal representation says that the present system results in perpetual wire-pulling, cut-and-dried caucuses, and the domination of a very low class of politicians, and that the reform he has in view will emancipate men from the rule of such creatures. Is he answered by the statement that, if we follow his advice, the politician will devise some means of securing some part of his former government? A very great reform is achieved when we shall have put the political trickster to his wit's ends to devise some new machinery which will enable him to scramble on our backs again.

All that we have a right to demand of any reform is, that it shall ameliorate the existing condition of things, and it does not lie in the mouths of conservatives to say that the introduction of the reform has not produced all the good that was claimed for it, so long as it has produced enough to show that persistence in the given direction will yield many, perhaps all, the results claimed by the reformers; and we shall show that even in the very elections which form the subject of Mr. Stanwood's criticism, this is true of the principle of minority representation.

It will be remembered that in the English Reform Bill of 1867, a clause was introduced by virtue of which the three-cornered constituencies (i. e., the constituencies electing as a body three members of Parliament) were thereafter to elect three members of Parliament by the limited plan, each voter having but two votes, which he might combine or distribute as he pleased. A minority of one-third could therefore elect a representative where previously they were excluded from any representation. Now, any criticism upon this very crude and partial minority representation is valid coming from one who believes in representing quotas of less than one-third, but invalid as coming from a defender of the present system, as it is better than a system which excludes the one-third from all consideration. That by a skilful manipulation of votes by the minority and utter disorganization of the majority, the minority may actually return two out of the three members; or that by adroit management the majority may exclude the minority from its rightful representation, need give us but little concern, as the adroitness is likely to be evenly balanced. We have heard a great deal about the mischief of this clause in the Reform Bill; but the clamor all arises because the Liberal party lost one or two members by it; yet the same Liberal party refused last year, on motion of Mr. Hardcastle, who had the support of Mr. Gladstone, to abolish this clause.

The next step in England in favor of minority representation was in the organization of the School Boards. Here each voter had as many votes given him as there were members of the school board to be elected in his borough, and these votes he could concentrate on one candidate or distribute as he pleased. These elections were held within the year, and as it was the first application of the cumulative plan of minority representation, it awakened much attention. Mr. Stanwood takes the result in Marylebone, a borough of London, as the subject of his criticism. There were some thirty candidates, and of that number seven were elected; these seven being Miss Garrett, Professor Huxley, Rev. Mr. Thorold, Rev. Dr. Angus, Mr. Hutchins, Mr. Dixon, and Mr. Watson. The number of persons who voted was 23,619, who polled about 160,000 votes. Of that number, about 120,000 were counted for the seven successful candidates and elected them; the 40,000 remaining were lost by being distributed among unsuccessful candidates. These 40,000 votes represent 5,742 voters. This Mr. Stanwood adduces as evidence of the great wastefulness of votes. Now the point of comparison here for criticism should not be the best conceivable plan of personal representation; but what would have been the result in wastefulness of votes had the old majority plan been adhered to. The voters of Marylebone would have divided on their old party lines; the Liberals, having a small majority in the borough, would have elected the whole of the ticket of seven candidates by a majority, say of 1,000; and of the 23,619 voters, 10,809 who voted for unsuccessful candidates would have been unrepresented, as against 5,742 voters who were left out in the cold by the cumulative plan—a gain of at least 5,000 votes to the credit of the cumulative plan as against the majority plan. Then, again, look at the names of the two who head this list of members of the school board, and what chance would either Miss Garrett or Professor Huxley have had for a nomination at the hands of the regular parties? None. These school-board elections have proved beyond cavil that the minority plan brings into political life the very best members of the community, and on this branch of the subject Mr. Stanwood is silent; but with a naïveté indicating that he has not fully mastered the arguments in favor of the reforms he attacks, he says: "It is rather interesting than important that there was not in either of the London boroughs a candidate who received the votes of an absolute majority of the electors in the borough for which he stood." This, on the contrary, is not only important, but is conclusive proof how artificial are the majorities made up now by means of the incongruous elements of a powerful party, and how quickly the people avail themselves of independence of action when representation is possible without the aid of a majority.

Mr. Stanwood says that "in the Birmingham school-board election actual mischief was wrought. The Liberals, with about two-thirds of the voters, attempted to carry too many members, and actually came out of the contest with but two-fifths of the members." He does not give us the actual vote of Birmingham, but we can supply it from a very thorough paper on the working of the cumulative vote prepared last May by Mr. Thomas Hare, at the request of the English Foreign Office, in reply to an enquiry by the Belgian Minister at London on the cumulative vote. In Birmingham, the Liberals outnumber the Conservatives almost three to one. This is partly due to the personal popularity of Mr. Bright. Accustomed to rule, the Liberal party refused a compromise offered by the other side before the election, to give to the minority one-third of the fifteen school trustees, but entered the field, determined to carry them all, and had a ticket of fifteen names printed, for all of which their voters should vote. As but 14,000 of the 29,000 who voted polled the party ticket, the Liberals came out of the contest as badly beaten as they deserved to be. They intended, by management, to circumvent the plain intent of the law, as they had previously done in the case of the Limited Vote, and lost. Small minorities concentrated their votes and brought in their candidates—Canon O'Sullivan, being supported by 2,143 Catholics in a body, came in at the head of the polling-list. However unpleasant this may be to the Liberals of Birmingham, who, smarting under the lash, have written pamphlets against cumulative voting, we, at all events, fail to see the "actual mischief" this defeat of a political trick has wrought. On the other hand, however, it proves the correctness of the position of those who favor minority representation, that the system, when once fairly inaugurated, will act as a dissolvent of existing political parties, and make the voter independent of nominating conventions.

Mr. Stanwood seems to have a proper appreciation of the value of the Geneva plan of Free-Ticket voting, which answers the requirements of both justice and simplicity; but, says he, to give to each party the right to make a whole ticket, and then to take from each ticket a number of candidates into the representative body in strict proportion to the number of votes polled by each ticket, beginning with the head of the list of each, will fasten parties upon us as legal entities, and increase their power, and the "rings" would have their names at the head of the tickets, so as to be sure of an election—a curious objection to come from one who defends the present system. So long as parties are necessary, they would be the better for being amenable to public law. If there were a legal nomination for office as well as election, men would be protected in their attendance at primaries, and would not be deterred by the fear of having their heads broken by the hired bravoes of the parties. Bad and ignorant men would combine to seize power under any system, but they would not have the monopoly of it; and while no system can or should exclude them, the Geneva plan would prevent their names from appearing at the head of any voting paper except those they prepare.

Curiously enough, Mr. Stanwood misses his own moral completely when he objects to and rejects the Hare system as likely to become, in the hands of managers, only a sort of improved Free Ticket, and then rejects the Free Ticket for just the imperfections that the Hare scheme would supply. The true moral is, that in its practical working the Hare scheme would combine the advantages of both. Mr. Stanwood makes the oft-repeated charge of complexity to the Hare plan, and in illustration says: "One might fancy the blank amazement of a free citizen of New York City, fresh from the naturalization mill, and his perplexity on being told to fill out a ballot in accordance with his preference." Without dwelling upon the fact that our political sufferings at the hands of this newly-made citizen have been in this city, at least, so great that we can look with some philosophic calm upon a little perplexity on his part, we answer that Mr. Hare's voting-paper does not require a filling up with a list of preferences. It does give the voter an opportunity to do so. And just in proportion as men reason on political questions, they will avail themselves of that opportunity, and thus make themselves somewhat independent of the ticket which the newly-made citizen forces upon him.

Correspondence.

THE NORTH CAROLINA CONVENTION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The first question naturally presenting itself to a reader of your article on "North Carolina and a New Constitution," is, Who are the people, or where does sovereignty reside? I think the answer given by Jameson, in his work, "The Constitutional Convention" (p. 19), is correct: "Sovereignty resides in the society or body politic; in the corporate unit resulting from the organization of many into one, and not in the individuals constituting such unit, nor in any number of them as such, nor even in all of them, except as organized into a body politic and acting as such." From this it seems to follow that only in a political society with positive laws, the whole being rightfully bound by the action of a number less than the whole, "the number to which shall be accorded the power to act for the whole, and the conditions under which it may so act, are matters of positive regulation, in which alone they find their warrant. From this it is apparent that a mere majority in number of all the citizens of a State, or of the electors of a State, have no right whatever to act for the whole State, unless they can point to authority to that effect, express or implied, in the constitution of the State" (l. c., p. 525). This is incontrovertible, if your assertion, that "a constitution, being thus a creation and an instrument, cannot be above and superior to the creators who have given to it all its life and force," be a misconception, as I think it is. Though a constitution undoubtedly is a creation, yet the term is evidently liable to lead in this connection to utterly unwarrantable conclusions. A constitution is the fundamental law imposed upon a body politic by its own free will. Therefore it is not above and superior to its creators, although they are bound by it. It is true that "sovereingty cannot exist under any limitations," but it is only so far true as limitations by any outside power are thought of. If the idea of sovereignty should exclude all self-imposed restraints, a constitution would be nothing but an opinion, an advice, and not a law.

It is a curtailment of sovereignty to deny the people the right of binding themselves in this respect. Every constitution is the binding not only of those by whom the people want some of the powers of sovereignty to be exercised, but of the people themselves to certain rules of action. And one of the principal objects of this binding of the people themselves to certain rules of action is to guard the minority against rash and despotic actions of the majority. The logical consequence of your theory seems to be the utter abolishment of this guard, leaving to the minority nothing but the hope that a majority of the legislature will not coalesce with a majority of the people in subverting the law of the land, and in trampling the constitutional safeguards of the rights of the minority under foot. That the majority of the people, especially if they have the support of the majority of the legislature, have the power to do it, no one will deny; but they cannot do it rightfully and legally, although they have themselves enacted the law which renders their action illegal. They replace the law by arbitrariness, with nothing to justify them but the naked fact that they are the majority, i. e., they act in a revolutionary way. I am at a loss to understand how the fact that a majority of the legislature sanctions or even inaugurates this replacing of law by arbitrariness, of right by power, can in the least affect the question at issue. The legislature is called into existence by the action of the people, under the provisions of the constitution, and whatever it does in opposition to the provisions of the constitution is, in the eye of the law, eo ipso null and void. How, then, can an action of the legislature, which the law pronounces utterly null and void, legalize an action of the people which, according to your own opinion, attempted "outside the existing government, and unsupported by legislative sanction," would be "revolution," "although successful"?

Very respectfully yours, Dr. H. von Holst.

New York, July 22, 1871.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The question discussed in your issue of the 20th, under the heading "North Carolina and a New Constitution," is certainly a very grave one, involving all the difference between what has been called fundamental law and ordinary enactments. The conclusion at which you seem to arrive is, that the people of a State cannot limit themselves by any restrictions as to methods of proceeding in changing or making their constitution, or in assigning the majorities or pluralities required in the legislative body that assumes to originate, or in the people who ratify, such entire or partial change. Your argument seems based wholly on the idea of sovereignty as something inherent, although you distinguish satisfactorily between the modified sovereignty of a State and that of the nation. Now, it is just this thought of the national sovereignty (which you must admit to be at least as absolute and, therefore, as incapable of restriction as that of the State) which creates the difficulty I find in your reasoning. The position seems to be this: A sovereign people cannot restrict themselves as to time, mode, numbers, etc., in the initiation or ratification of any changes in their fundamental law. The makers or ratifiers of one constitution cannot dictate the method in which another shall be made, or even originated; and if they attempt to do so, those into whose hands the administration may have fallen have a right to ignore any such limitation, and proceed de novo, as though it never had existed. "Because," as you say, "constitutions are but the expressions of the people's will," and "the people have reserved to themselves the power of creating, by their own immediate act, the organic law of a State;" "a constitution," therefore, "being thus a creation and an instrument, cannot be above and superior to the creators who have given it all its life and force."

The conclusions drawn from this doctrine of immediate popular expression could be refuted, we think, by direct à priori reasoning, or by showing that it is at war with the very idea of a political "organic" body, having a real self-binding existence regarded as something distinct from the flowing masses that may at any one time constitute its numerical population. But waiving this, for the present, as involving too much of abstract discussion, the question may be fairly asked—and a very practical one it is—why would not your argument apply equally as well to a change, entire or partial, either by convention or by proposed Congressional amendments, in the national Constitution? The parallel between it and the constitution of North Carolina, in this respect, seems perfect. As in the one case, so in the other, the initial proceeding is to be by a two-thirds vote of the legislative body. After that, the higher and more absolute sovereignty of the greater people, and which would therefore seem, à fortiori, less capable of restriction, is blocked up from all change—that is, from "any expression of the popular will"—unless such amendments, so proposed by a two-thirds vote in Congress, are ratified by the still greater majority of three-fourths of the States. One-third of either House of Congress can prevent any step being taken towards amendment; one-fourth of the States can veto such proceeding after it has been initiated. When we consider that these may be the very smallest States, it could be mathematically shown that less than one-tenth of the population of the United States could prevent any change in our national Constitution, however necessary it might be deemed by the vast majority of the States and people.

The present action of the Democratic legislature of North Carolina you admit to be in defiance of the constitution of that State. But this body is only a "creation" of that constitution. How, then, can it rise above its source? To say nothing of their having sworn to obey it—a thing which seems of little consequence to the Southern mind—their only right to meddle with the constitution at all comes from this clause, and therefore they are bound to proceed according to its directions. Had nothing been said, such initiation would have belonged to the executive or to the judiciary, as much as to the men assembled at Raleigh, and who have no other power than what this constitution gives them, to be exercised as it prescribes. Or it "reverts" back to the people at large, as was claimed in the Rhode Island case, to be exercised in any way that may be thought most clearly to manifest this "immediate popular will." And then again, too, in respect to the right of majorities. We talk as though it were a natural right; but it would be very difficult to prove that by nature three men, on a given space, have a right to rule over two, or seven over five. If we will reason from supposed social compacts, the right of a majority, either of the legislature or of the people, can only be grounded on some supposed unanimous assent of the people as a whole, represented as such by a constitution which has become, de facto and de jure, the supreme law of the land and the fountain of all political rights. This whole, to which, from the necessary idea of government, all must be supposed to have conditionally assented, may determine whether the majority shall rule absolutely, or whether there shall be restrictions upon them, or what majorities they shall be, and how ascertained, or what rights and vetoes, if any, shall be given to minorities. The very idea of a constitution implies restriction of some kind upon "the immediate popular will," some direction to its action which is, more or less, a hindrance to its perfect freedom. Unless revolution is resorted to, it must obey these restrictions, or if it wishes to get rid of them, or make change more easy, even in doing this the previous directions must be followed, or all difference between fundamental and other law, between a true republican commonwealth, or politeia, and an utterly unrestricted democracy, is swept away.

To return to the plain analogy before presented. The statute passed by a bare majority of the North Carolina Legislature, in defiance of the present constitution, is only "tentative," it is said; and the convention which may assemble in consequence of it is only tentative likewise. So also is the constitution it may form. It is simply a proposal; and, if the people accept it, "then it becomes de jure and de facto the constitution of the State." It makes no difference whether the terms of the old constitution were complied with or not; you cannot restrict the people; the people cannot restrict themselves. Now, let us apply this to the nation—to the greater and more absolute people. A party in power, Republican or Democratic, wishes to amend the national Constitution in an easier and a shorter way than the one prescribed in that instrument. To this end, a bill proposing amendments is carried through Congress by a bare majority, the two-thirds vote not being attainable. This may do, seeing it is only tentative, and Congress has a right to try experiments. It may provide methods for taking the public sentiment on any question of importance, political or scientific. But now we come to the second act in the drama. The States proceed to consider the proposition; some, from their political preferences, others, because they fear lest eventually the success of their party views might be damaged by the omission. Thus it is satisfactorily ascertained that the proposed amendment has in its favor a clear majority both of the States and of the people; while it is equally clear that it has not a three-fourths majority of either. But "constitutions are only the expressions of the people's will." Such an expression has here been given. Has it become, therefore, de jure as well as de facto a part of the fundamental law? The case is a very supposable one. We wish to be enlightened as to the essential, and not merely accidental, differences of the two proceedings.

T. L.

[We have been obliged to abridge these communications, but the writers will, we trust, admit that we have omitted nothing essential to their arguments. The space at our command will only permit us to state the heads of an argument which would, we think, answer all the foregoing objections, and confirm the positions of the former article.

1. The objections made by Dr. von Holst reduce themselves to a single one, viz.: While the sovereign body cannot relinquish its sovereignty absolutely, it may restrict itself to particular modes of exercising this attribute. Every constitution is such a restriction, else it is not a law, but only an opinion or an advice. Therefore the restrictive clause of the North Carolina constitution is valid. The same position is maintained by "T. L." There is at the bottom of this a radical misconception of the nature and office of a constitution. We entirely agree with Dr. von Holst that sovereignty resides in the organic body politic, and not in any part nor even in the whole of the separate individuals who compose that body politic. A constitution is the expressed will, the creation of this body politic which possesses sovereignty, and is addressed to, lays its commands upon, and obliges each and all of the individuals who make up the political society. To them it is a law, and they, few or many, must obey; and the setting up of a new government by some or by all of them would be revolutionary. But the constitution is not addressed to, does not lay its commands upon, and cannot oblige the organic political society which created it. This political society, by virtue of its possession of sovereignty, cannot be subject to law, and is to be conceived of as an absolute despot. Whenever, therefore, this organic political society, as contradistinguished from some or all of the individuals which compose it, can act organically, it may act unrestrainedly and legally. How can it thus act? We answer, by its legislature taking the initiative, by a convention called by that legislature, and by the final votes of the electors to whom the power of voting has been given. Why a State legislature may legally take the initiative we shall show in the next paragraph.

2. The objection principally relied upon by "T. L." is certainly specious, but there is an answer to it which appears to us conclusive. The people of the United States possess absolute sovereignty. Sovereignty includes the power of legislating upon all subjects which can possibly fall within the domain of legislation. In our complicated scheme of government, certain important heads of legislative power are entrusted to Congress. The Constitution of the United States is a grant, and the only grant, of these powers. Whatever Congress can find authority for in this instrument, it may do; whatever it finds no authority for, it cannot do. All the residuum of legislative power is entrusted to the people of each State, to be ultimately exercised by its legislature. Whatever the State constitution does not forbid, the legislature may do; and, in general, whatever the State constitution does forbid, the legislature cannot do. In short, a State constitution is not a grant, but is rather a restriction. If a State constitution should simply create a legislature, and be silent in respect to its powers, such legislature could freely exercise all power not withheld by the national Constitution.

These principles are fundamental, and are admitted to be correct by all schools of constitutional construction. Their application is obvious. The national proceedings described by "T. L." would be revolutionary, because the initial step would have no element of legality. Congress cannot call a convention in the manner suggested by him, nor pass amendments by a bare majority, because the Constitution of the United States contains no grant of power, express or implied, authorizing such a proceeding. A State legislature, unless expressly restrained by the State constitution, certainly may call a convention for its own commonwealth, because it may confessedly legislate upon all subjects not directly withdrawn from it. Here we must remark that "T. L.'s" argument drives him to maintain the position that, unless expressly authorized, a State legislature cannot legally summon a convention—a position which is opposed to the theory of our government and to our political history. It must be conceded, then, that a State legislature, if not expressly forbidden, may take the initiative in the work of revision. We are now brought to the very case in hand. Although, in general, all restrictions upon legislative action contained in a State constitution must bind the legislature, yet, if any particular restriction is, from any reason, null and void, it cannot be operative, and the legislature is free. We maintain that the restriction contained in the North Carolina constitution is, from the very nature of sovereignty, null and void. This narrows the issue down to a single point—whether sovereignty can be self-limited, and in respect to this we cannot at present further pursue the discussion. We think it is plain, however, that the same principles do not apply to the national and to the State constitutions.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

Dr. S. W. Butler, Philadelphia, announces two medical works of general and permanent interest: "Cancer: Its Classification and Treatment," by J. W. Bright, M.D.; and "Consumption: Its Pathology and Treatment," by W. Minor Logan, M.D. Also, "The Physician's Annual for 1872."——"The Speeches of Hon. Geo. W. Julian," in one volume 8vo; and "A Tale of the Yo-Semite," by Mrs. Yelverton (from the author's manuscript), are among the announcements of Messrs. Hurd & Houghton. Col. J. F. Meline is to publish through this house his criticisms on Mr. Froude under the title, "Mary, Queen of Scots, and her latest English Historian."

—The meeting of the American Philological Association at New Haven last week was hardly to be called brilliant. About eighty-five members were present, some from remote parts of the country, but comparatively few good papers were read, and the discourses were rambling and not worthy of the pretensions of the Association. In all deliberative bodies, the men with the emptiest heads and the longest tongues are apt to take the most of the time; and in a convention on philology, a science in which smatterers are plentiful and good scholars rare, there could of course be no exception. After reading the interchange of views on the origin of language or the proper pronunciation of Latin, one felt like a French Communist, and wished that discussion could be put down at all hazards. It would seem that some method or other must be adopted in future, either by a division into sections or by a restriction of time, to limit discussion, so as to exclude those who can add nothing to the elucidation of the points in debate. Professors Whitney, Hadley, Van Name, Child, Gurney, Goodwin, Evans, and Kendrick, Chancellor Crosby, Mr. J. Hammond Trumbull, and Mr. C. A. Bristed, seemed to be the leaders of the Association, and their opinions were always needed to correct and sift the crude lucubrations of the half-learned. Perhaps the most spicy part of the whole proceedings was the way in which Professor Hadley refuted in a dozen sentences a long paper on the "Celtic Elements in French," in which it had been attempted to show that the French language was rather of Celtic than of Latin origin. Yet some very good papers were read, and the "Transactions" of the year, which print only what is valuable, will make a fair show. Among these was a useful article by Mr. Fitz-Edward Hall of London, read by Prof. Whitney, on certain points in English Grammar, which expostulated with Mr. Grant White and his friends on the matter which has caused them such uneasiness of mind—the propriety of using phrases like is being built. Mr. Hall found no difficulty in showing, by plenty of examples from classical authors, that this locution has all necessary authority, nor in proving it less absurd in analogy than the phrase is building, which Mr. White would have us substitute. Other good papers were that by Professor Evans of Cornell, probably the best Celtic scholar in the country, on various inaccuracies in the "Grammatica Celtica" of Zeuss; that by Prof. Whitney on Schleicher's theory of the origin of language; and several by Mr. Trumbull on points connected with the Algonkin languages, especially the one on the Algonkin names for man, in which he explained the name Lenni lenape, by which the Delaware tribe was known. Probably the most useful function of the Philological Association is the bringing together once a year of scholars from all parts of the country, and enabling them to get acquainted with each other, and thus to return home refreshed and inspired for their work. It certainly is not yet in a condition to act on the counsel of some of its members, and annually tell those of us who write for the papers what mistakes we make in English, and it may well spend some time longer in getting fairly on its feet, and devising how it may work profitably.

—We counsel Mr. Michael Doolady, the publisher, to look after his "eminent hands" far more sharply than he has been doing. One of them in particular, "Joseph Hertford," will bear a deal of watching, especially as regards the views of "national character" which he promulgates under Mr. Doolady's authority. Here is his account of the Frenchman: "In Paris, society has been for centuries rotten to the core. The people live out-of-doors. There is no domestic sentiment; and the Frenchman is in his glory when he is gaming, drinking, and carousing." We suggest as a fit domestic animal for this demon the new marsupial, known as the Tasmanian devil, which they have discovered in Van Diemen's Land, and which nature seems to have provided expressly for the Parisian as a humble dumb companion corresponding to the boule dogue and the coq de combat of the English nobility and gentry. Here is his portrait:

"His natural propensities are those of the gluttonous or sluggish kind, and he will be quiet enough when gorged with flesh and left to undisturbed repose, but the slightest provocation, the merest and most unintentional observation, will turn him at once into a veritable fiend. He then becomes instantly the very type of senseless fury, attacking all before him, dead or living. Nor is there, whilst life is left to him, either truce or quarter; as long as a shred of flesh remains to tear, or a last bone to shatter, he fights on regardless of the numbers that surround him, or of his own subsiding strength, until at length his jaws snap faintly, and his life goes gradually out with an infernal snarl. After years of experience, he repeats the same acts of profitless and exhausting frenzy. Without apparent motive he rushes at the wall, beating the air like a rabid lunatic, uttering long growls that seem to choke him, till they break out suddenly into a piercing bark. He shows not the smallest attachment to his guardians or keepers, whom he menaces from the moment they approach him till they pass completely out of sight."

—But according to the Paris correspondent of the Times, of this city, the modern Frenchman, fiend though he be with his gaming and his life exclusively in the open air, is at all events a distinct improvement on his feudal ancestor, on whom open-air life would seem to have had the most malign influence. The correspondent remarks that when the Republican politicians, just previously to the recent elections, set before the peasantry a long list of oppressive rights formerly exercised by the seigneurs, and which would all come in again with the Comte de Chambord, they omitted to mention one which he knows to have existed in feudal times, though he does not happen to know of instances in which it was exercised. This was the right of the lord on returning from the chase to cut open one serf for the purpose of warming his feet in the entrails. Not more than one might he disembowel—the ameliorating influence of the church probably having been here operative—but to disembowel one his legal right was admitted. We believe, but we partly forget, that it is Mr. Carlyle who is originally responsible for this amazing assertion, which manifestly appears to be based on the substitution of an s for a c in somebody's confused account of some such seignorial right as the right under certain stated circumstances to kill one stag (cerf), and only one, in the royal preserve in which the lord might happen to find himself. However, the Republicans may not unlikely take care to repair their omission on another occasion.

—We have received from Mr. John Camden Hotten, the well-known London publisher, advance sheets of his "Original Lists of Persons of Quality, Emigrants, ... and others who went from Great Britain to the American Plantations, 1600–1700," etc. The table of contents satisfies us that antiquaries need not thrill with the hope that new sources of information have been discovered. In fact, the most interesting part of this volume has been already printed in the collections of the Massachusetts Historical Society, Vol. VIII. of third series, and again by Mr. S. G. Drake, in 1860, in a volume entitled "Result of Researches among the British Archives," etc., reprinted from the N. E. Historical and Genealogical Register. Comparing Mr. Hotten's pages with Mr. Drake's, we fear that Mr. Hotten cannot be absolutely trusted as a copyist, as, indeed, one might be permitted to infer from the statement in the title that these lists have been deciphered from MSS. in the State Paper Office, London—i. e., MSS. of the year 1635, or thereabouts. Still, Mr. Hotten's book will be of interest as a third transcription of the original documents, and such portions as relate to the West Indian colonists will probably be new. It would be a more important work should Mr. Hotten obtain access to the records of the convicts sent to the Plantations, and give us the data as to the numbers sent if not the names.

—Since we discuss this week the question of minority representation, it may be well to mention two of the latest publications which serve to illustrate it. One is the second edition, about double the size of the first, of M. Ernest Naville's "Question Électorale en Europe et en Amérique" (Geneva: H. Georg)—a work defective in arrangement, but comprehensive in its survey of the field. It is chiefly valuable for its exposition of the Liste libre, or Free Ticket, and M. Naville, in the present edition, suggests some valuable modifications of this system so favorable to party action, but hitherto not giving play enough to individual preferences in the choice of candidates. They amount, in short, to the application of the principle of the Limited Vote within party lines. The second work to which we have alluded is the little pamphlet by Mr. H. R. Droop, entitled "Proportional Representation as applied to the Election of Local Governing Bodies" (London: Wildy & Sons). It consists of a paper read in April before the Juridical Society, in which the writer analyzes the results of the recent election of the London School Board, and shows how well they agree with the à priori speculations of the friends of proportional representation, and what a manifest gain there is for political purity and for the popular interest in politics from any the simplest departure from the majority rule. Mr. Droop is himself an advocate of the Hare system, but his review is perfectly candid, and as lucid as Mr. Hare's writing is unfortunately apt not to be. An appendix sets forth the progress of the proportional representation movement in foreign countries, including a translation of the first part of M. Naville's report to the Geneva "Association Réformiste," of which he is President (pp. 159–166 of the "Question Électorale").

—Miss Esther Greatbatch, whose name we hope she may some day change, though it certainly is now not without its significance, has shown a remarkable versatility of talent as a pupil of the North London Collegiate School of Girls, where she has received the whole of her education. She lately passed the second (special) examination for women at the University of London in French and in Harmony and Counterpoint, and these were some of her previous exploits, as we find them enumerated in Nature: she took the second prize at the examination which followed Prof. Guthrie's lectures on Physics at the London Institute, in February, 1870, and out of seventy-four candidates the first prize for the examination in Physical Geography following Prof. Huxley's lectures on that subject in 1869. In 1868, Miss Greatbatch passed as a Junior with first-class honors, and gained a prize for Mathematics at the Cambridge Local Examination. In December, 1870, she passed as a Senior, with first-class honors, gaining the Mill-Taylor scholarship (which she did not take up, as it can only be held in Cambridge) and a prize for Political Economy.

These laudable evidences of woman's capacity ought to stimulate the students in our female colleges to show that Miss Greatbatch is no exception among her sex, and encourage those colleges which (like Michigan) have either admitted women to the regular studies, or (like Williams) are considering the propriety of doing so.

—The governing bodies of the Inns of Court have hitherto had a monopoly of the business of making attorneys and barristers in England, and their way of educating a student may be described as putting him into the chambers of a practitioner whom he selects, where he reads what he likes. In "moot courts," as we call them, and exercises they have no faith, and their examinations for admission to the bar are the merest shams. The system may be said to have worked well, after the curious fashion of English systems, which seem to turn out, in spite of themselves, as it were, the products desired. "The result," says the Pall Mall Gazette, "has been not very unlike the Darwinian system of natural selection modified by sexual selection. The best men, or the strongest men, or the men least easily discouraged, have come to the front, but so also have the relatives of attorneys and the men who have married solicitors' daughters." Great lawyers and great judges living to great ages in the use and enjoyment of all their faculties have, under this system, made the British bench and bar illustrious, and given the world the spectacle of an array of intellectual power as imposing in its long succession and its collective mass as the history of the human mind has to show. But it is a system under which the weaker go cruelly to the wall—which is perhaps their business rather than anybody's else. Other results of it, however, are distinctly matter of public concern. Just now a change is loudly demanded, the spokesman of the malcontents being no less a person than Sir Roundell Palmer. At present the English law is an enormous and growing mass of the most minutely precise rules, almost all of which, to be sure, are so reasonable that the common law may perhaps be fairly allowed its compliment of being the perfection of common sense, but which are so vast in number that not only, for instance, would no layman dare to buy a piece of land and himself search the title, but, says the Gazette, the Solicitor-General himself—and he is one of the ablest men in England—would no more undertake to satisfy himself of the sufficiency of his title to a field that he had bought than the greatest real-estate lawyer in the country would undertake the cross-examination of the claimant in the Tichborne case. In other words, the English law is not only given over to experts, the laymen confessing themselves wholly unequal to the pretence of knowing positively anything about the law they live under, but among those experts the ablest profess themselves experts only in some small portion of the whole immense corpus juris. There never was a plainer evidence and monument of the peculiar habit of a national mind than the English law with its hatred of abstract and general propositions, or, as they are called outside of the three kingdoms, "principles." That this habit of the national mind—at all events, in the intensified form in which the legal mind exhibits it—is partly removable, Sir Roundell Palmer and his friends would seem to assert, and they propose the establishment of a new General School of Law, which, it appears, is to supersede the Inns of Court, or at any rate to substitute for their method of instruction another. The question is to be fully debated, and just what is proposed is not now clear; but, in brief, the ultimate object would seem to be summed up in the assertion that "the mode of arranging the law in their own minds" used, as they approach the end of their career, by such lawyers as Sir Roundell Palmer, Lord Westbury, and Lord Cairns—who "constantly argue a legal question for hours upon principle and without citing a decision"—"can assuredly be more or less communicated to young English lawyers by education."

—The lengthening list of Englishmen, great in science and in letters, who have passed away during the present year, ends for the present with the name of Alexander Keith Johnston, LL.D., who died at Ben Rhydding, in Yorkshire, on the 7th of July. He was a native of Scotland, born in December, 1804, and, having exchanged the study of medicine for engraving, he soon discovered his true vocation. A pedestrian tour in the north of Scotland, says the Athenæum, by showing him the defects of existing maps, led him to undertake better ones for a guide-book in 1830. In 1843, he produced his "National Atlas," in folio, the labor of five years, almost wholly with his own hand. Extensive travels through Europe and in Egypt and Palestine followed his appointment as Geographer-Royal for Scotland, and enabled him to become a very accomplished linguist. In 1848, he published his "Physical Atlas," for which he had received the encouragement as he reaped the praise of authorities like Humboldt and Ritter, and had bestowed on him the honorary diploma of the Geographical Society of Berlin. A second edition, much improved, appeared in 1856. Meantime, in 1850, Mr. Johnston published his "Dictionary of Geography," of which ten thousand copies have been sold, received the Exhibition medal of 1851 for the first physical globe of the earth ever drawn, in 1852 completed his chart of the geographical distribution of health and disease, and in 1855 commenced his "Royal Atlas of Modern Geography"—a work of unsurpassed beauty of execution. Besides these important enterprises, which gave a powerful impulse to geographical pursuits, he produced four atlases of general, classical, physical, and astronomical geography, and otherwise sought to popularize his previous works. His place among British savans will be filled with difficulty.

—Father Secchi, the well-known and clever Roman astronomer, in his recent work, "Le Soleil," dipped his imaginary thermometer inside the solar envelope in contact with the photosphere, and read off the dog-day marking of 10,000,000° Centigrade. Heat of this degree, Prof. Newcomb has replied, would speedily reduce our earth to vapor, and Mr. Ericsson says (in Nature, July 13) that his own experiments have convinced him that Father Secchi's thermometer would not rise much above 4,000,000° Fahrenheit. That is hot enough, in all conscience, but Father Secchi has put his foot in a hotter place—say, 6,000,000° Fahrenheit. On the twelfth of June, he sent a letter to the Abbé Moigno, editor of the scientific journal, Les Mondes, in which, alluding to the horrors through which Paris had just passed, he said:

"What will be our lot here, I do not know; but if to restore the order of humanity which has been so profoundly disturbed, Rome must needs undergo the fate of Paris, God's will be done. In any case, a life like that we lead here now is much harder than death; and it must end one way or the other. . . . I find consolation only in work and in the prosecution of my researches on the physical constitution of the sun, which occupy all my time, and so far prevent me from feeling the cruel sufferings of the present moment. Unfortunately, the resources of our Observatory are so diminished nowadays as to be far from sufficient to accomplish what I could desire."

He went on to tell how the Italian Government had begged him to accept a chair in the University of Rome; and he gave a very garbled account of some communications he had had with Prof. Francesco Brioschi, who was made the medium of the solicitation referred to. Prof. Brioschi has felt moved, by the unwarranted insinuations of the passage quoted above, as well as by the subsequent misrepresentation, to write an indignant letter exposing the astronomer. He attributes Father Secchi's letter to Les Mondes to that "puerile vanity of his which has become proverbial among scientific men"; denounces him for the atrocious suggestion that the occupation of Rome would lead to a second Darboy massacre; and prints a letter of Father Secchi's, written last November, accepting with gratitude the invitation to teach in the University, and proposing a title for the chair to avoid wounding the susceptibilities of the Professor of Astronomy already connected with the institution, and finally thanking him for the good wishes which, on the eve of Secchi's starting on the eclipse expedition, Brioschi had conveyed to him, in a letter informing him what material aid the Italian Government had placed at his disposal for the purposes of that expedition. A slight comparison of this document, says Brioschi, with the letter to the Abbé Moigno, is enough to show the character of the man who wrote it; "let us hope, for his sake, that at least his fame as a savant may ever remain unimpaired." Father Secchi says in extenuation, that his letter was not meant for publication; that it was the Jesuits for whose safety he feared; that some things are difficult to be understood by those who have not received the Christian education in regard to God's educing good from evil; and that his acceptance of the Government chair was given in the hope of saving the Collegio Romano from being converted into a national school, which it has since become.

—Some sensation has been caused by the discovery of a fraudulent commerce in saints' relics carried on by certain of the clergy in Rome. The details which have come to light remind one strongly of the thriving business done in the same articles by the Roman clergy in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. In those days they could confidently sell to the churches such remains as "the breath of Joseph of Arimathæa, preserved in a glove," and these modern transactions, if not carried quite so far, are in the same direction. Owing to recent seizures by the Italian Government, the papers of an interesting criminal suit have fallen under profane eyes. Giuseppe Colangeli, late door-keeper of the Roman Repository of Relics, had been indicted for affixing the official seals to documents guaranteeing the authenticity of relics which he knew to be spurious; for having lent the official seals to one of his associates, Vincenzo Campodonico, for the same fraudulent purpose; for using some of the aforesaid documents, designed to prove the genuineness of the relics of one saint, to sell those of another; and, finally, for having sold spurious relics on his own account. Campodonico, his accomplice, had been almost a wholesale dealer in this line. He had a method peculiar to himself of putting up saints' bodies so that they seemed entire, but crumbled to dust at the slightest touch of the hand. He was careful to exhibit these relics in quaint old worm-eaten cases or coffins, and to have them duly authenticated. Some of them even reached this country, being sold at 140 scudi a piece for account of the faithful in Canada. Colangeli was sentenced to one year's imprisonment, but his counsel demurred to this on the ground that the reasons for the penalty had not been stated in the verdict. Thereupon the Pope dismissed the whole suit, thus also preventing the prosecution of Campodonico and the other accomplices. All the papers relating to these proceedings were sealed and deposited in the secret archives of the Papal Government.

TWO BOOKS ON RUSSIA.*

The name of Mrs. H. C. Romanoff, an English wife of a Russian gentleman living up in the Ural Mountains, is very favorably known by her "Sketches of the Rites and Customs of the Greco-Russian Church," a book of rare interest and value. It is a pity, therefore, that she has not selected a better subject in her second attempt to illustrate her adopted country. The present book is a translation of three essays by Mr. S. N. Shubinsky, and a rifacimento of some chapters in the "Leaders of Russia since Peter the Great" of Mr. Basil Andréef, both published in a third-rate Russian magazine. Neither of these authors is noted for profound or accurate historical knowledge, and, in fact, they are much laughed at in Russia for their pretensions, though Mr. Andréef has written one good book on Russian sectaries, and, in the work laid under contribution by Mrs. Romanoff, he writes intelligently and in an interesting way. By her attempts at condensation, the editor has succeeded in destroying most of the interest of the original. The chapter on Catherine the Great, for example, as written by Mr. Andréef, presented a vivid portraiture; the summary of it given by Mrs. Romanoff is a mere collection of anecdotes, in which all the character of this great Empress is lost. In these narratives, the English reader will find little that is new to him, because there is little that is drawn from purely Russian sources, one object of the authors, as Mr. Andréef states in his preface, being to acquaint their countrymen with various foreign memoirs and documents, the circulation of which in Russia the severity of the censorship had previously prevented. There are, however, certain things about which the Russian authorities do not like to have much said, such as the murders of Peter III. and of Paul, and a certain reticence is, therefore, kept up which is very amusing. There is no reason for euphemism in an English narrative, and it seems absurd to find a chapter terminating with the simple phrase: "The Emperor Paul departed this life on the evening of the 11th of March, 1801."

In spite of these drawbacks, the reader will find "Historical Narratives" an entertaining and instructive book, and will not regret the few hours spent in its perusal. We trust, though, that Mrs. Romanoff will next time give us another of her own studies of peasant and country life, describing merely what she sees and hears. For such work she is well qualified, and she can hardly fail to write something of great interest and value.

The book of Mr. Barry is chiefly a book of such sort, a record of what he saw and of the conclusions he came to during some four years that he was director of the large Shipiloff iron-works, situated not far from Nizhni-Novgorod. Mr. Barry speaks Russian, and was for the greater part of the time deep in the country, away from foreigners, and in close intercourse with natives, large numbers of whom he had under his immediate supervision. In addition, he resided some time in Moscow, and travelled very extensively in Russia and Siberia. The author seems to have been moved to write by a very just indignation at the errors and misstatements in Mr. Dixon's "Free Russia," and, after relieving his mind on this subject, he proceeds with a fair account of what is now going on in Russia, and of the characteristics of the people, so far as they came under his notice, and he had many opportunities of judging. Mr. Barry lacks the graces of style, but he plainly has something to say, and says it in a way to be understood. So long as he confines himself to his actual observations he is excellent, and his conclusions are, in the main, correct and just. The weak parts of the book are the political chapters, and, perhaps, there are too many of the old stock stories and anecdotes current at Moscow, new though they be to foreign readers. The spelling of Russian words is seldom exactly what it should be; but it shows only that Mr. Barry's knowledge of the language was colloquial rather than literary.

Mr. Barry likes the Russian peasants, and is not ashamed to say so. He knows as well as any one their lack of truthfulness, their blunted moral perceptions, their disposition to shirk, and the other faults and vices they have inherited from a state of serfdom; but he bears strong testimony to their general industry, their faithfulness, their capacity, their docility and good disposition, and to the general amelioration of their condition. It has been stated by some that one proof of the failure of emancipation is the scarcity of labor. Mr. Barry considers that this scarcity, if it exists—which he is unwilling to admit—only proves that the peasant finds enough to do in working for himself. Some would say that it only proves his laziness; but there is ocular evidence that the land belonging to the peasant community is always cultivated. And then, besides, the peasant in the country neither begs nor starves, mendicancy being confined to the cities; and he must do one or the other if he did not work. Mr. Barry is inclined to think—which is indeed true—that the apparent scarcity of labor arises from the fact that more land is brought under cultivation than formerly. Proprietors who formerly let their lands lie unworked, and had let out their serfs on obrok, or rent, now wish to cultivate their estates, and naturally find fewer hands than before; because these serfs on obrok who had gone to the towns were freed unconditionally, and have preferred to remain there. There is also a general rise in the value of land. With reference to the present condition of the peasantry, Mr. Barry says:

"In all I see there, I see signs of improvement. I notice new houses in the villages, much repairing of the old ones; the fields better fenced; the yards enlarged; the iron tickets of the fire insurance companies fixed up on many of the houses of the more prosperous ci-devant serfs; the horses more generally shod; the more general use of iron tires on the cartwheels; the use of candles in the dwellings, in place of pieces of pine-wood; the men and women both dressing better; a demand for the means of education; a knowledge that they are protected by the law; a better idea of what is going on in the neighboring town; the entering into small businesses, such as millers, tanners, barge-owners, steamboat proprietors, cattle-dealers, iron-masters, etc.; using rough machinery to prepare their flax and winnow their corn; treating their women-folk with more consideration; less living in a state of concubinage among the people."

In another place, the author says: "The people would be better off if their habits were less frugal. Often a few days' work will suffice to keep them in laziness for the rest of a week." This is very true, and is an argument that might be used in favor of the Russian protective tariff. Anything like manufactures, which will instil new ideas into the people, and give them additional and even artificial wants, will do much to civilize them and should be encouraged for that reason. The readiness of the Russian peasant for manufacturing industry, and the ease and quickness with which he becomes a good workman, are pointed out and illustrated by Mr. Barry, who has something good to tell us about the quality of native manufactures. If he had got up his statistics better, and had told us the quantity of goods now made in Russia, he would have done great service. The chapters on Siberia, and Sport and Pastimes, are full of new and entertaining matter. Though the book by no means gives a complete picture of all Russia, yet it contains enough to justify its title; and we can cordially recommend it as the best book on that country that has been published within the last ten years, and hope that it will find many readers.

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW FOR JULY.

The July North American has for its most interesting article a paper entitled "The Meaning of Revenue Reform," which is the work of Mr. Wells, and will be found exceedingly useful to those who wish to come to an understanding of this question, important now, and of rapidly growing importance. We, for our part, have little or no regret to express because of Mr. Wells's importing into his discussion of the unwisdom of our present financial system something of what has seemed to some people the sharpness of personal feeling. But this it, doubtless, really is not. There is, to be sure, not the least doubt that Mr. Wells is an ill-used person. But there is as little doubt that, in the ill-usage of him, the country at large has received injury at the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. And it is travelling out of the record for his critics to say that it is Mr. Wells as a man, and not Mr. Wells as a political economist, who relates of the Secretary of the Treasury such a story as this that follows:

"In 1869, when it was proposed, in anticipation of the discussion of the

* "Historical Narratives. From the Russian. By H. C. Romanoff." Rivingtons, London. 1871.
"Russia in 1870. By Herbert Barry, late Director of the Shipiloff Iron-works in the Government of Vladimir, etc., etc." Wyman & Sons, London. 1871.

income tax by Congress, at its approaching session, to prepare for public information a full statement of the working and distribution of this tax, the amount paid respectively by the recipients of large, moderate, and small incomes, and the amount and number of individuals exempted under the law as then existing, the Secretary of the Treasury refused to allow the investigation to be undertaken, alleging substantially that it was not in accordance with the policy of the Treasury to permit such facts to be made public."

This anecdote is contained in a marginal note, and is told to justify an assertion made in the text, to the effect that at the present time, as all friends of revenue reform maintain, neither good sense nor sound knowledge is displayed by us in the management of our fiscal affairs; and, further, that, under the present administration of the Treasury Department, the investigation by which we alone can ensure safe progress is studiously repressed. To another anecdote of Mr. Boutwell, Mr. Wells only makes incidental reference, for he has told it before, we believe; we have, at all events; but we recur to it again, for the reason that it is useful as affording a measure of the financial ability of a man whose financial course costs the country many millions annually. It is an anecdote which relates that our Minister of Finance, on being told that the condition of labor throughout the country is not as prosperous as it should be; that, notwithstanding our very great resources, there are practically only three out of all our manifold products—namely, gold, cotton, and petroleum—which cannot be produced more cheaply elsewhere than American labor can produce them; that our advantage in respect of these three extends no further than to the material in its most unwrought and crude condition—on being told, in short, that trade was dull and labor suffering, and that things might easily be made very much easier, both for the laborer and the capitalist, our financial minister coolly replied, in effect, that he knew better, because he had just ridden through from Groton to Washington by rail, and had observed, as he looked out of the car windows, that everybody appeared to be busy; and because, when he got back to his office in Washington, he found the revenues from taxation coming in without interruption. As if there was not such a thing as a science of statistics; as if, there being one, it could be studied with a night-glass through a car-window; and as if there had never been seen a people having burdensome, foolishly-imposed taxes to pay, and yet contriving, somehow or other, to pay them. We submit that when a gentleman of this order of mind goes on for some years crippling industry by his want of knowledge, any writer on finance may find sufficient justification for attacking him in the fact that he is a fellow-countryman, whether or not he has been driven by him out of a place of great usefulness. It is the more necessary when, as here among us, a popular understanding of an unpopular question is among the prerequisites of a reform. It need hardly shock any one, we should say, that Mr. Wells indulges in the "personality" of saying, "It is probable that there may have been finance ministers less competent than the present Secretary of the Treasury; and undoubtedly there have been Presidents as little inclined to reform as President Grant." It is hazarding little to say that it is less the President's want of inclination to reform, in the abstract or even the concrete, than his entire unfamiliarity with all such questions as this of taxation and currency, which makes him believe his Secretary of the Treasury to be a fit enough person for the place. That Grant cares much, if at all, for "Boutwell's political influence," it is not necessary to believe. The President gave Mr. Boutwell by far the largest part of the political influence he now has when he put him where he now is, and gave him more than he will ever have after he is done "wielding the patronage," and has to fall back on his native resources. Six months of a sound successor in his office would make the funding schemes and taxing policy of its present incumbent a very heavy weight about Mr. Boutwell's neck. There is not much in Mr. Wells's article that he has not said before; but he is dealing with facts and theories as to which Congressmen and editors need information, and which will have to be insisted on, line upon line and precept upon precept, and made plain for him who runs to read. The following extract may give such of our readers as have paid too little attention to this subject a specimen of what they are to expect in the essay itself, which we hope they will read with attention:

"It would seem, therefore, that the questions involved in the defects of our financial policy and methods of taxation, as above indicated, are not questions which require that the advocates of reform should necessarily commit themselves either to the principles of free-trade on the one hand, or of protection on the other, inasmuch as they concern simply the reform of abuses. And it is, moreover, the maintenance of these abuses which gives to very many industries a claim for protection which otherwise would not be demanded. Governor Thomas of Maryland, in a speech before the Committee of Ways and Means a year ago, which was never published, set this matter in its true light. He is reported to have said: 'I live in Alleghany County, Maryland, where our staple product is coal, and we have found by calculation that we are taxed every year to the extent of nearly two millions of dollars through the increased price which we are obliged to pay for all that we consume in working this coal and transporting it to market—for our iron, our lumber, our woollens, our oil, and our machinery; and we only ask, as a matter of justice, that a sufficient duty be imposed upon coal to compensate us for our taxes.' All of which, rendered into simple English, amounts to this: You have allowed A, B, and C to plunder us annually to the extent of two millions; now allow us in return to plunder somebody else in the way of compensation."

The most important of the contents of the Review is a paper by Mr. Chauncey Wright on "The Genesis of Species." Mr. Wright begins by stating briefly and generally, but very lucidly, the changed condition of opinion in the thinking world concerning the question of the origin of species. "Orthodoxy has been won over to the doctrine of evolution." Not that leaders in the religious world are now willing to abandon the dogma that the origin of species is a special religious mystery; but many men of science, who are also religious men, and who are at the least quite as religiously reverent as scientifically inquisitive, have within the past twelve years found that the general theory, designated by the terms "evolution," "transmutation," "development," "derivation," "descent with modification," they could reconcile with the dogmas which they regard as essential to religion. It is this general theory that is no longer regarded with suspicion by many thinkers as being hostile to religion; the subordinate hypothesis of natural selection, the explanation of evolution, is still rejected by the religious critics, one of whom, Mr. St. George Mivart, has recently brought forward a critique of "Darwinism" or "Natural Selection," as held by Darwin and the Darwinians, and with his criticisms a counter-theory of his own. This critique by Mr. Mivart furnishes Mr. Wright with the main subject of his essay, which any reader, of any training at all in controversy, no matter how slight his knowledge of Darwinism, will see to be extraordinarily acute and able, and which, so far as we can judge, leaves not much of Mr. Mivart. The tone of Mr. Wright's paper is such as to make it in that respect a model of controversy. It is nearly as judicially impersonal and easy as a steam hammer. These papers by Mr. Wright and Mr. Wells, together with a short and comparatively slight article by Doctor J. P. Thompson, on the subterranean explorations recently made in Jerusalem; the article on "Minority Representation," which we notice elsewhere; and a good résumé of the best opinions concerning the religion of the ancient Romans, written by Professor W. F. Allen, make up the body of this number of the Review, which is valuable reading, though we should say that it is to be called neither light nor quite near enough to lightness.

The literary reviews begin with a long and interesting notice of the first volume of Professor Max Müller's translation of the "Rig-veda-sanhita." The reviewer finds it necessary to make some complaint against Müller on several grounds, and though "in so doing he uses him as though he loved him," he nevertheless presents a clear case against him, and shows him to be not innocent of putting into his book some vexatious padding, pure and simple, and very much matter which must be pronounced valueless, or of value insufficient to justify its appearance in a volume—one of eight—which gives the reader no more than twelve hymns, or about one seventy-fifth of the whole text to be given. Clearly, this is not using the subscribers well. As for the translation, Müller's work is pronounced far inferior to that of Roth, and certainly, as Roth appears in the reviewer's translation of him into English, there will be no question in the mind of the reader ignorant of Sanskrit and acquainted with poetry, that the difference between Müller's verses and Roth's is the difference between good work and bad. After this review—a specimen of strict reviewing at its very best—come notices of Yeaman's "Science of Government," done by some gentleman who appears to be in deplorably low spirits; and of some half-dozen other books, notably of Mr. C. W. Baird's history of the town of Rye in Connecticut. The notice of Heard's "Curiosities of the Law Reports" is good as adding one or two curiosities to those which Mr. Heard has gathered together. This is how Mr. Justice Lumpkin, of Georgia, expresses (in 13 Ga. 14) his opinion of the effete dogma that a writ of error needs a seal:

"I can scarcely suppress a smile, I will not say grimace irresistible, when I see so much importance attached to trifles. I scorn to be a 'cerf adscript' (sic) to things obsolete or thoroughly deserving to be so. . . . President Pendleton states that there was a period when the impression [on a seal] was made with the eye-tooth, and thinks that there was some utility in the custom, since the tooth's impression was the man's own, and presented a test in case of forgery. But this reason does not hold true in this epoch of dentistry, when no man's tooth is his own. . . . I admit that old things may be good things, as old wine, old wives, ay, and an old world. But the world is older and consequently wiser than it ever was before. . . . Let the legislative and judicial axe be laid to the root of the tree: cut it down, why cumbereth it any longer courts and contracts?"

And this remark on the case of a Mr. Reed, who was accidentally killed, is enlivening, when met with in a report:

"Reed and MacGuire were both victims of the same accident, which, though melancholy, has settled the law."

THE MAGAZINES FOR AUGUST.

THE characters of Ernest Picard, Jules Ferry, Trochu, Gambetta, Jules Favre, Garnier-Pagès, Rochefort, and Jules Simon are sketched with minuteness and, as we think, with a great deal of shrewdness and precision, in an article which appears in this month's Scribner's, and which seems to give itself out as the work of Miss Mary C. Putnam, M.D., but which surely must be only translated by that lady, and not written by her. It is not well translated either; on the contrary, mistakes occur which a more illiterate proof-reader than any of our magazine publishers ought to employ should be above the danger of allowing to get into print. For example, we read of the "destitution" (déchéance) of the Napoleonic empire. But, whoever wrote it or translated it, the article is clever and worth reading, as this extract may show:

"This, then, was the radical vice in M. Jules Simon's philosophy—that he did not believe in it. This homœopathic dilution of Cousin, Jouffroy, and Roger Collard; this vaporous eclecticism that reposes on the cardinal principle of not having any vital principle whatever; this immense Missouri Compromise between everything that anybody had ever believed and its diametrical opposite; this modern bulwark of failing faith—soft, tender, and trembling as might be a bulwark of jelly; this conciliation effected between Catholicism, Spiritualism, Materialism, Positivism, Atheism, and Pantheism; this admission of everything except the necessity of a foundation for belief, that should be not only unshaken, but unshakable; this preservation of doctrine under a glass case, ticketed with the warning to keep hands off the fragile fossil; this reduction of faith to a social convention; this hatred of living ideas because of their life, and this sickly tenderness for the shadows of the dead—it is evident that in all this was to be found small material to meet the rude necessities of a crisis boiling over with passion. As well hope to arrest or direct a torrent of lava, that bursts from the crater of Vesuvius, by the chill embrace of a mountain-mist floated down from the Highlands of Scotland."

This, too, seems to us commendable as striking pretty nearly the just mean between respect for Rochefort as a man and utter contempt for Rochefort as an indicator of popular rights:

"Sauciness constituted all Rochefort's prestige—now the sauciness of his constituents, now his own. This mocking disdain, that seemed more superficial, in reality sprang from a deeper root than the serious criticism of other members of the opposition. It was rooted in the self-consciousness of a rival power, bent on overturning, not a functionary, or a ministry, or a constitution, but systems, and thrones, and hierarchies. This power alone could afford to gibe and frolic with its adversary, whom it considered already as torn in pieces. Not the depth of his principles, but the coincidence between the scoff that scintillated from his easy wit, and the disdain that glowed from their laboring passion, united Rochefort and the people. But in a quarrel of dignities, what so close a bond of union as a common contempt? What could unite the people to Picard, anxious to preserve a 'liberal' Empire; to Garnier-Pagès, stupefied before the august tears of Louis Philippe; to Jules Favre, with his adroit reverences and supple genuflexions? Rochefort made fun of solemnities empty as a nightmare, and as overwhelming. Hence, the people adored him. He represented for them 'the ideal of liberty and justice,' which poor Delescluze would pathetically lament to not find realized in the Republic of the Provisional Government."

Another article in Scribner's is interesting for its account of the parentage of the weeping willows of this country and England. It will be new to most of our readers. Shortly after the bursting of the South Sea Bubble, in 1720, a friend of Pope's, who had gone to the East to recruit his fortunes, sent home to the poet a present of figs, and, as it happened, there was in one of the boxes a twig of a plant new to Pope, who, being then busy with his Twickenham gardening, stuck it into the ground. In time it became a large and admired tree—the parent of all the English weeping willows. A slip from this Twickenham willow was cut off, in 1775, by a young English officer, who was coming out with Sir Henry Clinton to put down the rebellion at Boston, and after it was put down to shoot buffalo on Copp's Hill, and practise at alligators in Spy Pond, and, better yet, confiscate land, and plant, and build, in which case the weeping willow would be desirable. But, in the course of events, planting among the Americans began to look far off; the young Englishman gave his willow-twig, carefully wrapped in oiled silk, to John Parke Custis, Washington's step-son, who, shortly afterwards, planted it near his house at Abingdon, in Virginia. There it flourished, and the son of Pope's tree became the parent of our American weeping willows. To some of our readers it may be new to hear that the tree gets its name from a Talmudic legend which avers that the Babylonian willows beneath which the Hebrews sat down and wept in their captivity drooped their branches in accordant sadness.

Mr. D. O'C. Townley writes a very good sketch, accompanied by an excellent portrait, of the man who probably may be considered the most truly successful artist that this country has to show—Mr. J. Q. A. Ward; Miss C. F. Bates a pretty poem; Rev. H. H. Macfarland, a glowing, but not too glowing, description of Vassar College; and J. R. G. Hassard, an encouraging report of the progress made toward our Metropolitan Museum of Art. This latter is accompanied by wood-cuts of the designs submitted by Mr. W. H. Beard, which are certainly extraordinary. Mr. Beard proposes that the outer approaches to the entrance of the museum should be subterranean. The visitor entering the museum from the Park—it is to be up in Eighth Avenue, opposite Central Park—finds himself in a large tunnel, wide and well ventilated but tortuous, over the arched mouth of which hang vines and shrubbery. On either side stands a colossal stone figure—"Ignorance with threatening aspect, and Superstition with repulsive mien;" Ignorance with a cleaver in his hand, Superstition bearing a thigh-bone; Ignorance with a plain cloth about his waist, Superstition with a knotted cloth about his, the pair of them scowling dismally, and not pleasing in the shape of their limbs and trunks. These affright the beholder, especially the women and children, if we may judge from these designs. As the spectator passes on he sees in the obscurity the creeping forms of tigers, lions, and Mr. Beard's well-known bears, which ramp and threaten. Passing these we come to the portal of Art, where Time, another colossal figure, lies sleeping, and over his head is a tablet which is to bear the names of donors—"a delicate intimation of the immortality of fame which will reward the gift of a thousand dollars or so to the Museum." Branching out of this room are various passageways—"one guarded by antediluvian animals of vast size"—which lead through galleries to the museum proper. Yet it is not so improbable that this vulgar and every way preposterous conception of what is appropriate for an institution designed to educate and elevate the public taste may be executed; the writer in the magazine remarks that "the gentlemen upon whose good judgment the choice of an architect and the character of the building chiefly depend, are P. B. Sweeny, the President, and Judge Hilton, the Secretary of the Department of Public Parks." How fit they are for the work an hour or two spent in the Central Park by any person who knew it four years ago will be sufficient to show. We have not given it detailed examination, but we would venture to say that no person of fair intelligence in such matters could see the management of the flowers, for example, by the gardeners of this year without perceiving that the Park is in tasteless hands. The great beauties of the place they can hardly spoil, but every now and then one comes upon some flower-bed with an elegant raised scolloped pattern, patted up with a hoe along the edge of it, or a shabby, little forlorn row, one by one, of the not very costly portulacca; or a wood hillside carefully raked. There is not a general effect, but there is every now and then too strong a suggestion—even in the more beautiful upper part of the Park—of scraping and washing and overdressing which is of very unpleasant omen.

In the "Topics of the Time" the editor has something to say about the "Pike" in literature, the "Pike" being the personage who figures in the poems of Mr. John Hay, and some other writers of verses in dialect, who blaspheme, gamble, kill, and display at the same time the tenderest emotions, and also a spiritual soundness and healthiness which could not have been expected from their doctrinal laxity and their general laxity of practice. "Undoubtedly," says the editor, "the Pike is a fact. Tilmon Joy and Jim Bludso are men that Mr. Hay has seen with his own eyes," and so forth. But we suppose the Pike, as he exists in Mr. Hay's poems, to be not at all a fact, and that if there is one thing in "Jim Bludso," for example, which to the intelligent reader of good poetry is more striking than another, it is the perfect falseness of the note struck. The Pike of Mr. Hay's pieces is a creature made up of the simulacrum of a genuine Pike, into which is breathed for a soul some breath from Mr. Hay's nostrils, and the creature produced is as much like any living creature who ever walked the earth as the absurd stage Laertes is usually like a hot young Danish nobleman. It is not the Pike, half-horse and half-alligator, but Mr. Hay, who says:

"Through the hot black breath of the burnin' boat Jim Bludso's voice was heard—" or, a great deal worse than such surface failure, this:

"But he never flunked and he never lied."

Or this, which is not the Pike at all, but in which we have Mr. Hay "enthused":

"He seen his duty, a dead sure thing,
And went for it there and then,
And Christ a'n't a-going to be too hard
On a man that died for men."

Or this:

"And I think that saving a little child,
And bringing him to his own,
Is a derned sight better business
Than loafing around the throne."

Now, if this were the Pike in his integrity, he would simply be a disgustingly foul-mouthed creature, who had better be left unselected as a subject by any and all writers. But to our mind there is just as much good portraiture in it as there is of good poetry, or of that decent respect for religious beliefs and venerated names which is demanded by good taste, at least, were there no other authority to exact it.

The July Atlantic is a good number, and may be recommended. Mr. James's "Watch and Ward" is interesting—the word, perhaps, most often to be applied to his work, though some of it merits words of praise more valuable to a story-writer. The second part of Mr. Howells's "Wedding Journey" is like the first part—delightful, and perhaps is as good as anything he has ever done. "The Whispering Gallery" still talks of Dickens, and will surprise many of that author's readers, who remember how he stuffs his characters, by this remark:

"And here let me say, that although he was accustomed to talk and write a great deal about eating and drinking, I have rarely seen a man eat and drink less. He liked to dilate in imagination over the brewing of a bowl of punch, but I always noticed that when the punch was ready, he drank less of it than any one who might be present. It was the sentiment of the thing and not the thing itself that engaged his attention. He liked to have a little supper every night after a reading, and have three or four friends round the table with him, but he only picked at the viands as a bird might do, and I scarcely saw him eat a hearty meal during his whole stay in the country."

We presume Mr. Fields intends to speak of Dickens's general habit, and not merely of his habits while in this country on his last visit. Mr. John Fiske's "Werewolves and Swan-maidens" is entertaining, and so, without being at the same time extravagantly instructive, are the "Book-notices." Mr. Whittier has some kind and pleasing lines about the late Miss Cary, but the other poetry it is not necessary to dwell upon. Mr. Clarence King's "Mountaineering in the Sierra Nevada" is an admirable description of mountain work, told with a very taking modesty and manliness. We make this extract, which, though of course the interest here rises very high, is in other respects no inferior sample of this fine paper:

"As we tied ourselves together, I told Cotter to hold himself in readiness to jump down into one of these in case I fell, and started to climb up the wall, succeeding quite well for about twenty feet. About two feet above my hands was a crack, which, if my arms had been long enough to reach, would probably have led me to the very top; but I judged it beyond my powers, and, with great care, descended to the side of Cotter, who believed that his superior length of arm would enable him to make the reach.

"I planted myself against the rock, and he started cautiously up the wall. Looking down the glare front of ice, it was not pleasant to consider at what velocity a slip would send me to the bottom, or at what angle, and to what probable depth, I should be projected into the ice-water. Indeed, the idea of such a sudden bath was so annoying that I lifted my eyes toward my companion. He reached my farthest point without great difficulty, and made a bold spring for the crack, reaching it without an inch to spare, and holding on wholly by his fingers. He thus worked himself slowly along the crack toward the top, at last getting his arms over the brink, and gradually drawing his body up and out of sight. It was the most splendid piece of slow gymnastics I ever witnessed. For a moment he said nothing; but when I asked if he was all right, he cheerfully repeated, 'All right.' It was only a moment's work to send up the two knapsacks and barometer, and receive again my end of the lasso. As I tied it round my breast, Cotter said to me, in an easy, confident tone, 'Don't be afraid to bear your weight.' I made up my mind, however, to make that climb without his aid, and husbanded my strength as I climbed from crack to crack. I got up without difficulty to my former point, rested there a moment, hanging solely by my hands, gathered every pound of strength and atom of will for the reach, then jerked myself upward with a swing, just getting the tips of my fingers into the crack. In an instant I had grasped it with my right hand also. I felt the sinews of my fingers relax a little, but the picture of the slope of ice and the blue lake affected me so strongly that I redoubled my grip, and climbed slowly along the crack, until I reached the angle, and got one arm over the edge as Cotter had done. As I rested my body upon the edge and looked up at Cotter, I saw that, instead of a level top, he was sitting upon a smooth roof-like slope, where the least pull would have dragged him over the brink. He had no brace for his feet, nor hold for his hands, but had seated himself calmly, with the rope tied round his breast, knowing that my only safety lay in being able to make the climb entirely unaided; certain that the least waver in his tone would have disheartened me, and perhaps made it impossible. The shock I received on seeing this affected me for a moment, but not enough to throw me off my guard, and I climbed quickly over the edge. When we had walked back out of danger we sat down upon the granite for a rest. In all my experience of mountaineering I have never known an act of such real, profound courage as this of Cotter's."

The July Harper's, too, offers a good number to the summer reader, who will be particularly pleased with the first article, called "Children of the Summer," which can be no one's but Mr. Howells's, though apparently written some years since, and before he quite trusted the hand which has since so plainly shown its cunning, and is now so sure. Of the accompanying illustrations we wish him joy. They are actionably bad, we should say, if there is any justice at all in the land. "Cavour" is the subject of another illustrated article, "Life in Cuba" of another, the new book about "Jefferson's Domestic Life" of another, and there are besides an instalment of "The American Baron," that absurd but readable and funny exaggeration; and, among other things, "A Letter of Coleridge's," formerly unpublished, in which he incidentally remarks that he never allows himself to put forth anything that he is not sure is his own and entirely underived from books, and unsuggested by other writers—a statement in which the simple of the earth may, if they like, put confidence.

Truly good ghost stories are very rare things, though they are so universally popular that one would suppose there would be much more done in this walk, to call it so, than there is. The demand is infinitely in excess of the supply. Miss Rose Terry has three in the July Galaxy, all interesting, and we do not know why not all true, in a way; still they do not properly congeal the blood. "An Evening with Swinburne" is a brief and rather dry account of an evening at a party, when Swinburne did some of the talking, saying some not very wise things—as that Walt Whitman was probably the second-best poet in the world, Victor Hugo being first, in Mr. Swinburne's opinion—and read, or intoned, some of his own poetry, a thing which he is fond of doing, they say, and which it is a curious and not unadulterate joy to hear him do. Z. F. P. gives an account, really readable and intelligible, even lively and attractive, of the observation of the solar eclipse last year by the American party that went out to Sicily with Professor Pierce of Harvard, and by the English party, headed by Mr. Lockyer. By an unfortunate mistake of the Galaxy's printer or proof-reader, Z. F. P. is made to do injustice to the English expedition: in the illustrations on page 192 there is a reversal of the two lower figures by which credit is given to Professor Watson, of Ann Arbor, Michigan, for the photograph of the corona which Mr. Brother succeeded in taking, and which was the great feat of the English expedition. "Signature Hunting" is a good specimen of a low form of padding.

In Lippincott's, "The Great War of 1870," by Edmond Scherer, is, perhaps, best, and "Our Monthly Gossip" of most interest. The former asserts, what few will be inclined to think precisely true, namely, that Bismarck is very thin-skinned and dreads newspaper criticism; and, furthermore—what may be true—that at Versailles he was very apprehensive of secret designs on his life, and kept himself closely guarded.

In the Overland there is a good story of the Vigilance Committee days of California, entitled "Robert Fairway's Disappearance," and a semi-poetic ghost story, which may be read, entitled "How I got the Pirate's Treasure." Rather funny is the article called "The Darwinian Eden," but, perhaps the writer hardly gets all the amusement out of it that he might.

The Catholic World laments the decay of mentality in Protestant England, finding the cause of its unhappiness in the fact that the British magazine is so poor an affair as it is. So much worse than Blackwood's, for example, in the days when Catholic Emancipation was under discussion? This is but a dangerous criterion of mentality to be set up by any of our American magazines, we fear, Catholic or Protestant. The fact of the matter would seem to be, that in poetry, history, and fiction, England is, just now, rather above her usual average since she has had any literary annals at all, and that in science also, as well as in poetry and fiction, she need not fear to enter the lists against any other country in the world.

Furthermore, the Catholic World says and maintains that the Hon. E. P. Hurlbut, of Boston, Mass., and the Rev. Dr. Bellows, of this city, are "from instinct and education, hearty haters of the Catholic Church," and that Mr. Hurlbut's "thought is the thought of a secularist," and that for this country "there is no hope under Protestantism." "There has been a sad falling off," it goes on to say, "in the virtue, the honesty, the integrity, the chastity, and the public spirit of our people in the last fifty years." Now why? Why, because "the old habits formed under Catholic discipline and influences are wearing out, if not worn out." This we confess seems to us childishness, and utterly unworthy of a magazine which is, indeed, from the nature of much of its subject-matter, compelled to teach much that we, of course, think unreason, but which has shown that it need not be gratuitously feeble.

MALDEN PUBLIC LIBRARY

Wake Robin. By John Burroughs. (Boston: J. R. Osgood & Co.)—Mr. Burroughs's "Wake Robin"—a graceful and appropriate title—belongs to the class of writings of which Mr. Thoreau and Col. Higginson have given us the best-known examples. The several papers of which it is composed were, many of them at least, first published in magazines for popular reading, and they are marked by the same combination of literary excellence and careful scientific observation which distinguishes the writings above-mentioned. Mr. Burroughs is not as practised a writer as Col. Higginson, nor has he his poetical imagination and wide range of illustration. He lacks, too, the originality and dry humor of Thoreau; on the other hand, he is more of a specialist than either of these, and possesses great quickness and accuracy of observation, and excellent powers of description. And he is truly fond of the woods, and goes into them to see them and not himself. The book will furnish entertaining reading for any intelligent lover of nature; and, more than this, it will be found perhaps the very best help for the beginner in the study of birds. It gives just the information which the beginner needs, and teaches him how to observe, as well by precept as by example. For the rambles and observations here described are next to an actual excursion with a trained ornithologist as a practical lesson in ornithology.

The first and last papers—"The Return of the Birds" and "The Invitation"—are those which will best serve as an introduction to the study of birds. "In the Hemlocks" is from first to last an admirable practical lesson in observation; "Bird's Nests" and "Spring at the Capital" are of the same general character, although the latter is of a rather rambling and, one is tempted to say, perfunctory character, containing, however, some excellent descriptions. The two other papers, "Adirondacs" and "Birch Browsings," are chiefly descriptive of life and adventure in the woods; both of them, the last especially, are capital reading.

Two or three extracts will illustrate our writer's style and methods of observation: "It seems to me that I do not know a bird till I have heard its voice; then I come nearer it at once, and it possesses a human interest to me. I have met the grey-cheeked thrush in the woods, and held him in my hand; still I do not know him. The silence of the cedar-bird throws a mystery about him, which neither his good looks nor his petty larcenies in cherry-time can dispel. A bird's song contains a clue to its life, and establishes a sympathy, an understanding, between itself and the listener" (p. 44).

"It is not in the woods alone to give one this impression of utter loneliness. In the woods are sounds and voices, and a dumb kind of companionship; one is little more than a walking tree himself; but come upon one of these mountain-lakes, and the wilderness stands relieved, and meets you face to face. Water is thus facile and adaptive, that it makes the wild more wild, while it enhances culture and art" (p. 82.)

"They [the larks] are walkers. This is a characteristic of but few of our land-birds. By far the greater number are hoppers. Note the track of the common snow-bird; the feet are not placed one in front of the other, as in the track of the crow or partridge, but side and side. The sparrows, thrushes, warblers, woodpeckers, buntings, etc., are all hoppers. On the other hand, all aquatic or semi-aquatic birds are walkers. The plovers and sandpipers and snipes run rapidly. Among the land-birds, the grouse, pigeons, quails, larks, and various blackbirds walk. The swallows walk, also, whenever they use their feet at all, but very awkwardly. The larks walk with ease and grace. Note the meadow-lark strutting about all day in the meadows" (p. 222).

It may be remarked that Mr. Burroughs speaks rather contemptuously of what Col. Higginson calls "that best of fowling-pieces, a small spy-glass." His rule is: "First, find your bird; observe its ways, its song, its calls, its flight, its haunts; then shoot it (not ogle it with a glass), and compare with Audubon. In this way the feathered kingdom may soon be conquered" (p. 209). Probably in this we find the difference between the professional ornithologist and the amateur.

The Rhododendron and American Plants. By C. S. Rand, Jr. (Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1871.)—We have got into the habit of expecting a new book on some horticultural subject from Mr. Rand every year; and as we are fond of all kinds of horticulture, in theory at least, we enjoy every new book as much as a novel, if it is well written, and shows that the author is really familiar with his subject.

No class of plants deserves a biographer more than the rhododendron, and other evergreens which are equally beautiful in leaf and flower. Most of us know the rhododendron and the kalmia by name as well as by sight; and many to whom the name suggests nothing will remember the shrubs with bright evergreen leaves which they have admired as they have crossed the Alleghany Mountains, or which they have seen from the car windows on the Pennsylvania or Reading Railroads, or by the side of some mountain lake in Vermont, or whose masses of pink blossoms invite old and young to festival and picnic in June amongst the hills of Worcester County, or by Salisbury Beach and the banks of the Merrimac, in Massachusetts. Whoever has seen and known them, and has even a small piece of land in the country, would like to have some to decorate his land. But it has been generally believed that they are very shy, and difficult to transplant and make grow, and with reason; for if carelessly handled, all the evergreen plants are very troublesome to manage. But, as Mr. Rand has shown in his treatise, they can be grown abundantly if their habits are studied, and the soil and circumstances made agreeable to their roots.

The bulk of this book is devoted to the rhododendrons, which, being the largest in size of plant and blossom, attract the most attention, and they have been so long cultivated and improved that the original varieties and species have been greatly increased. We learn that the few kinds commonly known—such as Rhododendron Ponticum, Maximum, and Catawbiense—are only samples of a family which has members in every climate and which grow in every soil, and under all circumstances; one, R. Dalhousie, being a parasite, almost an air-plant, growing on the branches of oak-trees, and expanding blossoms four inches in diameter. Another, R. Lapponicum, is a mere dwarf, being most suitable for an edging to flower-beds. R. Maximum sometimes grows to be a tree. Some are hardy in Alpine snows, others can only grow in the tropics or a hothouse.

Thus we see that no plant offers the amateur a wider or better field for the indulgence of his fancy. But whilst we, with Mr. Rand, give most of our notice to the chief of the class, we should not forget the laurel, kalmia latifolia, the favorite flower of June, whose wonderful profusion of bloom makes hill and mountain sides and wide plains brilliant with the most delicate and varied shades of rose and pink. As he enumerates the different plants of the same family, he mentions too slightly, we think, the Sedum latifolium or Labrador tea—a stout, hardy shrub with evergreen leaves, olive brown on top, with recurved edges, and covered with a kind of rusty wool or down underneath. This shrub covers the heaths of Maine and Canada, and grows equally well in swamp and on hillsides, and in June blooms very fully. Its tufts of white flowers and fragrant brown-green leaves make a beautiful combination with the rhodora and cotton grass, which at the same time cover wide areas with the most lovely carpet of purple and white.

Mr. Rand enumerates every plant evergreen, shrubby and herbaceous, which he thinks belongs or groups with the rhododendron and kalmia, and tells us where to get them and how they are best cultivated; and one sees, as he reads, that most of his statements and directions are the result of actual experience. Mr. Rand's collection of these plants is unsurpassed in this country, and every one who can should visit it, as he will there see how well the author has practised the lessons he teaches. We wish all the families of beautiful plants could find so earnest and faithful a biographer; for every one who reads such a book, if he never lives out of a city, becomes imbued with horticultural enthusiasm, and pledges his earliest earnings to the purchase and adornment of a country place.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Abbott (J. S. C.), History of Frederic the Great	(Harper & Bros.)
Carlyle (T.), French Revolution, Vols. 2 and 3	(Chas. Scribner & Co.) $0 90
Constable (H.), Duration and Nature of Future Punishment, swd.	(C. C. Chatfield & Co.)
Énault (L.), The Pupil of the Legion of Honor	(Porter & Coates)
Gibbon (C.), For Lack of Gold: a Tale, swd	(Harper & Bros.) 50
Hawthorne (N.), Scarlet Letter, and Blithedale Romance, 1 vol	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 2 00
Illustrirte Kriegs-Chronik, Part 19, swd	(B. Westermann & Co.)
Lyell (Sir C.), The Student's Elements of Geology	(Harper & Bros.)
Mac-Henry (G.), Time and Eternity: a Poem	(A. L. Bancroft & Co.)
Müller (O.), Charlotte Ackerman: a Tale	(Porter & Coates)
Norton (C. L.), American Sea-Side Resorts	(Taintor Bros. & Co.)
Rockwell (Rev. C.), Catskill Mountains and Vicinity	" "
Reade (C.), A Terrible Temptation, swd	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 50
The Second Armada, swd	(Porter & Coates)
The Workshop, No. 7, swd	(E. Steiger) 40
Valedictory Poem and Oration, Yale College, 1871, swd	(C. C. Chatfield & Co.)
Wallace (A. R.), Action of Natural Selection on Man, swd	" " "
What Happened after the Battle of Dorking, swd	(Geo. Routledge & Sons) 25
Walker (W. B.), Cyclical Deluges	(D. Appleton & Co.)

BOOKS FROM LONDON.

SEND TO

J. SABIN & SONS

For the last number of the AMERICAN BIBLIOPOLIST.

It contains, besides Miscellaneous Literary Matter, the continuation of the "History of Fort George," a List of New English Publications, and a Catalogue of new and second-hand Books offered at low prices.

WRITE US FOR A COPY.

A few of the Books for Sale.

BULWER'S NOVELS. 20 vols. 8vo, half-calf (published at $60), $27.

TAYLOR, B. Miscellaneous Works. 12 vols. 8vo, half-calf, gilt. N. Y., Putnam. $30.

MACAULAY, T. B. The History of England. 4 vols., bound in two in half-calf. Boston, 1853, $4.

THACKERAY'S WORKS. Complete. Tauchnitz edition. Nicely bound in half-morocco. 34 vols. $34.

DEANE. The Worship of the Serpent traced throughout the World. 8vo, half-calf, very scarce. London, 1833. $10.

Every designer or decorator should have a copy of our New Monogram and Alphabet Album. It contains over 1,000 examples of beautiful Monograms. Every Bookseller should send for one. Send for sample page. Prices, $6 50, $7 50, $8.

J. SABIN & SONS,

BOOKSELLERS AND IMPORTERS,

84 Nassau Street, New York, and 22 Buckingham Street, Strand, London.

NEW CLASSICAL COURSE.

GOODWIN'S GREEK GRAMMAR. $1 56.
" " READER. $2.
LEIGHTON'S " LESSONS. $1 25.
LIDDELL & SCOTT'S GREEK LEXICON ABRIDGED. $3.
LIDDELL & SCOTT'S GREEK LEXICON UNABRIDGED. $12.
ALLEN'S LATIN GRAMMAR, LESSONS, LEXICON PRIMER AND COMPOSITION, each $1 25.
ALLEN'S LATIN READER. $2 50. Consisting of selections from Phædrus, Cæsar, Curtius, Nepos, Sallust, Ovid, Virgil, Plautus, Terence, Cicero, Pliny, and Tacitus, with Notes and a General Vocabulary of Latin of more than 16,000 words. With references to Allen's, Harkness's, Madvig's, Bullions's, and Andrews and Stoddard's Latin Grammars.
MADVIG'S LATIN GRAMMAR. By Thomas A. Thacher, Yale College. $3.
OUR WORLD; or, First Lessons in Geography. 94 cts.
THE ATLANTIC PRIMARY ARITHMETIC. 50 cents.
THE LATIN VERB. 50 cents.
CRAIK'S ENGLISH OF SHAKESPEARE. $1 75.
HUDSON'S SCHOOL SHAKESPEARE. The first series includes "As You Like It," "The Merchant of Venice," "Twelfth Night," the two parts of "Henry IV.," "Julius Cæsar," and "Hamlet." The second series includes "The Tempest," "The Winter's Tale," "King Henry the Fifth," "King Richard the Third," "King Lear," "Macbeth," "Antony and Cleopatra."
SHAKESPEARE (in press): his Life, Art, and Characters, with a Historical Sketch of the Origin and Growth of the Drama in England. 2 vols.
OUR WORLD, No. II.; or, Grammar School Geography. (In press.)

GINN BROS., Boston, Mass.

HENRY K. VAN SICLEN,

BIBLIOPOLE,

133 NASSAU STREET

Catalogues sent on application.

Special attention given to orders by letter.

TOURISTS ON PLEASURE BOUND.

You want some entertaining book to help wile away a weary hour. Buy one of these:

HAMERTON'S THOUGHTS ABOUT ART, $2.

HAMERTON'S A PAINTER'S CAMP, $1 50.

GEORGE SAND'S MAUPRAT; ANTONIA; Monsieur Sylvestre; Miller of Angibault; Snow Man. Price of each, $1 50.

MRS. STOWE'S PINK AND WHITE TYRANNY, $1 50.

MISS ALCOTT'S LITTLE MEN; LITTLE WOMEN. 2 vols. An Old-Fashioned Girl; Hospital Sketches. Price per vol., $1 50.

BURNAND'S MORE HAPPY THOUGHTS; Happy Thoughts. Each $1.

A VISIT TO MY DISCONTENTED COUSIN, $1.

Sold everywhere. Mailed post-paid by the Publishers,

ROBERTS BROTHERS,

BOSTON.

PUBLISHED THIS DAY:

CHARLES READE'S LAST GREAT NOVEL.

A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION.

BY CHARLES READE.

Complete in one volume. Fully Illustrated.

Paper, 50 cents.

By special arrangement with the author of this story, which has excited a profound sensation in all portions of the world where the English language is read, the publishers are enabled to give the work complete in book-form simultaneously with its appearance in England, and in advance of its issue by any other publishers in this country.

"We all remember the commotion excited by 'Griffith Gaunt,' and 'A Terrible Temptation' presages a similar excitement in its behalf. It certainly exhibits some of the most brilliant qualities of Mr. Reade's genius. The author receives a handsome remuneration for his work, while at the same time the reading public in America enjoy the opportunity of reading the book at the same time as our cousins in England."—Boston Courier.

"The new story from the pen of Mr. Reade challenges the attention of novel-readers. The style is light and easy, progressing from point to point without a perceptible jar, and it will give many an hour of pleasant employment to the idlers of the coming summer."—Phila. Age.

"It opens in all the freshness and abounding sparkle of his style and the daring freedom and originality in which this author is conspicuous. All who enjoy a good, healthy, and delightful story of modern times should not fail to secure 'A Terrible Temptation.'"—New York Globe.

For sale by all Booksellers and Newsdealers. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price by the Publishers,

JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO.,

BOSTON.

E. P. Dutton & Co., 713 Broadway, New York, Special Agents for J. R. O. & Co.'s Publications.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL. The best evidence of the perfect safety of Pratt's Astral Oil is that from nearly a million gallons sold, no accident has occurred from its use, in any way, directly or indirectly. It is free from any explosive material, and perfectly reliable in every respect.

JUST PUBLISHED:

WHAT HAPPENED AFTER THE BATTLE OF DORKING.

Being an Account of the VICTORY AT TUNBRIDGE WELLS.

BY A VOLUNTEER OFFICER.

12mo, paper covers, price.....25 cents.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

PUBLISHERS,

416 Broome Street, New York.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form Libraries or enrich their Literary Collections, is respectfully invited to Harper's Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—COMPREHENDING OVER THREE THOUSAND VOLUMES—which are offered, in most instances, at less than one-half the cost of similar productions in England.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, etc., who may not have access to a trustworthy guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable for reference.

The Catalogue is arranged alphabetically by the authors' names, anonymous works by the titles. The index is arranged by the titles of the books, besides having numerous appropriate heads, each general head being followed by the title of every work on the subject. Persons desirous of obtaining information regarding any foreign land, will find under the name of the country the title of all books of travel, history, or biography relating thereto.

The Publishers believe this will meet a long-felt want.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books cannot be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will receive prompt attention.

Sent by mail on receipt of Six Cents.

Address

HARPER & BROTHERS,

Franklin Square, New York.

GAZZAM'S TREATISE

ON THE

BANKRUPT LAW.

SECOND EDITION JUST OUT.

For sale at all Law-Book Stores.

CASSELL'S POPULAR EDUCATOR.

COMPLETE IN SIX VOLUMES.

PRICE, $15.

"We have gone over its pages with sentiments of real wonder. We know no work like it. It has occupied and filled up a field of education vast and most important to the community."—Dublin University Magazine.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,

596 Broadway, New York.

SLAVE SONGS OF THE UNITED STATES.

A Unique Collection of Original Melodies—words and music—obtained among the negroes of the South; preceded by an account of these Songs, and an Essay on the Negro Dialect, as observed at Port Royal, by Prof. W. F. Allen, of the University of Wisconsin. Cloth, 8vo, price $1 50.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address

Publishers of "THE NATION,"

Box 6732, New York City.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, AUGUST 10, 1871.

The Week.

Not much that is new and at the same time important in relation to the Tammany frauds has come to light during the week. The Mayor's conduct still offers the same extraordinary spectacle. Apparently, he has not quite sufficient impudence to defy his accusers in silence; and not even in New York could even he dare to put in plain print full, true, and particular statements of what men of straw got how much money for such and such labor and such and such goods, the greater part of both goods and labor being imaginary, so he adopts the only other course left open to him, and now in this way, now in that, a new way with every morning, almost, he tries to fling dust in the eyes of the public, and after each failure tries once more. His last device is to cause the Comptroller to print a "public debt statement," the like of which he promises to publish every month hereafter, and most of which will have little or no value, it being so purposely confused and so destitute of particulars as to be baffling. Moreover, it differs from the Comptroller's other recent statements; and it and they, again, are different from the statements made in the Roberts-Taylor-Astor exhibit. In what it says of the total debt of the city and county it is tolerably intelligible, and it is anything but reassuring. This is the road we travel under the guidance of Mr. Tweed: In January, 1869, two years and a half ago, the total city and county debt was in round numbers $29,000,000. In October, 1870, less than a year ago, it was $55,000,000. In May of this year, three months ago, it was $82,000,000; and last week it had increased to $101,000,000.

Most, if not all, of this last increase of indebtedness, $19,000,000 in thirteen weeks, is due, of course, to the issuing of bonds anticipatory of the year's taxes. But for years now, a great portion of the tax money when it came in has been diverted from the payment of the city expenses to the building of stables, club-houses, country seats, sets of silver—one with the Marquis of Tweeddale's arms engraved on it—yachts, horses, velvets for summer wear, and large diamonds for the wives and daughters of our gang of refined and literate rulers; and the deficiency thus created has been filled up by the issue of bonds payable in the next year. They have not been so paid; on the contrary, more has been added. But bills get pressing, and at this point the Legislature steps in with a law of the Ring's devising fixing the amount of tax for a two-years' term; and when it is too difficult to negotiate revenue bonds based on the two-year tax, more legislation makes the "consolidated stock of 1901," into which can be dumped all outstanding revenue bonds, and the Ring, taking its breath easily again, may proceed at leisure to build some more club-houses and yachts. It is not such a wonder, when one is brought face to face with facts like these, that some people hastily regret the Know-nothing days, and call for political leagues between the American and German elements of our municipal population. After all is said about the corruption of the Republicans of this city—and some of them could beat Tweed if hypocrisy adds anything to the sinfulness of sin—it is nevertheless true that, were it not for the solid wall of Irish votes, genuine and other, which are cast by the order of Tammany; were it not for that main body of the enemy, the party of decency would be strong enough to circumvent at least the wings and detached columns of the hostile forces. Still, there the solid wall is, an essential element of the problem.

The tension which has for so long been manifested in the relations between Secretary Boutwell and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has at last culminated in the suspension of General Pleasonton, after he had declined to resign at the request of the President. His successor is Mr. J. W. Douglass, the late First Assistant-Commissioner. The public will be glad of this event for two reasons: first, because a very wearisome topic has thus been removed from the daily correspondence from Washington; and, next, because it was an anomaly and a scandal that such an antagonism could exist twenty-four hours in the most important department of the Government. This view must be held even by those who take sides in the controversy, since no such harm can come from General Pleasonton's displacement as from the uncertainty to which the business community was subjected by an open conflict of opinion touching the law and official authority, and the continued exposure of the weakness and inconsistency of our financial system. The last straw, apparently, which broke Mr. Boutwell's patience, was General Pleasonton's efforts to give a wide circulation to his late decision revoking the tax on the borrowed capital of bankers—a decision not at all to the Secretary's mind, though, if we were to judge the quarrel by this particular incident of it, we should unhesitatingly pronounce in favor of the retiring commissioner. General Pleasonton's course in declining to allow his disagreement with Mr. Boutwell to be treated as a personal matter, and his determination to stand by the law, seem to us very much to his credit. The President has yielded law and right to make things comfortable; while the Secretary's narrow obstinacy in considering but one thing—"Will this course get us more money?" and not, "Is this the law?" or, "Is this equitable?"—has been disagreeably conspicuous.

The Massachusetts Republicans are in a dignified position. They think they may be obliged to take Butler for their next governor; but they are not quite sure that it may not be necessary now, as things have gone, to give the nomination to Dr. Loring; or perhaps, if they could induce Governor Claflin to stand again, they might save themselves from the other two; or in case Mr. Washburne, of the western part of the State, could be brought forward in good strength in the convention, why, then Governor Claflin might be allowed to retire as he wishes, and Loring and Butler could still be got rid of. As for Mr. Harvey Jewell, he will nohow do, because "he said at Worcester that the intelligent women of Massachusetts do not wish for the suffrage," which saying is regarded by the other women as "an insult to the noble women engaged in this movement," and furthermore "to every man in Massachusetts who has a mother, wife, or daughter." As for the Prohibitionists, they are divided. The Rev. Dr. Marvin thinks "it will not do any longer to trust Christian men in politics," and wishes the brethren to go with one mind for Mr. Butler, who will "make it hot for the rumseller," as formerly, in New Orleans, for the rebel he made it hot; but others of the brethren do not see their way clear to endorsing the General, and prefer Christians. The Labor Reformers, for their part, are rather reticent, and are said to be of the mind to give their votes to Butler, and that gentleman's friends are hinting that if he does not get the regular nomination he may decide to lump together the Labor Reformers' vote, the Woman-men's votes—a host which no man has yet numbered—the votes of some Democrats—non-existent, we take it—and of a good share of the Prohibitionists, as well as some Republicans, whom he would draw away from Dr. Loring, or anybody else, in Essex County. Loring, meantime, has his friends, and has apparently succeeded in getting on his side the New York Tribune, which publishes a letter detailing the Doctor's claims. The tenth claim is that "every little farmers' club, post of the Grand Army of the Republic, and almost every organization in the State having for its object the welfare of man, has seen his face and heard his voice, and the whole people know him, and he knows them, and can call them by name." The eleventh claim is "that he combines a strong faith in the platform on which Grant was elected with an ardent desire for the welfare of labor, temperance, and woman suffrage." In other words, say his enemies, the Doctor is a small and timid demagogue, who for some years now has sedulously carried himself about the country, making ornate agricultural speeches whenever he could catch ten farmers together, and who has no convictions, or any, as may be required.

He has done so much and so piteous begging for the nomination that it would be a shame for the State should he get it.

But good observers appear to think it is to a gentleman answering to his creditable description that the party may feel compelled to give the nomination if they would escape Mr. Butler. This is the same Mr. Butler, by the way—the same high-toned Butler that our Massachusetts friends were so proud of a year or two ago. He is not in the least changed from what he was when our friend "Warrington," who now says he shall not be governor—which dictum, also from such a source, ought to cause a flush of pride and pleasure to the party—was so pleased with him. He is the same modest, honest, statesmanlike legislator as he was then; can be trusted just as far without guaranties; is as brave, and as truthful, and as much a credit to his friends, as useful to his country, and as uncostly as he was then. He is still the identical Butler who invented the one system of finance costlier to a country than repudiation—the system which regularly threatens it and never does it, and reaps all the disadvantages and none of the advantages of robbing the public creditor, and of which "Warrington" was rather warm in approval, if we recollect rightly. It is this in the present contest in Massachusetts that helps to give it a national interest. As for the theory which some of Butler's friends have started, that the result in Massachusetts will affect the national prospects of the party, that it will not do to imperil Grant's chances, and that therefore Butler must not be alienated—it is a theory which may undoubtedly be left with its originators and need not be adopted. Butler's success would be a bad thing, as it always has been before; Adams's success would be a blessing in comparison, and in more ways than one. But, doubtless, there will be no need of going outside of the Republican ranks for the next Governor of Massachusetts, even though we count back into the Democratic ranks, where they were no very long time since, both the blustering, cunning, rascally candidate from Essex, and the soft-spoken one who wants the nomination so much.

There have been three Southern elections of interest and significance during the week—in Kentucky, North Carolina, and South Carolina. The first was for Governor and State officers; and, though the Democratic ticket was entirely successful, the party majority was reduced to something like 20,000, and, it is asserted, would have been even less had the new colored voters not been hindered from the full exercise of their right of suffrage. The Democrats not only had nominated inferior candidates, but were, to some extent, divided among themselves over the "new departure," which was, however, repudiated by most of them. The Republicans feel that they have won a substantial victory, and that the present odds can be overcome with time and patience. In North Carolina the issue was, as our readers are aware, the ordering of a convention to revise the constitution. It was calculated to bring out the strongest vote of the Republicans, who saw in the success of their opponents the undoing of the work of reconstruction, and such a redistricting of the State as would effectually prevent it from giving its vote to a Republican President. The result appears to have been adverse to the convention, though the majority cannot yet be accurately stated, nor can it, we imagine, be inferred that those were necessarily Radicals who voted against a fresh disturbance of the legal foundations of the State. The Republicans, nevertheless, will reap all the moral advantages of the victory. The municipal election in Charleston ended in the complete triumph of the citizens' Conservative ticket, by a majority of nearly 800. The present not unpopular Mayor, Mr. Pillsbury, who would probably have been retained if the proportional-representation ticket, once talked of, could have been agreed on by the two parties, is succeeded by General John A. Wagner, a prominent German. The election and the counting of votes, which took place on separate days, were attended with a good deal of violence, in which, of course, the blacks had a large share. They had previously shocked the decent men of both parties by a disorderly torchlight procession, which the Charleston Republican estimates to have cost their ticket five hundred votes. The Republican, by the way, has conducted itself before and since the election in a very honorable and outspoken manner, the editor advising the scratching of certain disreputable names from the Radical ticket, and setting an example himself at the polls.

We had an impression, which we cannot now justify by reference to the proper sources, that one effect of the Taxpayers' Convention in South Carolina was to extort from the State Treasurer, Mr. Niles G. Parker, a promise of hearty co-operation with a committee which the Convention proposed to set to work at his books, in order to discover the truth or falsehood of the irregularities charged against him and the Legislature conjointly. We did not, for our part, believe that Parker would do anything of the kind, any more than we expect Hall and Connolly to make a clean breast of it when they offer to do so. In fact, there appears in the Charleston papers a letter from him to Mr. E. J. Scott, chairman of the Convention's committee, who, it seems, had applied to a legislative committee, regularly employed in examining the treasury accounts, for permission to join them, and had got the cold shoulder. Not taught by this rebuff, he had then sought Mr. Parker's approval of an independent examination, assisted by competent business men of Columbia, to be selected by the President of the late convention. Mr. Parker considers this "unparalleled presumption"; says if the legislative committee had consented to Mr. Scott's application, he, Parker, would have offered no obstacle; moreover, two previous committees of the Legislature, acting according to statute, had examined the Treasurer's accounts for 1868–70, and found everything straight, and he leaves, it to be inferred, the present committee may be trusted to whitewash as well as its predecessors. Finally, to grant Mr. Scott's request would be to open the door to all sorts of investigators, and thus "the office would be subjected to a great annoyance, and its business seriously retarded." Mr. Parker's faith in the ability and strict integrity of members of the Legislature is so great that Mr. Scott need hardly trouble himself to point out their utter disqualification for the task of overhauling accounts, and the worthlessness of any conclusion at which they may pretend to have arrived.

The principal item of news from the West—apart from Senator Morton's long speech, which was to the effect that the Democrats do not "depart," though they say they do, and that the country is satisfied with Grant—is concerning the squabble in Cincinnati about the observance of the Sabbath. Certain Germans wish the laws of the State to be so amended that they may be able to make of the day their Sunday, and sink all its Sabbatarian features. They present the usual arguments, as that no matter what the churches profess about the sinfulness of Sabbath work and Sabbath play, their only ground of calling work and play sinful on that day, which is not sinful on any other, is to be found in the Jewish Old Testament law, and that, tried by that law, the Sunday behavior of the church people themselves is frightfully wicked. To this the religious people reply by citing the statutes, and declining to go back of them, thus refusing to meet the Biblical issue. Furthermore, one of their organs, deprecating the wish expressed by some German to "Germanize and unpuritanize" this country, says that since the discussion began it has endeavored to conjure up a picture of what would have been the present condition of this country if, in place of the Pilgrim band that came over in the Mayflower, that vessel had been freighted with a crew of "Hassaurek's beer-jerkers"—waiters who carry beer to the customer—and gives us to understand that the picture of what would have been our condition in that case is depressing enough. Such discussions, no doubt, stir up some ill feeling; but doubtless are on the whole profitable. And meantime, as the people usually display the practical sense of making the law such as to satisfy the religious world, and of interpreting it, or neglecting to enforce it, in such a way as to satisfy the vast majority of the less religious part of the community, everybody may well be reasonably content, and not stand out for the formal logical correctness of the thing. Practically, Sabbatarianism is less rigid than it was twenty, or fifteen, or ten years ago, but it may well be doubted if the Sunday, the day of rest and of spiritual and other refreshment, has lost none of its hold on the minds or hearts of the race, or that it will lose any, though further modifications it is assuredly to undergo.

In the money market the only ripple of excitement has been caused by a spasmodic advance in some few of the leading speculative stocks, not unreasonably attributed to clique movements, since there is absolutely no other business doing in securities. Gold has advanced a trifle upon an unexpectedly large decrease in the supply in bank, but, as foreign exchange continues weak, the export of specie is quite limited. The movement of gold from England to France is now beginning to be apparent, the English bank losing five millions in a week, and the French bank gaining as much; but the extraordinary accumulation in the Bank of England, far exceeding anything known in its previous history, is too great to be affected by a change so slight. Nor has the change produced any effect upon the finances of this country, where the money of commerce continues abundant and cheap, at two to three per cent. per annum. Government bonds remain strong, aided by the very favorable exhibit of the national debt, which shows a reduction of nearly nine millions of dollars, on a very steady and regular movement which calls for no remark. Some discussion is still going on among mercantile men concerning the apparent buoyancy of the French, and the very evident depression of German, industry since the conclusion of peace; and the latent anxiety with which the English money market was at first regarded is now, to some extent, transferred to Germany. But the results of this last war set all calculations at defiance, and it may be that the French activity will prove as deceptive as many other French qualities and actions. The later correspondence, indeed, entirely destroys much of M. Thiers's rose-colored visions of finance, and the declining price of rentes confirms its truth.

Trade has continued dull, prices everywhere declining. Breadstuffs are now as low as in the period of greatest depression last spring; and meats and provisions are lower than they have been since the commencement of the war; and although, after such a steady decline, a reaction would seem natural, there are as yet no signs of it. Crop accounts are somewhat varying, but in the main favorable. For the smaller grains harvest weather has been excellent, and the promise for corn appears to be now very good. Cotton is likewise materially improved, and with favorable weather and continued liberal receipts from the old crop, the price has somewhat declined. Trade everywhere is quiet. From the coal regions complaint is universal. The Southern Atlantic States and the Far West are alike despondent. Many accounts concur in speaking of an eastward emigration, and it is evident that railroads are not spreading unmixed abundance over the great West. Real estate is dull and declining; the daily papers report thirty-one sales at the Exchange during the week, of which thirty were made by order of "the court," chiefly foreclosures. Yet very high rates of interest are said to have been recently again paid for mortgage loans.

There are some cheering signs of improvement visible in French affairs; but, on the whole, the situation is still far from being settled; and, at the best, France might be said to be in a state of transition not decidedly discouraging. The second half-milliard of the war indemnity has been paid off by M. Pouyer-Quertier, and the third is expected to be paid within a month or two, whereupon the German army of occupation will have to evacuate the Paris forts, and be confined, at its minimum rate of strength, to the provinces of Champagne and Lorraine. Its diminution is even now rapidly progressing, in spite of not unfrequent, and occasionally not unbloody, conflicts with French anticipators of the national revanche; while the captive French are reported to have all been sent home from Germany, with the exception only of some hundreds of sick, or persons imprisoned for offences. The national army of France is in every respect in a fair way of reorganization, and it must be acknowledged that, notwithstanding its manifold political proclivities, it has, as yet, betrayed no sign of an inclination to overstep its legitimate sphere, and lend itself as a tool to the machinations of either popular demagogues or princely pretenders. The formerly Imperial generals — MacMahon, Cissey, Ladmirault, Douay, and others—are evidently giving their earnest support to M. Thiers's trial of establishing the Republic through monarchists; and the old statesman is supple enough to accept, at the same time, with good grace, the co-operation proffered him by such Republicans par excellence as Gambetta and his admirer, General Faidherbe.

But while M. Thiers has no reason to complain of the army and its officers, he is still in a mood to quarrel with the majority of the Assembly; or rather, that majority, greatly reduced and still more demoralized by the elections of July 2, is very much inclined to quarrel with him, though circumstances do not allow it to do so in an open, defiant, and manly way. It has compelled him to give up Jules Favre, but the substitution for the latter, as Minister of Foreign Affairs, of Charles de Rémusat—an old political associate of the Chief of the Executive, and an esteemed philosophical writer—is no concession to the reactionary spirit which sent the unfortunate diplomatist back to his bar. The Right in the Assembly may check or frustrate the movement for a definite prolongation of M. Thiers's term of office which is going on among various fractions of the Left and Centre, but its power is too much on the wane, and the popularity of the future "Washington of France" too much in the ascendant, to admit of his overthrow by an opposition which, on account of its irreconcilable dissensions, is incapable of presenting a programme to the nation. That he dares to expose his popularity to violent shocks by opposing, from reasons of economy, such measures as the indemnification of the provinces by the state for losses sustained during the invasion, is decidedly creditable to the firmness with which he follows his own convictions in the trying position in which he is placed. It need hardly be said that the greatest difficulties he has to contend with are created by the financial questions, including the attempted, but very slowly progressing, remodelling of the tax and duty systems. What to do with the thirty thousand Communist prisoners, whose trial by courts-martial has finally been begun, is probably a question of little less magnitude and gravity. Nor is the state of Algeria reassuring.

Outside of France, there is a lull in the affairs of Continental Europe, though the political undulations caused by the late great movements have not entirely subsided. Austria—that is to say, its Cisleithan or western division—is perhaps the most deeply agitated. Hohenwart, the President of the Cisleithan Cabinet, is pushing his attempt at gently transforming the dualistic empire into a federal one with energy and rather surprising ability, and, a few weeks ago, won an eminent triumph in the Upper House of the Reichsrath, over a powerful array of talent mustered against him by the German party, among whose orators figured Count Anton Auersperg, Austria's greatest literary genius. The Hohenwart Ministry is strongly backed by the court, at least unopposed by Count Beust, and now unreservedly supported by the Poles, who expect to be the greatest gainers by the transaction. The ministerial negotiations with the Czechs—whose favor the court has exerted itself to win by sending the young Imperial Crown Prince on a tour through Bohemia—are still going on; and all eyes in the empire are at this moment turned in that direction. The principal leader of the Czechs, however—Dr. Rieger—is too reticent for public curiosity, and blamed for not imitating the frankness and outspokenness of Deák on the occasion of similar transactions in Hungary, some years ago. But the greater evil is that the political wisdom of the Czechs in general is as much inferior to that of the Hungarians as the statesmanship of their Rieger or Palacky has shown itself to that of Deák or of the lamented Eötvös; and it is apprehended that the "Young Czechs" will spurn the liberal offers now made them, in the vague and probably delusive hope of obtaining more through a threatening attitude and disloyal coquetting with Russia.

THE PROSPECT OF MUNICIPAL REFORM.

That the rich taxpayer shall keep a close watch on the public revenue is one of the clearest and most undeniable duties that he owes not only to himself, but, even in a higher degree, to his poorer fellow-citizen—to the man who pays his tax, not out of superabundance, but out of earnings for every dollar of which he has two uses, whose well-being is the well-being of the whole city, but who, almost invariably, is unpractised in the management of large and complicated business; whom, therefore, it is easy to cheat; who, even when he knows he is being robbed, has seldom the skill to perceive just where the fraud lies; and who is without the weight and influence to make himself feared and his wishes regarded. Every man of small earnings, every woman of scanty means who pays a tax, has a right to the vigilant protection of the bank president, the shipowner, the great trader and manufacturer; and these are in fact but little less than oppressors of the poor if they look on and allow criminal maladministration of the revenue. How they discharge their duty to their poorer fellow-citizens in this city, they have recently shown us; and we fear they have indicated to us how good hope there is of the much-talked-of reform in our financial affairs. For two years they have stood by and let the city revenues be managed by men who, to speak entirely within bounds, would, whether honest or not, render no account of their receipts and expenditures, although the law requires regular accounts, and although the custom of trade, the immemorial usage of civilized society, and one of the foremost of moral canons requires, even in the absence of statutory enactment, that every person handling other people's money shall frequently, or when called upon, render full, true, and just accounts of it, neglect or refusal to do so at once and fairly raising strong presumption of fraud. Yet over this shameful violation of the poor taxpayer's rights no rich man raised his voice, and of all the press of the city there was only one newspaper which made much disturbance about it.

And this is not all; nor the half. By-and-by the presumptive defaulter, on finding that his failure to account is bringing his party into discredit, comes to half-a-dozen leading citizens with the request that they shall call in at his office, look at his books, and certify that they are all right. The leading citizens did not say to him that by his own act he had brought himself under vehement suspicion of embezzling the public money; they did not show him the door, and inform him that the way, and the only way, for him to purge himself was to do his plain duty as enjoined on him, and file his accounts; but they accepted his invitation, went down and made a slight examination of one department of his office; looked in the safe at some bonds which not a man of them could swear were not borrowed for an hour from a neighboring bank, and then they signed a certificate saying that the Comptroller's accounts were correct, and he a good and faithful public servant. These gentlemen, of whom one was a bank-president, were all men of immense wealth, were all accustomed to business, and they one and all must have known perfectly well that their examination was farcical, and that their act was false to the duty they owed their fellow-citizens. At all events, they were all men of mature age, and they must have recollected perfectly well the examination that was made some twelve years ago, when, at the accession of Mayor Tiemann, there being cause to suspect defalcation in the Comptroller's office, the Mayor ordered an investigation. On that occasion, the examination—undertaken by Mr. Abram S. Hewitt, with other gentlemen—lasted, not a few minutes, but six laborious months; and the result of it was the detection of malfeasance, not the whitewashing of an official who a few months afterwards stands silently confessing his complicity in enormous thefts.

Great outcry is now made in view of recent disclosures, and weighty signatures are appended to calls for public meetings, and there is talk of more committees, but we confess we, for our part, can see only too little reason why the poor citizen should put much of his trust and confidence in his rich neighbor, or look forward with much hope to the result of the agitation that is going on. Reform is needed, heaven knows; but that we have got much to reform with is anything but clear. There was a plain enough case before. Not everybody admitted, indeed, but we may safely say that everybody knew, with moral certainty, that the city treasury had long been, and was then, regularly robbed, to put it simply, by a certain half-dozen men, of whom the suspected official was one. And the committee was composed of eminently respectable men. It did not lack business ability, nor good standing, nor piety even. It was not all Democratic. In fact, one of its members is a very prominent Republican, who, at only the last election, was warmly supported as a candidate for a Republican nomination for the governorship, and who, undoubtedly, still has "claims on the party," which we shall yet see pushed—in which case we are free to say that it will become the duty of his opponents to remind themselves of the particular claim on the party constituted by the action on which we have been commenting. Not, for that matter, that he is alone among Republicans, or that his action, on that occasion, is by any means the worst that is to be alleged against members of his party in this city and State. Regularly each year, at Albany, a sufficient number of Republicans are bought to carry through the required Tammany measures, and in this city we have in perpetual activity the Tammany Republican gang, with its General Committee, which no convulsion of the party seems able to dispose of finally, which is in full communion with Tweed, and which makes and unmakes United States Senators and Representatives. Pretty nearly the one sign anywhere visible, giving any hope that there may be deliverance for the city at the hands of the Republican party itself, is that, while the whole Democratic press of the State, with hardly an honorable exception, is devoting itself to the business of showing that there have been no frauds in Comptroller Connolly's office, or that, if there have been, they were Radical frauds, the Republican press is firm in exposure and denunciation of them. Of course, there is in this denunciation plenty of rather hollow indignation, which, were the Comptroller a Republican defaulter instead of a Democratic, would not make the writers' breasts very uncomfortably hot. But leaving aside all assertions as to the relative morality of the two parties, this, at least, has been effected, that throughout the State, among Democrats and Republicans in the rural districts, the facts of the immense defalcations are made known, and there is, in consequence, a better prospect than there has been for years that a majority of the Legislature will be composed not only of honest men, but of men determined to take away from the City Government some of its power to plunder. The prospect is not a very cheering one, to be sure; the fact still remains that in this city the intelligent men are so engrossed in business, and successful business, that a moral interest in politics they will not take; and the other fact, that behind Connolly and Sweeny there is an immense constituency of their degraded and ignorant countrymen, and an unequalled machinery of fraud. Still, there is some considerable disgust with Tammany among the kind of Democrats who are Democrats from intellectual conviction, and not, as many of our Republican editors, even clever ones, conceive all Democrats to be—namely, from a moral nature in decay and an intellect in total darkness. Among the German Democrats in particular there is a disgust and indignation which will, we have no doubt, be really appreciable at election time. And among the Republicans in general, just at the present moment, the repute of the Tammany variety of Republicans is very low.

We may, then, get a sound legislature, and, having got it, there may be a possibility of devising new restrictions that may somehow help us somewhat. To this end—whether or not Connolly be ever punished, and whether or not Hall be still elected over us, and Tweed still appointed over us—it is well, doubtless, that agitation should go on, public meetings be held, committees appointed, investigations made. How much may come of the investigations it will be time enough to say when they are made—and, we may add, made not at Mayor Hall's invitation. This at least should be decided upon by whatever honest and honorable men—if any such will have anything to do with the matter—undertake to examine the accounts: that as they are not, if they can help it, going to make any whitewashing report, so, too, it must be expressly understood from the beginning that, in consenting to serve as a committee to get out of Hall and Connolly what information those persons may vouchsafe, they do not for a moment say that the game of now and again calling in a committee from the outside is not in itself a whitewashing operation; and that their action must be taken as supplementary to the regular publication of full, true, and frequent accounts, and is in no respect to be held as a substitute for such publication, nor as dispensing Connolly for another couple of years. Whatever the examination may bring forth, it will be as well to guard the honor of the committee.

THE LATEST DECISION IN ERIE.

THE courts of the United States have a twofold jurisdiction. The first class embraces controversies in which the jurisdictional fact is the nature of the subject-matter itself. Among these are cases arising under the Constitution, under laws of Congress, or under treaties. The second class embraces controversies in which the jurisdictional fact is simply the residence of the parties litigant, and it extends to all kinds of subject-matter, national and local. Among these are suits between citizens of different States, and between citizens of a State and foreigners. It is sometimes supposed that a suitor, afraid to venture into the State courts, if he can obtain a hearing in the United States tribunals, is sure to find therein the correct application of sound law, the justice and equity which may be denied him elsewhere. He will certainly, in the great majority of instances, find judges able, independent, fearless, controlled by no powerful combinations or gigantic corporations, uncorrupted and incorruptible by money bribes or by political influence. He will not, in general, however, find any different exposition or application of the law. In all cases where jurisdiction depends solely upon the residence of the parties, the subject-matter must, of necessity, grow out of, and depend upon, the local State law, either statute or judicial. The court in rendering judgment is simply expounding and applying this State system, and by the general theory of its powers must be controlled by the precedents which the State tribunals have established. This rule of practice, which is always acted upon, even by the Supreme Court of the United States, must apply with a special emphasis to the construction of State statutes. When the State judges have given an authoritative and solemn interpretation to any such statute, they have furnished a guide to the national judiciary which the latter are bound to follow in all cases depending upon the same provision. The English stockholders in the Erie Railway Company have just been made victims to this principle—much, we presume, to their own surprise and disgust. As their case has an importance far beyond the mere private rights involved, as it affects the financial operations of the country, we purpose to enquire whether the rule was properly applied to them, and whether the decision of Judge Blatchford was correct.

It will be necessary to recapitulate a few facts, which are, doubtless, well known to our readers. Certificates representing a little over 60,000 shares of stock in the Erie Railway were, for purposes of convenience, transferred to Messrs. Heath and Raphael, of London, and sent to this country in the care of an agent. The officers of the company, however, refused to transfer the shares upon the books, so that they could be made available. An action was also commenced by the company, in the Supreme Court of the State, against Messrs. Heath and Raphael, and their agent, involving the use of these shares. Upon an ex-parte application in this suit, Mr. Justice Barnard appointed one Coleman a receiver of the shares, and delivered the certificates into his custody. We described the remarkable performances of this gentleman in a recent article, illustrating the new profession of receiver. It appears that after having voted upon the stock at an election of directors, he surrendered about 30,000 shares, and took back a certificate to himself, which he has carefully preserved, as though it had any commercial value. The officers of the company, however, issuing duplicate certificates purporting to represent the same shares, procured them to be registered with the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company—which alone gives them a negotiable character upon the Street—and threw them upon the market. The corresponding amount of stock in the hands of Coleman, but, in reality, belonging to English owners, was thus rendered valueless. The suit was subsequently transferred to the United States Circuit Court. The foregoing facts having been developed in a proceeding set on foot by Heath and Raphael, Judge Blatchford has very properly ordered the company and its officers to procure the stock in the hands of Coleman to be registered. This simply means that the company shall make good to the English owners the property which had been abstracted, and shall replace the shares which had been made valueless—the mere simulacra of shares—by other and genuine certificates, possessing a transferable and commercial character. The directors of the company proposed to do this by creating 30,000 shares of new stock, issuing certificates therefor regular on the face, and delivering them to the receiver. The Englishmen naturally objected to this convenient plan. Disliking a complete destruction of their property by the process of confiscation, they equally disliked a partial destruction by the process of watering. They, therefore, commenced a suit in the United States Circuit Court against the company and its directors to restrain the proposed creation of new stock. Judge Blatchford has now denied the plaintiffs' motion for an injunction, holding that the power of the directors depends upon the interpretation to be given to a statute of New York, and that the decisions of the State Court in Belmont against the Erie Railway (52 Barbour 637), and in Jenks against the Central Railroad, unreported, furnish him with controlling precedents.

What is the statute which thus permits the directors of a railroad corporation to create new stock at pleasure, even to replace that belonging to stockholders which they had confiscated and converted to their own use without a shadow of legal or moral right, and by a most gross act of fraud, which they did not even attempt to justify when called to an account, except by pleading their great and pressing needs for money? The General Railroad Act of 1850 is made applicable to the Erie Company. Section 9 permits the capital stock of a corporation to be increased by the concurrent act of two-thirds of the stockholders, and carefully prescribes the methods by which a meeting shall be called and held for this purpose, and a vote taken. Section 28 enumerates the powers of railroad corporations. By subdivision two, they are empowered "from time to time to borrow such sums of money as may be necessary for completing and finishing or operating their railroad, and to issue and dispose of their bonds for any amount so borrowed, to secure the payment of any debt contracted by the company for the purposes aforesaid; and the directors may confer on any holder of any bond issued for money borrowed as aforesaid the right to convert the principal due or owing thereon into stock of said company, under such regulations as the directors may see fit to adopt." Unless this clause confers authority upon the Erie directors to create the 30,000 shares of new stock, through the means of convertible bonds, such authority confessedly does not exist at all. A judicial or rather semi-judicial construction has twice been given to this language. The first instance was in the notorious case of Belmont v. the Erie Railway. In that suit, brought by a stockholder, an injunction had been granted restraining the company from issuing new stock, and a receiver had been appointed. A motion was subsequently made by the company, before Judge Cardozo, holding a Special Term, for a rehearing of the original application. He reheard it, reversed the former action of another judge, dissolved the injunction, and revoked the receiver's appointment. The matter was completely disposed of, and the motion was avowedly decided by him, upon considerations and grounds having no connection whatever with the statute, or with the powers of directors to create new stock. After having thus determined the case, and directed the order to be made, he proceeded to give, what he declared in express terms to be unnecessary, his opinion upon the statute. He found in it an authority for the directors "in a proper case" to give bonds for money borrowed for purposes mentioned in the statute, and to permit those bonds to be converted into stock, even though the amount of capital authorized by the charter was full. He added, however, "I do not doubt if the court were satisfied that bonds were about to be issued by the directors of the corporation, not for the payment of moneys actually borrowed for the purposes authorized by the statute, but as a part of a fraudulent device to increase the stock, the issuing of them might be restrained by injunction."

But the very admissions made by Judge Cardozo show that his opinion, broad as it is, does not cover the case of the English stockholders. The directors of a railroad may "borrow such sums of money as may be necessary for completing and finishing or operating their railroad," and may issue bonds "to secure the payment of any debt contracted by the corporation for the purposes aforesaid." These bonds may be converted into stock. Judge Cardozo expressly concedes that all these conditions must be fulfilled, or else the creation of new stock would be illegal, and would be enjoined. It is enough to say that, in the case before Judge Blatchford, the directors have borrowed no money at all which is to be secured or repaid by the 30,000 shares of new stock which they are about to issue. But even if they had borrowed the actual cash, and had given their bonds therefor, such money was not obtained nor used "for completing and finishing or operating their railroad." The meaning of "completing and finishing" is plain. "Operating" can only signify the carrying on the road as a means of transit. The clause says "operating the railroad" in connection with "completing and finishing" it. The directors are not authorized to borrow money and give convertible bonds for the purpose of operating the company. If, therefore, any cash was actually borrowed, it was not obtained for the purposes contemplated by the statute, the conditions upon which convertible bonds may be issued were not fulfilled, and the case falls precisely within the terms of Judge Cardozo's exception.

Judge Blatchford says that he is bound by this decision. We answer, in the first place, that if it was a decision he would not be bound by it. The opinion of a single judge, sitting at Special Term, not given upon the trial and as the basis of a final judgment, but upon a motion for a preliminary injunction, does not establish the law. It is not conclusive even upon the same judge himself nor upon his fellows, when the facts are afterwards presented in a more formal manner for their examination. Much less does it establish and fix the law of a State so as to be imperative upon the national judiciary. We must remember that, if Judge Cardozo has, in his offhand manner, given the rule to the United States Circuit Court, he has also given it to the Supreme Court at Washington. But, in the second place, Judge Cardozo made no decision upon the statute. It is well known that there had been a bitter personal contest among the Supreme Court judges over the Erie Railway, into which Judge Cardozo entered with all the vehemence of his nature. What he said in reference to the statute, after he had heard and decided the motion before him, was not addressed to the parties, nor to their counsel, nor to the merits of the controversy; it was a blow aimed at some of his brethren upon the bench, similar in spirit and design to that recently given by him to his colleague, Mr. Justice Brady. It was no judgment, no judicial decision; it was the opinion of Albert Cardozo, and is no more binding upon Judge Blatchford than would be the opinion of any other member of the New York bar, expressed under similar circumstances.

If Judge Blatchford's position is correct, we reach this most astounding result: The officers of a railroad corporation, having through fraudulent means obtained the physical possession of stock certificates belonging to private shareholders, and so endorsed as to be transferred by delivery, may surrender the same, and procure others to be issued to themselves or to their agents, to be thrown upon the market, and to be sold to bona-fide purchasers. The directors of the company ratifying this act of gross fraud and spoliation, may, under pretence of borrowing money "necessary for completing and finishing or operating their railroad," issue bonds to themselves as individuals, convert them into stock, and offer the new shares, depreciated by this process, to their defrauded constituents, and these latter will have obtained all the redress which the law affords. If this be the law of New York, foreign capitalists may well be shy of New York investments.

CHAMBORD'S SUICIDAL MANIFESTO—THE DUC DE CHARTRES.

PARIS, July 21, 1871.

TOLD you in my last letter that the elections held in many parts of France had been in reality a verdict against the Count de Chambord. Since they took place, the last Bourbon has left Bruges, where he has been living lately, and made a short appearance at the old castle of Chambord. He found it deserted and dilapidated; only a few foresters and servants were advised of his presence. When it was known, many of the old nobility of Touraine came to pay their respects to the man whom they always have considered their king. As the Legitimists had shown a great readiness to abrogate the laws of banishment passed against the Orléans family, and forced this act of justice on M. Thiers, who was very reluctant to open the doors of France to the sons of King Louis Philippe, the Count de Paris, inspired by a feeling of gratitude, offered to pay a visit to the Count de Chambord, to thank him, in the name of all his family, for the support the Legitimist party had given to the Orléans. A message to that effect was brought to M. de la Ferté, an old and confidential adviser of the Count de Chambord, by Count Jarnac, who is well-known in England, where he was a long time at the French Embassy, under Louis Philippe, and married a sister of Lord Foley. M. de la Ferté was quite moved by the proposition of the Count de Paris, but a few days afterwards he returned this singular answer in the name of the Count de Chambord: "The Count could not see his cousin immediately; he must first go to France, where he was about to issue a manifesto on very important political questions. If his cousin wished to see him afterwards, he would be happy to meet him at Bruges, in Belgium."

The Legitimists of the Chamber were much distressed by this answer and by the announcement of a manifesto, as the first manifesto issued by the Count de Chambord contained very imprudent declarations about Italy and the Papacy. When the Count arrived at Chambord, they sent to their chief their most important men, Bishop Dupanloup, M. de la Rochefoucauld, M. de Falloux, M. de Maille, M. de Cumont, and M. de Meaux, the son-in-law of Montalembert. Every effort was made to hinder the Count de Chambord from issuing his new manifesto; but these efforts were vain. The manifesto appeared, and a more imprudent challenge of all the rights of France could not have been made. The Count de Chambord has wounded the feelings of France, and chosen, as it were, the tenderest place where he could thrust his sword. It was not enough for him that the two monarchical parties should be ready to unite and choose him as a sovereign, he was not contented with his historical right, he claimed a divine right; he did not remember the words of Bellegarde to Henri IV., "Out of France there is no king of France." He called himself Henri V. before the Assembly offered him the crown. In the late war, all the Legitimist gentry fought under the tricolor; he throws it aside, and says that he will return with only the white flag. This was not only a mistake in politics, as the flag is always the symbol of the national life—it was a historical mistake. The old French flag was, till the time of the subjugation of France by England, a red flag with a cross, something like the present English flag. It was abandoned because it so much resembled the English flag; but Jeanne d'Arc's oriflamme was not white; the white flag was that of the Protestants during the wars of religion. Henri IV., when he became king of France, preserved it; but down to the French Revolution, there were in reality two flags in every regiment, one white with the lilies, the other red with the cross of Burgundy.

But it is useless to discuss such a question from a historical point of view; politically, the white flag represents the principle of absolute monarchy; the tricolor represents the great principles of '89, which are not incompatible with the existence of a constitutional monarchy. By his defence of the white flag, it looks almost as if the last French Bourbon means to make himself impossible. He cannot have much love for a country in which Louis XVI. was beheaded and his own father stabbed; but he might have had some pity for that respectable party which has remained faithful to him for forty years, and which discovers now that it was tied to something which has no life, and which does not wish to live. If the Count de Chambord did not desire the crown, he ought to have invited his followers to transfer their allegiance to the Count de Paris. But he quitted his country in two days, leaving behind him only a document which does not absolve his followers from their loyalty, and which at the same time is quite unacceptable by the country at large. When the manifesto appeared, the Count de Falloux said: "The Count de Chambord has killed the king, we must not allow him to kill royalty." An embassy of the most important Legitimists of the Chamber was therefore sent to the Count de Paris; they thanked him for his abnegation and for the readiness he had always shown to subordinate his own claims to those of his cousin, if the majority of the country thought it best to unite all the Conservative forces on the name of the last Bourbon, but begged him not to call on the Count de Chambord, at least for the present, as his visit might imply an adherence to principles and ideas which they could not share themselves.

A handful of Legitimists will remain in France, like the old Jacobites of England, but you may consider the great majority of the party as now gained over by the Orleanists. Of course they cannot be very loud nor very ardent supporters of the younger dynasty; but they will probably some day be counted among the best, as the ranks of the Legitimist party are filled with many country gentlemen of good fortune who are not vulgar politicians, and have more independence of character than the generality of our parliamentary veterans.

Meanwhile, we remain in this extraordinary state: we are a republic without republicans, and a monarchy without a monarch. The Count de Paris is living in Paris as he would in New York or in Boston. His younger brother, the Duc de Chartres, is no longer Captain Chartres, as he was in the days of your war—he is Major Chartres. He entered the army, as you probably know, during our war with Germany, under the name of Robert Lefort. He gave himself out as born in America of French parents. His great knowledge of military matters, his proficiency in the English language, everything was explained by his comrades with one word, "He is the Yankee captain." He was promoted to the rank of major by Gambetta, who did not know who he was, and made at the end of the war a Knight of the Legion of Honor. He took part in defining the lines of the armistice, and astonished the German officers by his knowledge of German. His wife was then in England, but, in order to keep his secret, he spent many weeks without writing to her or receiving letters from her. He had more money and better horses than his friends; but was not his father in New York rich enough to send him good hunters and good cigars? But his position in the army is still irregular; and, in order to have a regular commission, he has been obliged to offer to go to Algiers. His children have not yet crossed the Channel; his young and charming wife has only enjoyed for a few days the just popularity of her husband; and, next week, Major Chartres will go to Constantine, to join a regiment of cavalry. Surely everybody must admire so much energy and good-will, nor shall feelings of personal friendship hinder me from praising it, especially as these lines will probably never make their way to Constantine. But I have thought that it would be interesting for all Americans to know what has become of Captain Chartres, who was one of the first volunteers, with his brother, in the great war against secession, and who has always preserved the greatest interest in the welfare of the United States.

GERMAN AUSTRIA—ALSACE—PEACE CELEBRATIONS.

BERLIN, July 22.

HAVING been out of town for the last eight weeks, I did not witness the triumphal entry of our troops into the capital, or participate in any of the festivals which took place on the days preceding and following their reception. I spent my time in German Austria and Saxony, and on the Rhine, between Cologne and Strassburg. In my letter to-day, I propose to lay before your readers those impressions and observations which seem to me of more general interest.

I had to travel much in German Austria, and to deal with all classes of the people. The fertility of the land, the mildness of the climate, and the easy way of living, remind one more of a southern country. As Berlin, in comparison with Vienna, is only a poor upstart, so the German provinces of Austria are Gardens of Eden compared with the sterile and sandy plains of Northern Germany. But this natural disadvantage turns out a moral and economical advantage to our people. While the Austrians are indolent, lazy, and given to all kinds of amusement, the North-Germans are industrious, sober, and thrifty. Far from being stupid or even slow, the Germans of Austria are intelligent, quick, and witty, but undisciplined and irreverent in the highest degree. There is very little intellectual life in them. Since Emperor Ferdinand II. (1619–1637), with his Jesuits and cuirassiers, eradicated Protestantism in these his hereditary provinces—nine-tenths of them were Lutherans 250 years ago—the intellectual progress of German Austria has ceased; she is a priest-ridden country, and her development is much behind that of the Protestant German provinces. Whatever may be said to the contrary, for the Teutonic nations Protestantism is the conditio sine qua non of all intellectual and physical progress.

The stupid policy of the present Government, which tries to reconcile and win over a small numerical majority at the expense of a large minority of intellectual and financial strength, which patronizes the Czechs, Slaves, and Hungarians, and on every occasion wounds the feelings of the Germans, drives the latter into the arms of the new Empire. The coquetry of the Hohenwart ministry with Poles and Czechs will not hold the monarchy together, but tends to hasten its dissolution. A free Galicia must excite the distrust and jealousy of Russia, and a free Czechia, which, even before having been called into existence, threatens to annex the few Slavish countries of Prussia, as for instance Lusatia (Lausitz), cannot and will not be tolerated by Prussia. I had ample occasion to witness the prevailing spirit in the large cities, in Vienna, Prague, and Brünn, where pre-eminently the educated and wealthy classes are deadly opposed to the present Austrian rule. The rise of the new German Empire is greeted by our Austrian countrymen with the same enthusiasm as by all other Germans living abroad. Being in a minority at home, they hailed the German victories over the French as harbingers of their own better future, and of a prouder position among the semi-civilized tribes which together constitute the majority of the Austrian population. The Vienna press, on the occasion of the Berlin festivals, had as warm, if not warmer, articles congratulatory of the great results of the war, than the Berlin papers, which, by the way, in every respect are far inferior to their Viennese contemporaries.

"Why did not Bismarck take us in 1866? We were all ready to join you," was a most common remark made to me by leading political men. When I told them that, as far as I knew, not one intelligent German, and Bismarck last of all, had such an idea; that it would be a great misfortune for both parties if the natural development of things were unduly accelerated; that the new German Empire was not yet strong enough to swallow and digest eight millions of Catholics and three millions of Bohemians, they admitted the correctness of my reasoning, but complained of the hopelessness of their own case. I trust that Austria will hold together for at least a generation or two, but I cannot help saying that, in my opinion, she has already entered upon her liquidating process. The winding-up of a large house takes, of course, more time than that of a small one, but dissolution is sure to come; it has been decreed by the Government itself. If, according to Alexander Hamilton, a nation without a national government is an awful spectacle, a nation inspired with distrust and contempt towards its own government offers a still sadder spectacle. This is the case in Austria. I was struck with hearing financiers, lawyers, noblemen, officers of the army, in short, all sorts of conservatives, speak in the same derogatory tone of their government. They do not desire a revolution, but they are all eager for the breakdown of the empire. "The present dynasty," remarked a witty gentleman, "is a necessity for Austria, but with it Austria is an impossibility." I saw the Emperor and the court at the solemn procession on the "Corpus Domini" celebration. Francis Joseph looks rather dull and worn-out, but there is more good-nature in his features than wickedness. The long line of princes, magnates, and priests, in their official mediæval costumes, and the profusion of dress and diamonds, gave the impression of a masquerade or fancy-dress ball. Geographical conditions, political tradition, and the vis inertiæ hold this empire together; it does not know yet upon which side to fall.

At Strassburg I spent only two days, too short a stay to give you an impartial statement of the condition of affairs in the newly conquered provinces. From what fell under my personal observation, I judge the people are very far from being reconciled with the new German rule. This is quite natural in itself. It took more than fifty years for the Rhenish province of Prussia to become practically German, and it had not been separated from us more than twenty years. Just because the Alsatians are so pre eminently German in their character, it will take a generation or two before they will have overcome their prejudices against the mother-country. The statements of the official papers are to be received with great caution; they are all instructed to paint the Alsatian feeling in rose-color. Prussian officers with whom I dined told me that at night they are not safe in going alone through the streets, as they are stabbed from behind. They are even ordered to pocket the insults offered them at almost every step, as the Government does not want to increase the bad feeling. This is a very bad policy, fraught with the worst consequences. Prompt and stern justice, and punishment of every crime, are the only means of making the new Government respected and strictly obeyed, while untimely leniency is interpreted as weakness by the mass of the conquered people. Under the present regulations, the Prussian soldiers are laughed at, for the populace know that they are forbidden to revenge themselves, but they stand in awe of the Bavarians, whom the Strassburgers call the "blue devils" (on account of their light-blue uniform). These men are allowed to give vent to their feelings when they are attacked, and their officers, instead of being ordered to punish them, turn aside or pay no attention when their soldiers kick and cuff. The consequence is that the Bavarians are much more respected in Strassburg, and that they seldom have any quarrel or fight. The German governor, Count Bismarck-Bohlen, a very humane man, will soon find out that lenity will not do, and will be compelled, by the attitude of the Strassburgers, to resort to stronger and harsher measures. At some of the hotels the Germans meet with all sorts of petty annoyances. At mine, the landlord did not want to change a Prussian double Frederic d'or (about $7 90 gold) except at a discount of two francs; the German gold, he said, was not half as good as the French, and he only came to terms when I told him that I would drive to police headquarters and submit the case to the chief.

In all other parts of Germany there is not a town which, within the last four weeks, has not celebrated the triumphal entry of its troops, which had not its white-clad maiden of honor, who presented addresses, poems, and laurel or oak wreaths to officers and men, its banquets with corresponding patriotic toasts and good wishes for the stability of the peace bought at so dear a price. I have not heard of any discord on these occasions; everything went on smoothly and enthusiastically. I happened to witness the festivals of Frankfort and Mentz. Imagine Frankfort four years ago, dissatisfied, grumbling, cursing, submitting with the worst possible grace to a hard but well-deserved fate, and turning the cold shoulder to everything that was North-German and Prussian, and mark the contrast now: a bust of Emperor William or Bismarck—"our Bismarck," said an old Frankfort financier to me—or Moltke in almost every window; the new black, white, and red flag of the Empire floating much oftener in the air than Frankfort's favorite black, red, and gold; the Goddess of Victory surrounded by the statues of Prussian uhlans and hussars; every house and door decorated with patriotic German mottoes; even the Exchange closed, to give the bulls and bears an opportunity of mingling with the joyous crowd; music in the streets, hurrahing and cheering for United Germany; the princes of the Exchange talking, laughing, and drinking with the private soldiers; in short, the new Empire everywhere and the old Republic of Frankfort nowhere—it was a strange and gratifying spectacle! On the Rossmarkt, under the statues of Gutenberg, Faust, and Schoeffer, I noticed a Prussian, a Bavarian, and a Saxon soldier sitting with locked arms, complimenting each other, as hearty and friendly as if they had known each other from their boyhood. All the old differences and animosities had been effaced by a short year of common hardship, heroism, and success. In going home to my hotel, I passed the Goetheplatz, and looking up and bowing reverentially to the statue of the great poet and thinker, I could not help repeating Mephistopheles' words:

"Blut ist ein ganz besondrer Saft."

At Mentz, I observed the same hearty enthusiasm. What I witnessed this time formed a strange and noble contrast to what I had seen there in 1848, when citizens and soldiers were opposed to each other, when the overbearing conduct of the latter led to bloody conflicts, which were fought out in the streets with sabres, firearms, and clubs. This time, the daughters of these same old democrats presented flowers and bouquets to the officers and men of the triumphant army, who were their friends, kinsmen, brothers, and cousins; and the old democrats themselves opened their hospitable houses to the rank and file. One of them, Mr. Ad. Kuppzberg, the great manufacturer of sparkling hock, invited the whole regiment of the Fifth Dragoons, and treated them with his best hocks on the terrace of his house. No speeches were inflicted on the thirsty and hungry guests. The 6,500 men who entered Mentz were each provided at the city's expense with a bottle of good wine; but after their disbandment there was an unlimited amount of drinking in the various wine and beer gardens. I went through dozens of them, saw the men sitting with their aged parents, or brothers and sisters, wives and children, who had come to bid them a hearty welcome and bring them their plain clothes. There was a general frolicking and carousing from two in the afternoon till midnight; but I only discovered five drunken men—one of them dead drunk, i.e., unable to walk, and leaning against the wall; another one simply drunk, i.e., with zigzag gait, and balancing himself with his arms; and three fellows tipsy, i.e., merrily shouting and trying to embrace all bystanders. At headquarters, however, eleven were reported drunk.

On the entry of one of the Mentz regiments (the 87th, which is recruited in Nassau), I witnessed a little incident which is worth being narrated here. The regiment was on its way to the Schlossplatz when a stout, resolute peasant woman broke through the ranks, put away the officer at the head of his squad, and embraced her husband, loudly crying, "He has belonged to you long enough, now he is mine once more, and you will never get hold of him again!" When the other women standing along the street, and eagerly watching for their turn, noticed this unceremonious procedure, there was no longer any restraint, they all broke into the lines, and each of them seized her son, husband, or sweetheart. The captain could not defend himself against this invasion, good-naturedly suffered to pass what he could not stop, and led his men and women to the Schlossplatz, where, amid the cheering of the people, the women assisted the soldiers in unstrapping their knapsacks, or held their needle-guns, while in the other hand each carried a bundle of modest citizen's clothes, and afterwards all ate and drank merrily together.

The Munich celebration of July 16, in which the Prussian Crown-Prince participated, closed this species of festivals. It took place just a year after the order of mobilization of the German armies had been issued. The era of wars is closed now, let us hope, for generations at least. The work of peace now doubly claims its right. We have to lay the solid foundations of the new Empire. With a firm determination we are about to engage in this task. May its results come up to the glorious successes of the war!

Correspondence.

THE COAL PRODUCTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You publish, under date of August 3, 1871, as follows: "The coal producers continue their insane course, sending to the market at the rate of twenty-six millions of tons per annum, although the largest consumption never yet exceeded seventeen millions." Have the goodness to inform a subscriber what becomes of the excess if it is not consumed or wanted by consumers, as there seem to be no stocks of any account accumulating anywhere, and a steady demand continues.

A SUBSCRIBER.

PHILADELPHIA, August 4, 1871.

[Even if we were to plead that the details of the coal trade lie somewhat out of our sphere, that would not alter the fact stated by us, that the weekly production is largely in excess of the largest known average of weekly consumption. One of the reasons why, in spite of the enormous production, there might not as yet be any very visible accumulation of great stocks, is that, with the experience of last year before their eyes, the wealthier portion of the public is readily induced to buy by the rumors industriously circulated by coal dealers that another strike is imminent. But is it true that there is no accumulation of stocks anywhere? We are assured by persons familiar with the trade that great depots are now being formed at various points along the coal-roads, to store these very stocks that "A Subscriber" asserts "seem not to be accumulating anywhere." Is it true that there is a steady demand? Is it not, on the contrary, true that the Reading Company, unable to maintain the price in the Philadelphia market, owing to the excess of production, has given notice of an early advance in freight rates, in order to stimulate the demand? That the same company, unable to find that steady demand, is selling its own coal at a pretended loss, and lower than other operators can afford it? That, owing to the absence of steady demand, prices have been lower than last month, and that, at the usual monthly convention on the 15th inst., a further reduction of wages is considered inevitable? And, finally, that throughout Huntingdon County a reduction of 10 per cent. in wages took place on the 29th ultimo, and that all the Broad Top miners are on a strike in consequence? Our correspondent may not have heard of these things, which surely do not look like a steady demand; but, even if they had not occurred, would that have altered the simple fact of our original statement?

The fact is that the four great railroad and canal companies are carrying on a competitive struggle with the mine-owners, and with one another, which results in an inevitable periodical overstocking of the market. When this overstocking results in a decline in price, they seek to make up the difference by a reduction in wages. Heretofore, the season has generally opened with wages at a comparatively high figure, so that the working miners could afford to submit to some reduction, and yet live. This season, wages have commenced at the lowest figures known for years, figures at which, according to the unanimous testimony of the merchants and dealers of the neighborhood, the men are scarcely able to sustain themselves in decent comfort, and yet, before the first sixty days of the season are over, a reduction has already taken place in some districts, and is hourly expected in others, while the railroad companies are, at the same time, advancing the freight, and thus preventing the consumer from benefiting by the decline in the wages. Yet, in spite of these ominous facts, the railroad companies are forcing the trade to the extreme of their ability, and, in at least one instance, have actually taken new men into a district to increase their production—a course which our epithet of "insane" scarcely adequately characterizes.—Ed. Nation.]

"RAILROAD AXIOMS."

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In confirmation of the truth of the positions taken by you in an article under the above caption, permit me to offer in evidence the railroad experience of a fertile interior county of Kansas. The county in question is about twenty miles in breadth from north to south, and was traversed from east to west, through its centre, by the overland road from Atchison to Fort Kearney.

The travel over this road created a demand for corn, to supply which many farms were opened and profitably cultivated, until the building of a railroad across the southern portion of the county caused the abandonment of the overland traffic, when the raising of corn in the entire northern half of the county became unprofitable, and was abandoned. Two railroads are now in operation across the county, and divide it into three nearly equal parts, and the cultivation of corn has in consequence been resumed, and is fairly profitable.

Real estate is held at an advance upon pre-railroad prices of about one-third; but there are few purchasers, for the reason that emigrants prefer to go one hundred miles further west, and settle upon Government land at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

It would be idle to deny that railroads have conferred benefits upon the farming regions of Kansas; but I could easily fill pages with facts and figures proving that your estimate of those benefits approximates the truth more nearly than that of Mr. Poor. These extravagant generalizations are working a harm the extent of which cannot be calculated, for they are received by the people as sober estimates, and induce the granting of city, township, and county bonds to aid the construction of the railroads from which such impossible benefits are expected to be derived. The country is in this way rapidly duplicating the national debt, which alone is a grave draft upon the pockets of taxpayers.

C. I. S.

Atchison, Kan., August 1, 1871.

A CORRECTION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Allow me to call your attention to what appears to be a very unnecessary piece of hypercriticism in the characteristic notice, in the Nation, of Miss Putnam's article in Scribner's Monthly. Your literary editor sees fit to assume that Miss Putnam has signed her name as the author of an article of which she was only the translator. I write to say that the article was entirely original with her, and that its having been so published should have been sufficient evidence of the fact, notwithstanding the philological discoveries of the careful reviewer, and the errors of the compositor. In justice to Miss Putnam, I trust you will print this statement.

Respectfully, G. H. Putnam.

New York, August 4, 1871.

[The assumption mentioned was based on the fact that the whole tone of the article in question, and, in many instances, its phraseology, was so un-English as to make it seem precisely like a not perfectly English translation of a French original. This assumption was made more easily, as a little foot-note to the title of the article had a sort of impersonality in speaking of its authorship, which made it unnecessary to take the fact of Miss Putnam's name being in the general table of contents as a proof, or an assertion, of her authorship. Had it been so taken, the assumption would not have been made. Of course, it does not stand at all before Mr. Putnam's statement.—Ed. Nation.]

COL. A. G. BRACKETT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: You will please correct the statement made in your journal of the 27th ult., in the review of Gen. Garfield's oration on the life and character of the late Gen. Thomas, in which you mention the name of A. G. Brackett among the officers of the old 2d Cavalry who "all went over to the enemy and became generals in the Confederate service."

If you will take the trouble to look into Col. Brackett's military record (see Henry's "Military Record, U. S. Army," vol. i., p. 39) you will find that he, then a captain, escaped from Texas when General Twiggs surrendered to the rebels, and took with him to the North the loyal remnant of the 2d Cavalry, which he commanded at the first battle of Bull Run, being Gen. McDowell's escort, and most ably covering the retreat of a portion of our army at the close of that disastrous day.

During the course of the war, Col. Brackett was severely wounded in an engagement with the rebels in Arkansas, and was afterwards Inspector and Chief of Cavalry in Gen. Thomas's army in Tennessee. As he is now on the Western frontier in command of his regiment, the 2d U. S. Cavalry, and of course unable to correct this blunder, it is due no less to the Nation's own reputation as a generally well-informed journal, than to that of a gallant officer, whose loyalty, like that of Gen. Thomas, was sternly tried in those dark days in Texas, and since then on many a hard-fought field in battling for the Union, to make the amende honorable in your columns.

No such error as this could have crept into a journal published in the West, where Col. Brackett is so well kown, and its correction will be especially gratifying here to his old comrades of the Army of the Cumberland.

Respectfully yours,

Western.

Chicago, August 3, 1871.

[Before receiving our correspondent's letter, our only knowledge of Colonel Brackett was derived from an appendix to the above-mentioned oration by General Garfield—a Western man, by the way, and a Western soldier. In that appendix the official roster of the 2d Cavalry is quoted, and of Captain A. G. Brackett it is stated that he "became a general in the rebel army." This statement caused our error, which we correct with pleasure.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

Messrs. Francis B. Felt & Co., of this city, will republish that rather unintelligible production called "The Coming Race; or, The New Utopia."——By an error in copying, Mr. Burroughs's "Wake-Robin" was, in our review of it last week, assigned to the wrong publishing-house. Messrs. Hurd & Houghton are the publishers. On the same page (79) was a misprint of the name of the author of "Rhododendrons," who is Mr. Edward S. Rand, jr.——Mr. W. J. Stillman's work on Crete is announced for the 15th of September by Messrs. John Ross & Co. It will be entitled "The Cretan Insurrection of 1866," and will attract general attention, not least in diplomatic circles.——Messrs. Roberts Brothers have in preparation "English Lessons for English People," by Mr. E. A. Abbott, author of the excellent Shakespearian Grammar, and Professor J. R. Seeley; also, a reprint, with a prefatory note by Miss Louisa M. Alcott, of the "Record of a School, Exemplifying the Principles and Methods of Moral Culture," of which Mr. Bronson Alcott was the teacher. That there never was anything like this school before or since may safely be affirmed by those who read this "Record" many years ago.——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co.'s announcements include Whymper's "Scrambles among the Alps;" Captain Palmer's "Kidnapping in the South Seas;" Fritz Reuter's "Seed-time and Harvest;" "American Encyclopædia of Printing," by J. Luther Ringwalt; and "Beautiful Butterflies Described and Illustrated," by H. G. Adams.——Messrs. Porter & Coates will issue a new "centennial" edition of the Waverley novels; and the same anniversary will be celebrated by Messrs. J. R. Osgood & Co. with a "Life of Scott," their "Lands of Scott" being already in the hands of admirers of the great novelist. ——Dr. A. S. Packard, jr.'s "Record of American Entomology for the Year 1870" is now for sale at the Naturalists' Agency, Salem, Mass. It is a small pamphlet of 27 pages, but is indispensable to scientific entomologists, for whom chiefly it has been prepared.

—The New York Medical Journal for August opens with an article by Dr. John C. Peters, based upon and giving copious extracts from McNamara's "Treatise on Asiatic Cholera." The position maintained is, that "every outbreak of the disease beyond the confines of British India may be traced back to Hindostan, through a continuous chain of human beings affected with the disease, or through water contaminated, or articles stained, with their dejecta." This is fully illustrated by an account of the great festivals and pilgrimages which inevitably develop and disperse to all parts of India, and ultimately of the world, the dreadful contagion; and two maps show to the eye the regular routes of the cholera from its nest on the Ganges through all the territory of Islam to Eastern Europe. In reading this itinerary, and especially the pages describing the normal condition of the native villages in India, where the cholera is endemic, one gets a lively idea of what may be called the hygienic solidarity of mankind. The moral and political solidarity is already acknowledged, as for instance that all the world is concerned in the form of government that prevails in France and in the "peculiar institution" of the Southern United States. But how many Americans who contribute scrupulously to foreign missions, feel it any of their business that the following description is true of millions of human beings in another hemisphere?

"The entrances to the villages are many, but not easily discoverable; while the paths through them are so narrow and tortuous that it is difficult for a stranger to find his way through them. The huts are huddled together in masses, and pushed up to the very edge of the ponds or tanks; their projecting eaves often meet together; while the intervening spaces, impervious to the rays of the sun, are converted into privies and necessaries, which are used by both sexes in common. Pools of liquid filth, often covering 150,000 square feet, by actual measurement, are found in some of these villages. . . . There is no such thing as a pump in all India, and all their drinking-water is drawn from the large ponds, or pools, or tanks, or from open wells, and is always carried about in leather bags, made of sheepskin, which can never be properly cleansed, and are often in constant use for years. . . . This filthy pool or tank water is also used by the natives to dilute the milk which is sold for public consumption."

—The Nineteenth Annual Report of the Boston Public Library agrees with those which have preceded it in testifying to the prosperity of that institution, and in furnishing many useful hints and statistics for librarians everywhere. Thus, the new expedients for close stowage of books here described will doubtless be gladly imitated; and so might the Superintendent's catalogue of works of fiction, designed to help the young in their choice of this kind of reading, and cultivate a better taste than their inexperience permits. Last year, while the Public Library was gaining 18,000 volumes, the Astor Library added but 1,500 to its jealously secluded stock—not so many as the number ordered by the Boston Library at the request alone of its frequenters. Out of 1,665 titles thus recommended, "979 were in the spheres of theology and ecclesiastical history." The Superintendent says:

"I find in the report of Mr. Furnivall to the Chaucer Society a rather significant statement regarding the widespread interest felt in this country in the higher departments of pure literature, as shown by the number of subscribers which that society has in this country, compared with the patronage it gets in Great Britain. While there are twenty libraries in the United States receiving their publications, there are but eight in England, one in Ireland, and none in Scotland."

—Some of the figures in this report may be curiously compared with those lately furnished, for the year 1870, by the Minister of Public Instruction in Italy, in regard to the 28 Government libraries (not including the Roman). The Boston Library has 32,000 registered patrons, "though probably about a third of that number would represent the borrowers using it at any one time." In Naples, five libraries had 192,972 readers, or an average of 38,594; three in Florence had 92,095, or an average of 30,698; the National Library of Milan had 39,207; that of Parma 35,127; and there were three others whose readers were over 30,000, while the University Library of Turin had the enormous number of 115,489. But the exact meaning of these figures is questionable. The total number of works lent in or from the Boston Library was 322,445; in the Italian libraries collectively only 1,057,230, with periodicals included, it would appear. The gain of the Boston Library we have already stated at 18,000 volumes (besides 15,000 pamphlets). The total gain of the Italian libraries was but 11,706 volumes—the largest being that of the University Library at Naples, 2,473.

—Henry Longueville Mansel, Dean of St. Paul's, and Waynflete Professor of Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy in the University of Oxford, died July 31, aged fifty-one years. He was one of the most eminent of that half-German, half-Scotch school of philosophers founded by Hamilton, but was much more Kantian than Hamilton, and the main burden of his celebrated work on the limits of religious thought lies in tracing out at great length the antinomies into which the intellect falls in attempting to reason about the infinite, and in deducing a method of avoiding these difficulties. He seldom appeals to that intuitive cognition of abstract truths to which Reid or rather Hamilton had given the very inappropriate title of "Common Sense." As to the character of his mind, Mansel was a sharply consecutive logician within a narrow sphere. It is not unusual for such acute scholastic thinkers to be so deficient in the power of using other methods of reasoning more difficult to analyze, but far more valuable than the syllogistic procedure of which they are masters, that the deficiency is universally recognized under the name of a lack of common sense. Some traces of this defect may be seen in Mansel. Though his premises are bound to his conclusions by an iron bond of demonstration, his books generally fail to produce conviction and rather seem to serve as a reductio ad absurdum of his principles. A philosopher of this sort is not often met with; and though he is the worst enemy of the system he undertakes to defend, he does really advance our knowledge of philosophy more than ten broader-minded but less thoroughgoing and consistent writers. Mansel's "Limits of Religious Thought" and "Prolegomena Logica" were published at a time when the Hamiltonian metaphysic and logic were greatly in vogue. They are far more radical than Hamilton in the same direction; and their perfect clearness and consecution, combined with the obvious repugnance of their conclusions to considerations of another kind that could not be set aside, have probably contributed not a little to the downfall of the influence of that philosophy. However that may be, the pre-eminence of Hamilton's system has now so entirely passed that the early death of Mr. Mansel is less to be regretted in the interest of philosophy than it otherwise would be. His last book, "The Philosophy of the Conditioned," showed considerable critical power, but the arrogance of a high metaphysical position would always have prevented him from correctly estimating the strength of an empirical philosophy.

—A monograph on the "Origin of the Seven Years' War" (Der Ursprung des Siebenjährigen Kriegs), by Leopold von Ranke, is a fresh reminder of the remarkable vigor of this venerable historian. The remote occasion of this work was the opening of the Austrian archives to historical enquiry, a liberty of which Ranke availed himself in order to perfect his knowledge of Austria's relations with France, and particularly with Russia. He had, indeed, been preceded by others in researches in this quarter, and one must not look for novelty in the present narrative so much as for vivid and dramatic handling of the author's theme. His proximate motive in returning to a field which he had already thoroughly worked, was the distraction from other studies caused by the late war, which engrossed all his sympathies and required an occupation which had some not fanciful relation to it. This, he says in his preface, he found in tracing the connection between the Seven Years' War and the war of 1870 with France, and in so doing was less conscious of the difference of time of the two epochs. The likeness, in fact, between Prussia at the close of the Silesian wars and after 1866 is one that suggests itself, and there lacked little (perhaps only another chancellor than Von Beust) to complete the parallel in a Franco-Austrian alliance against the North-German Confederation, furthered, inter alia, by that common religion which the Abbé Bernis had pointed out to Count Stahremberg as the natural bond between the enemies of Prussia. Frederic, too, in his policy of keeping the French out of Hanover, was really maintaining the Germanic idea which has now fruited—the grand idea of non-interference with the internal development of other nations, and non-submission to foreign intermeddling. Like Bismarck and Moltke, Frederic did not wait to be attacked when he saw the necessity of fighting; and, though in his case the end of the war found the Prussian territory unenlarged, it was the preserving intact his possessions against a most formidable triple alliance that constituted a real success, and saved his fatherland.

—Ranke's work thus truly forms a part of the literature of the late war, and is, it need not be said, of a high order. Publications which relate to actual military operations have only begun to come in, though the prospect is that we shall have enough of them by-and-by. The Prussian staff is at work gathering its materials, and each German state will probably give us its "Bavaria during the War of 1870," or the like. Commanders of the several campaigns in France will also have their special story to tell, and regimental histories will, doubtless, not be wanting. Then, too, we shall hear from the Quartermaster's Department, and from its right arm, the Field Telegraphic Corps—the right arm, in fact, of the whole service, whose members rode always bravely at the front, and whose knowledge of French was as general and thorough as the knowledge of German was wanting among the French telegraphers; who even employed their leisure in making scientific experiments, working on wide circuits from St. Germain round by Vienna, Constantinople, and London, and testing new instruments. Already we have from General Von der Tann a vindication of the Bavarian troops in the battle around Bazeilles, where, as was charged by an English nobleman in the Times, in revenge for the part the inhabitants took in the defence of the town, it was wantonly fired, and women and children perished in the cellars where they had taken refuge, or were thrust back into the flames, leaving only 300 survivors out of a population of 2,000. The General quotes from a report of the Mayor of Bazeilles the following figures: Of the inhabitants, killed, wounded, and missing, 39, including among the stabbed and burnt 2 bedridden women, 3 men, and 3 children. One other woman was killed on the second day of the fight, which was desperately contested on the part of the French, and cost Von der Tann's corps a loss of 2,000 men. The village unavoidably suffered destruction from the shells. From 140 to 150 inhabitants have died since the war, from sickness resulting from destitution. We may notice here that the well-known work, "Der Krieg um Metz," by a Prussian general, said to hold a high rank in the general staff, has been translated into French by a competent officer of the general staff of the French Rhine army, and published in Brussels. The translator has added notes of value and interest. His account of the French losses before Metz is as follows: On the 14th of August, Bazaine's army numbered 168,000 men, with 540 guns, including 84 mitrailleuses; on the 16th, it was reduced to 157,000; and on the morning of the 18th, to 140,000 men. On the last day, the total loss was raised to 32,817, of whom 1,642 were officers.

—Among the other "barbarians" of the German army of invasion, our readers will recall the significant number of Sanskrit scholars, one of whom sent home the famous Sanskrit despatch concerning the battle of Sedan. A curious comment on the French vanity which was satisfied with nothing else than the French leadership of mankind has been furnished by Dr. Albert Weber, Sanskrit professor at Berlin. He communicates to a German paper the substance of an article in the November number of the Friend of India, contributed by a Hindu, who passes judgment on the two powers at war, and concludes in favor of the Germans. They are, he says, more Hindu in their philosophic tendencies and feelings than any European people, "but their great merit is the honor they have brought upon India by honoring the Sanskrit literature, and taking the lead in reviving the study of the language." Their defeat would therefore be disastrous to Sanskrit erudition and enquiry, and indirectly to the general welfare of India. The language, too, has not been without its humanizing effect on those who have made themselves acquainted with it, as witness the Germans, who have shown European energy combined with Indian gentleness. "Thank God that France, noble France! has fallen into yet nobler hands." The Rajah of Besma wrote in February to a German Sanskrit philologist, that the great victory must surely rest with "our Prussia"; and still another Hindu, of Christian descent, says, in the Bengal Christian Herald, "Germany Gallicized would be a misfortune to the whole world; France Germanized might possibly be a gain."

MASSON'S LIFE OF JOHN MILTON.*

So long a time has passed since the publication of the first volume of Masson's "Life of Milton" that the public had well-nigh forgotten it, or dismissed it to the limbo of things begun and never finished. The author, however, has not been idle all these years, and comes forward at last with another volume, and the promise of a third to follow speedily. And this volume shows on every page the marks of such minute labor as to explain sufficiently the delay in its appearance. One is tempted to say that it is the work of more than one lifetime to write a life of Milton after this model, and it is evident that the work has grown upon the author's hands; for in his original preface he proposes to complete the book in three volumes, the second to reach to the year 1660. But the present volume covers less than a fourth of the time here proposed! Probably the movement in the succeeding volumes will be more rapid, for this has to do especially with intellectual controversy and political history; and the military events of the following years will be passed over cursorily. Even at this, however, the work is on a vast scale, and threatens to require years and years for its completion.

The plan of the work is perhaps to be commended, though certainly people who write biographies after Mr. Masson's method should keep constantly before their minds the brevity of human life—their own and other people's—and the number of lives that are to be written. To be sure, no life can be properly understood without a good knowledge of the influences that surrounded it, and Milton's life was connected closely with the temper of the time in which he lived. Still, the best justification for Mr. Masson's course is one that belongs to him in quite another character than that of a good biographer, and is to the effect that through biography is the best way to learn history, and the biography of Milton will serve perhaps better than that of any other man as the groundwork for the history of England in the middle of the seventeenth century. But, clearly, there must be bounds to the general history to be treated in connection with a man's life, and beyond a doubt Mr. Masson errs in the amount of details into which he enters. There is a great deal of very valuable material, the result of laborious investigation, which is, after all, mere material, and might much better be published in a separate treatise, and given here only in a compendious summary. It is, however, only a question of degree, and we confess ourselves glad, even at the expense of Mr. Masson's reputation as a skilful literary workman, to have just these things in our possession in this convenient and accessible form. And there is no question of the exceeding value of this method of illustrating history; and though we may disagree with our author as to whether it is his proper business, we agree fully with him when he says, in reference to his portraitures of the members of the Long Parliament, "that such a counting of the eminent heads of any time or moment . . . is worth, for genuine historical purposes, hundreds of pages of mere narrative or disquisition."

One is more forcibly impressed with the degree in which Milton's life was the outgrowth of the times when one considers how impossible it would be to write in this style, and on this scale, a life of almost any other great English poet. It would, for example, be hard to find two men of so great celebrity, and so nearly contemporary with one another, who formed so great a contrast in this respect, as Shakespeare and Milton. Biographers of Shakespeare have enough to do to find materials for one moderate volume; but here is a life of Milton which is likely to fill as many volumes as his works. The reason is obvious.

Milton, on the other hand, is in almost every line the poet of his age, and, more than that, of his own nation, and his own party and sect. It matters very little, in reading Shakespeare, that the man himself is an almost shadowy personality, so that many intelligent people have actually reasoned themselves into a belief that he did not exist at all—did not exist, that is, in the sense in which his existence is of any moment to us, as writer of these plays. But Milton cannot be comprehended at all unless we understand the England of that day, and particularly the Puritan movement, in which he was so distinguished a leader.

From this it follows further that, while Shakespeare is every year read and studied with fresh and increasing enthusiasm, Milton's greatest work is read less and less, and is rapidly becoming, with the mass of readers, merely a name—a kind of impersonation of sublimity in poetry. His party did its work and passed away; its doctrines are rapidly losing their hold on mankind; the great issues, the tremendous conflicts, of the seventeenth century are now only a matter of history. And Milton, being essentially a writer of those times and those issues, has become, in a very great degree, a writer of the past, most valuable for him who would understand the thoughts and feelings of that age, but of little direct and immediate interest to us now. Portions of his writings—passages from his great epics, some of his sonnets, the Samson, the Lycidas, the Comus L'Allegro, Il Penseroso—these will endure till our language dies; and the Satan is one of the great conceptions of the human intellect. For Milton was not merely an Englishman and a Puritan—he was a very great poet; and he could not fail to produce much that should be free from the accidents of his time and country, and should be a portion of the universal heritage.

After all, Milton was not so much a Puritan as a poet and a lover of freedom; and it was more as a lover of freedom than as a Calvinist that he threw himself into the great struggle of his day. There was nothing in the essential nature of Puritanism that tended to liberty, and it never claimed for itself that praise. It was dogmatic, despotic, terribly in earnest. Its aim was to conquer the world from the powers of darkness, and to hold humanity in a new subjection—a subjection to the truth, to be sure, but one as rigid and complete as that of Catholicism itself. Thus, two systems of religion, both of them dead in earnest and bitterly exclusive, came into conflict; and because one of these was already in possession of power, and was determined to keep possession of it, the other became the champion of free thought and free institutions. In this way it came about that, in the great religious conflict of the sixteenth century, Calvinism became identified with progress and freedom. The seventeenth century presented new issues. The religious question was no longer the chief one; here latitudinarianism and compromise prevailed, and excited the apprehensions of earnest Calvinists. But secular questions and political controversies had taken the place of the theological battles of the preceding century, and Puritanism—the English phase of Calvinism—found that its chief task was to do battle against absolutism and prelacy in the church. Thus, circumstances now, as well as in the earlier generation, forced Calvinism to take the lead in the contest for liberty; and here was Milton's quickest sympathy and most active co-operation. He was not indifferent to the theological aspect of the struggle; he was, as Mr. Masson shows, not merely an anti-prelatist, he was a pronounced Presbyterian. But, still more, he was a republican and a lover of good government.

* "The Life of John Milton: narrated in connection with the Political, Ecclesiastical, and Literary History of his time. By David Masson, M.A., LL.D., Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in the University of Edinburgh." Vol. II. 1638–1643. London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1871. 8vo, pp. 608.

The years treated of in this volume are those which followed directly after Milton's return from abroad, when the civil war was brewing, including a year or so of the war. The important events in Scotland which led to the war, or, at least, immediately preceded it, are narrated with considerable minuteness. "I do not consider," Mr. Masson says, "that this portion of Scottish history has been adequately represented in its English connection." The transactions of the Long Parliament are told in a very clear and interesting manner, and the state of parties, as well at the outset as in those changes which led Colepepper, Falkland, Hyde, Deering, and others over to the King's side, is made very intelligible. The meeting of the Westminster Assembly is briefly described, and there is a rapid sketch of the military operations of the first year, chiefly noticeable for the distinctness with which the geographical relations are pointed out. It is shown, from an analysis of the House of Commons, that the Parliament was strongest in the centre, east, and southeast of England; the King in the west and north. The military operations themselves are narrated in relation to five geographical districts, and thus the confused movements of these months of the war are made clear.

Analogies, in such a war as this, with our own civil war are of course easy enough to find, from the necessity of the case. For instance, Mr. Masson shows how the war had to develop its own soldiers; not, however, it appears, from trained but unknown men as ours, but from the ranks of civilians. Here was a strong contrast. On the other hand, what is said of Essex is unquestionably true of the spirit of some of our generals. "The state of Essex's mind with regard to the war was such as to disable him, even had he had the necessary strategic talent, from being an aggressive commander-in-chief. Faithfully and honorably to act on the defensive for London and the Parliament against any move of his Majesty, but not, if it could be avoided, to drive his Majesty to extremities—such was Essex's plan" (p. 464).

During this period Milton's life did not abound in incident. He resided in Aldersgate Street, teaching his nephews, and at the end was married, going for his wife, it seems—he a well-known Parliamentarian pamphleteer—into a district held by the King, and a family of royalist sympathies. His writings during these months, with the exception of the "Epitaphium Damonis," in commemoration of his friend Charles Diodati, were five anti-episcopal pamphlets. All these writings are analyzed, with copious extracts. We have also an account and an analysis of his studies and jottings in search of a subject upon which to write; and the interesting fact is brought out that already his mind was powerfully attracted to the theme which he took up many years after for his great poem. "As early as 1640, Milton's thoughts were full of the subject of 'Paradise Lost.' It was with a view to a drama, indeed, that he then entertained the subject; but the pre-eminence it takes in the list, on this understanding, over all the other subjects (ninety-nine in all) is very remarkable. It stands first of all; there are three drafts of it at once, and a fourth draft some time afterwards, set down with a direction to compare it with the last of the former three; and, altogether, this single subject occupies nearly a page and a half of the entire seven pages of jottings. There are few facts in literary history more striking than this predetermination of Milton in his early manhood to the subject of the greatest work of his later life" (p. 116).

Another interesting point—quite in the style of Shakespeare's commentators—is the discussion as to Milton's military knowledge. Mr. Masson is obliged reluctantly to admit that Milton did not serve in the army of Parliament, where he was bound to be, "if any man in England was bound." His marriage, in June, 1643, he thinks may have had something to do with it. However that may be, he undertakes to show, from the exhibition of military knowledge in his poems, that he did in all probability get a practical acquaintance with military drill at this time. One point here seems to be of value as a piece of commentary. The "ported spears" (Paradise Lost, iv. 981) have puzzled commentators, who have generally explained the term as meaning advanced. But we are told that, on the contrary, the port "is the movement or position preparatory to the 'charge.' It is the grasping of the pike diagonally across the body, butt down towards the right, and point upwards in the air over the left shoulder, so as to be ready to bring it down strongly and suddenly, by a half-wheel of the body, to the push for receiving an enemy." A body of men with spears held thus may very well, he says, be compared to a field of grain which "bends her bearded grove of ears which way the wind sways them."

It is curious to meet with such a passage as the following, quoted from the famous "Smectymnuus" pamphlet, by Calamy, Young, and others: "We shall show anon that there is no more truth in this assertion than if he had said, with Anaxagoras, 'Snow is black'; or, with Copernicus, 'The earth moves and the heavens stand still.'" "Strange," adds Mr. Masson, "to find that in 1641 the Copernican theory could still be cited as a universally admitted example of delusion!"

As we have said, although he is by no means without other faults, Mr. Masson's principal fault as a biographer is the plan which he adopts. The landscape which serves as a background to his portrait of Milton is painted with pains, and with much of a certain sort of picturesqueness—which the reader will do well to distrust and disregard—in a manner in which Mr. Masson is an old offender. In the performance of the work his style is not good, but it may be commended as a fairly good variety of the graphic, often running deliberately into slovenly colloquialisms, and sometimes rather feebly inflated.

LAVELEYE'S "PRUSSIA AND AUSTRIA."*

THIS work of the eminent Belgian publicist consists of ten elaborate and comprehensive essays contributed to the Revue des Deux Mondes in the years 1866–69. Their titles sufficiently explain the contents of the collection: "The Aggrandizements and the Army of Prussia;" "The Soil and the Constitution of Landed Property in Prussia;" "The Recent Progress of Prussian Agriculture;" "The Unitary Movement and the North-German Confederation;" "Austria and her New Constitution;" "Hungary: her Institutions and her Future;" "The Nationalities in Hungary and the Southern Slavi;" "Deák Ferencz [Francis Deák];" "Poles, Ruthenians, and Czechs;" "The Concordat and the Religious Struggle in Austria." And rich and varied as is his field, we have no hesitation in saying that the author has treated all its divisions with the zeal of a curious observer and the discernment of an expert critic. For he is not satisfied with lucidly presenting the various aspects of the political and national institutions, developments, tendencies, and problems before him, and with explaining historically their origins, but he judges, approves, and condemns, and offers his own solutions. This refers chiefly to things and doings in Austria, which, less fortunate than Prussia, presents not a picture of strength in peace and war, which cannot but be admired, but a strangely checkered tableau of political and national incongruities, which bespeak a past full of discord and blunders, and a future full of uncertainty. Yet, however plausible M. de Laveleye's appreciations and solutions may be, the principal merit of his book consists in its correct statements of facts and circumstances, and its analytical and retrospective elucidations.

His main subject is the Austro-Hungarian Empire; and the following abridged review of the situation at the close of the war of 1866 may show how complex and interesting a subject it is:

"Everywhere, conflicts of nationalities; the clashing of irreconcilable pretensions, and inveterate jealousies of race. In the Italian portion of the Tyrol, a lively desire for union with Italy; in the German, a fanatical population, overexcited by Ultramontane preachings; in Vienna, the defenders of church-rule and the partisans of modern ideas wrangling over the Concordat; in Trieste, a group of Italianissimi eagerly grasping every opportunity for anti-Austrian manifestations; in Fiume, a civil feud between the Croat nationals and the friends of Hungary; in Agram, the Slavi, exasperated at the reunion with Hungary, and cursing Austria for abandoning them to their old-time enemies; in the Banat, the Serbs turning their eyes towards Belgrade, and dreaming of the restoration of Dushan's empire, under the protection of Russia; in Transylvania, the humbled Roumans talking of Bucharest, and silently counting their superior numbers, and the Saxons mistrusting the Maygars, and but unwillingly accepting the new organization; in Hungary, the people ruminating their old grudges against the Germans, and aspiring after absolute independence; in Galicia, the Poles working for the resurrection of their country, and the Ruthenians invoking against them the aid of the Muscovites; in Bohemia, Czechs and Germans at strife about everything, and the national party threatening a war of races under the banner of Panslavism; at the centre, an emperor animated with the best of intentions, but trained in the ideas of a by-gone age, and utterly disconcerted by blows suffered at the hands of former allies; around him an ultra-Catholic court, a Protestant and foreign Prime Minister, and an army smarting under the humiliation of unmerited defeats, and before him the bottomless abyss of deficits and imminent bankruptcy."

*"La Prusse et l'Autriche depuis Sadowa. Par Émile de Laveleye." Two vols. Paris: Hachette & Co. (New York: F. W. Christern). 1870.

That this chaotic situation was not followed by the dissolution of the empire, but by a reconstruction on a liberal basis—which promises a much brighter future—is, as everybody admits, chiefly the merit of the Hungarians and of their leader, Deák; and our author dwells with enthusiasm on the rare political qualities of the former and the wisdom and spotless career of the latter. His biographico-historical sketch of the statesman is indeed a panegyric, but a panegyric without flattery. Of the history of the nation which a hundred years ago Gibbon declared endowed by nature with "a strong constitution both of body and mind," cherishing "love of liberty and love of arms" as ruling passions, he says: "It deserves to be taught everywhere, in order that the rising generation may learn by what persevering efforts, by what bloody sacrifices, freedom must be conquered, and what great things may be achieved by a nation fitted to enjoy it." The people that, among its representative men in our times, "has produced a type of a patrician like Széchenyi, a type of a parliamentary liberal like Deák, and a type of a revolutionary tribune like Kossuth," he unreservedly asserts to be inferior to no other.

We are sorry that this excellent publication is marred by a considerable number of errors in its historical portions—such as false dates and names—mostly, we presume, but not all, owing to the carelessness of the compositor and proof-reader, and in any case inexcusable. Thus we find "Jan. 18, 1706," for Jan. 18, 1701, as the date of the coronation of King Frederic I. of Prussia (Vol. I., p. 27); the Regency and Louis XV. brought into connection with the reign of Frederick I. who died before Louis XIV. (I., 28); "Charles II." for Charles XII. (ib.); "Frederic William IV." for Frederic William III. (I., 31); "1849" as the date of movements in Hesse which took place the following year (I., 48); "1815" for 1813, as the year of Bismarck's birth (I., 220); "1303," for 1308, as the date of the assassination of the Emperor Albert I. (I., 296); "1412," for 1438, as that of the accession of Albert II. (I., 298); "Margaret," twice, for Mary [of Burgundy] (I., 299, 300); the Emperor Ferdinand II. designated as the "father" of Leopold I., whose grandfather he was (I., 303); "1735," for 1740, as marking the end of the reign of Charles VI. (I., 306); "Bela IV.," for Bela III. (II., 19); "1380," for 1382, as the last year of Louis the Great of Hungary (II., 21); "1457," for 1458, as the first year of Mathias Corvinus (II., 24); "1525," for 1529, as the date of the first siege of Vienna by the Turks (II., 26); "1620," for 1622, as the date of the peace concluded by Ferdinand II. with Bethlen (II., 28); "1701," for 1703, as the first year of the Hungarian insurrection under Rákóczy (II., 32); "1575" in connection with Ferdinand I., who died in 1564 (II., 62); and "1846," for 1844, as the last year of the Diet opened in 1843 (II., 180)—opened not as stated (II., 103) by "the Emperor Francis," but by his successor, Ferdinand. We point out these mistakes not without the hope of seeing them corrected in an English translation, which the work amply merits.

MINNESOTA AND CONSUMPTIVE PATIENTS.*

Few medical enquiries, unfortunately, have a wider interest in the Eastern and Middle States than the question where the best climate for consumptive patients can be found. The works which we have mentioned recommend that of Minnesota as preferable to any other.

The argument of these volumes may be summed up as follows: 1. The winters of Minnesota are freer from sudden changes than those of other States. 2. Its atmosphere and soil are remarkably dry. 3. The effect of cold upon the invalid is tonic, and tends to the cure of pulmonary disease; while warm climates, though they often palliate the cough and other symptoms, lower the physical tone of the patient, and comparatively seldom yield him permanent benefit. The winters of Minnesota are, indeed, exceptional in their length and in their severity. Dr. Mattocks, quoting from Blodgett's "Climatology," admits a period of 148 days—a period extending from the 24th of October until the 20th of March—during which vegetation is dormant, and the temperature, even in the city of St. Paul, reaches the surprisingly low average of 16·1° Fahrenheit, or sixteen degrees below the freezing point of water. An intelligent correspondent, in a letter recently addressed to a journal of this city, maintains that during the past few years the severity of the Minnesota winters has been much relaxed. But the Smithsonian Institute records show for St. Paul a winter temperature more than eight degrees lower than that of Utica, in Central New York, while its summer temperature is six degrees higher. The climate of Minnesota is thus one of extremes that are even more severe than those of the East.

It is to be admitted, however, that at least during the winter the changes of temperature take place under a condition which makes them considerably less trying to the invalid than variations of equal amplitude in warmer climates would prove to be. In Minnesota, the mercury during the night seldom rises from below the freezing point to above it, or passes the same point in falling. This is necessary, according to Dr. Mattocks's definition, "to constitute a change of weather in the winter." Thermometrical oscillations of large extent do, indeed, frequently take place during the night; but their highest limits are generally below the freezing-point. They involve no thaw, no liberation of vapor; and they may, consequently, be regarded as less injurious to the lungs than the variations which are called "a change of weather."

This advantage, however, is partially offset by the admission that in Minnesota "there are but few days in winter when the mercury does not rise at midday above 32°." Whatever benefit may result from an atmosphere too cold for the solution of aqueous vapor—and to the invalid who must remain for the greater part of the time in warm rooms, this benefit is not so great as is commonly supposed—must be lessened by the occurrence of this daily thaw. If the invalid is housed during the hours of "uniform" cold, it may well be doubted whether he can gain much advantage from its tonic influence.

But the main offset to the Minnesotan claim of an equable climate remains to be stated. Upon enquiring into the thermal record of the entire year we find that, if its winters are colder, its summers are not less warm than those of the seaboard States. The climate of Minnesota has not the equable temperatures that are noted upon the central portion of the continent. It is essentially an Eastern climate, and its thermometers are liable to the same imaginative exaltations and depressions that Mr. Lowell has noticed in the East. During the year 1870, the residents of St. Paul, according to the official reports of the Smithsonian Institution, were hurried from the temperature of twenty-three degrees below zero, on the 20th of February, to that of ninety-nine degrees above zero on the 29th of June—a leap of one hundred and twenty-two degrees in a hardly greater number of days. These figures give little support to Dr. Mattocks's invitation to "come and stay through the year." The extreme temperatures of last year were touched at dates but four months distant from each other. Except in the limited sense that we have already indicated, the climate of Minnesota cannot be considered equable.

The second point claimed for that climate is, however, at least in its statement, less open to criticism. In the greater dryness of the atmosphere of Minnesota we find a marked difference between it and the climate of the seaboard States. Its distance from the coast gives it a comparatively dry winter: it has a winter rain-fall of but two inches, including melted snow, while "the Northern coast States have a winter fall of ten inches of moisture." On comparing entire years, we find that the whole rain-fall of Minnesota is not more than half of that recorded in the coast States, the major part of the rain-fall being in the summer.

This much is incontestable; but the controlling question is, How far is the rain-fall of a given climate prejudicial to health? Moist climates are not, in general, those in which consumption is the most prevalent. Most parts of Europe have a moister atmosphere than Massachusetts, and yet nowhere in Europe is pulmonary consumption so prevalent as in the Bay State. In a climate far more moist than we have anywhere found in Europe—that of Hilo, in the Hawaiian Islands—consumption is almost unknown. Dr. Bowditch has shown the powerful influence of damp soil and of excessive shade in fostering this disease; but that it is induced by the amount of the annual rain-fall, or the amount of vapor held in solution by the free current of the atmosphere, is a point which we have never seen proved, and which our own observation of facts leads us to question, if not to deny. The second claim under consideration, in short, must be held to be of little more value than the first, except as to the dryness of the soil, a point which seems to be well established.

The third argument remains to be considered—the tonic effect of cold upon the consumptive patient. This we shall find to be a more valid claim than either of those that we have noticed, though it requires certain restrictions of statement which neither of the authors in hand has made. A cold climate is, doubtless, an excellent stimulant to those who have strength to avail themselves of it; and it is not unlikely that there are subtle tonic influences in such a climate which are not perfectly understood, yet which confer benefit upon the invalid. Yet the feeble consumptive who cannot bear the exposure of a carriage-ride will be unlikely to find benefit in the winters of Minnesota, admitting that they are still colder winters than those of the East. Upon those originally weak consitutions which form so large a portion of the supply of phthisis, the effect of cold is seldom good. It diminishes instead of stimulating the activity of the circulation; it numbs the extremities, and chills the whole body, while no reaction or glow follows exposure. For such, the warmer airs of the South afford the only hope. But when the constitution of the invalid has power to react against the stimulus of cold, when he feels a glow after his ride or walk in the wintry air, an increased activity of the circulation and of appetite—when, in a word, fuel thrown upon the weak flame of life does not quench it by its mass, but rather catches alight, and helps it to burn afresh, then the invalid will do well to resort, at least for a winter, to Minnesota. This is not the place in which to draw more sharply the lines of distinction between these two classes of invalids; but the pathologic classification is not difficult to the intelligent physician; and we believe that, by sending at least his stronger patients to Minnesota, he is likely to procure them a permanent benefit.

* "Minnesota as a Home for Invalids. By Brewer Mattocks, M.D." 16mo, pp. 200. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.
"Minnesota: Its Character and Climate. By Ledyard Bill." 16mo, pp. 205. New York: Wood & Holbrook.

Pink and White Tyranny. A Society Novel. By Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe. (Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1871.)—This is emphatically a novel with a purpose. "Beauty is but skin-deep;" "marry in haste and repent at leisure," are but a small portion of its moral teaching. The thoughtful reader is taught to despise New York and to worship Boston and the smaller New England towns; society, in its various forms, with the exception of lawn-teas, is shown to be not only hollow but also vicious; to prefer French novels to Froude's "History of England" is shown to be not far from the crowning crime in a life of vice; it is but a short step for a woman from smoking cigarettes to becoming unfaithful to her husband. This is the result of a careful observation of American society at the present day. At least, such is the picture of it that Mrs. Stowe presents to us in this book. Now, society is often frivolous; fashionable mothers often neglect their children; many trashy novels are read by the young; but a novel that makes these faults so prominent as this work of Mrs. Stowe's fails in two respects—first, as a novel, as a record of observation; and, secondly, as a moral weapon. In regard to the heroine, for instance, all the good that Mrs. Stowe can say of her is, that she is pink and white, and even this is grudged her. Her good looks are always spoken of as we may imagine Queen Elizabeth to have remarked upon the ephemeral charms of Mary Stuart. Nor has Lillie Ellis any moral beauty either. She flirts; she fibs about her age; she likes to go to parties, and not to Sunday-school; she reads George Sand's "Indiana"; and so far may be taken as representing a bitter view of a fashionable young woman, with her frivolities and pettinesses. But, besides this, she is charged with talking about her engagement as not even the most flippant and jaded belle would talk of such a matter, and with being unutterably selfish—in fact, without a single redeeming trait. Mrs. Stowe has no words too harsh for her. Of course there may be such women, and of course the novelist has a perfect right to choose them as the subjects of novels; but of course, too, it is unfair to take them as specimens of the average woman of fashion, who is no such person, except in certain homekeeping imaginations in the quieter portions of New England. Those fashionable women whose principal fault is frivolity will not profit much, we fear, by this instruction. They will only smile, knowing that it never entered their heads to be as bad as this heroine. It is to be apprehended that they will imagine themselves to have detected the animus of so severe an attack upon them, as when, for instance, their stupid little harmless parties are compared with the naughty glories of Mabille or of the Black Crook, and will, very properly, consider themselves pictures of innocence in comparison with such women as this Lillie.

Nor are the virtues of New England put in an attractive light, though, to be sure, the contrast between them and the corrupt pleasures of New York is sharply drawn. Instead of "mansions occupying a whole square of the city, with enchanted bowers, created by temporary enlargement of the conservatory covering the ground of the garden," where "light-footed waiters circulate with noiseless obsequiousness through all the rooms, proffering dainties on silver trays," we have readings of Lecky and Froude, and "social gatherings" for pasting paper-covers on Sunday-school books. Not that we have the slightest wish to sneer at such amusements; we are only objecting to the spirit that gives a ball too hard names; and also to the literary method. If a man is a pickpocket, we are authorized neither by the moral law nor by any approved literary canons to call him also a murderer, incendiary, and mutineer. In short, we object to Mrs. Stowe's representation not only on account of its uselessness as an agent of moral reform, but its falsity as a delineation of American society. Whatever absurdities that society may have, it wants a very great deal of being so bad as Mrs. Stowe paints it.

As for the good characters in "Pink and White Tyranny," we do not mind saying that the good husband of the bad Lillie is a sad specimen of a prig; and it is our clear conviction that he was as well off matrimonially as he deserved to be. His sister, also, the capable young lady, who knows clear-starching, and likes to teach Sunday-school, and does not like to read French novels, and sighs over the mis-match of her noble brother, is also an offensive person, and merits calamity and grief.

Treatise on the Bankrupt Law. By Audley W. Gazzam. 8vo. Second edition. (New York: George T. Deller. 1871.)—Instead of the reproach sometimes cast upon it of being too merciful, the recent legislation of the United States on the subject of bankruptcy deserves the praise of justice and consideration towards all classes that it affects. Foreign systems, founded on the theory that fraud is always the cause of commercial failure, copy the stern lender rather than the forgiving lord of the Christian parable, and spare the misfortunes of debtors very little in their harsh enforcement of the strict rights of creditors. The new bankrupt law of England of 1869, it is true, shows a closer conformity to the enlightened spirit of the age. How much of this lenity is due to the relaxed tone of commercial morality which Europeans impute to the English race in both hemispheres, and how much is the fruit of wise and liberal thought, presents a question too large for discussion here.

Probably, very few are now living who recollect, either as its subjects or its interpreters, anything of the first Bankruptcy Act passed by Congress in 1800, which remained in force less than four years. Framed on English precedents, it followed the English severity of the time in treating a failure in trade as a criminal offence. The next law upon the subject, which was even more short-lived, operating only for two years from 1841, perhaps erred in the other direction. At any rate, it was generally regarded as a "whitewashing act," and passed out of existence as soon as it had performed its function of setting the victims of the crash of 1837 on their legs again. The present Bankrupt Act was more imperiously demanded for the relief of the widespread ruin dealt by the civil war. Carefully matured by comparison with foreign legislation, and adapted to the energy, risks, and elasticity of American mercantile life, it embodies principles of justice and beneficence which ensure its permanence as a part of the law of the land. Already passed into the region of refining discussion, it will become a nucleus for diffuse commentaries. It opens another specialization of study and practice for the members of the legal profession, who will find in the volume prepared by Mr. Gazzam an instructive and indispensable guide.

Any bankrupt act seems simple in theory and limited in range. It seeks to administer a trust promptly, with equal and exact justice, among a few parties, placed in special and temporary relations to each other. But questions as to their intention, and conflicts among their interests, produce elaborate discussions and call for nice judicial discrimination. This volume professes to be nothing more than a résumé of decisions pronounced on the great number of points raised and debated in the practical working of the law. Perhaps it is yet too early to suggest any amendment of its provisions. Still, a careful comparison of many of its features with those of the English statute is not neglected, particularly those on the topic of absconding bankrupts, which is likely to grow in importance under our Federal system. And the author's experience gives weight to his recommendation of the substitution of salaries to registers instead of the fees they now receive. The propositions of the text are for the most part terse statements of the settled law, gleaned from nearly a thousand reported cases, and supported by citations in more than double that number of notes. This part of the work is carried out thoroughly, with faithful research; but the author is less successful whenever he departs from the plan of close comment to indulge in reflection or illustration. His style, in these few instances, wants the clearness and method indispensable to good legal writing, and the author would lose nothing by dispensing with original remark in the future editions which his book deserves to reach.

A few years more of administration will complete the uniformity of decisions under the Bankrupt Act, and confirm their authority, and thus the system will be guaranteed in permanence by its convenience as strongly as by its beneficence. The early doubts as to the constitutional sphere of the National Government in regard to the relation of debtor and creditor have long since been dispelled. If the foreign merchant had to thank our domestic troubles for the tardy establishment of a law which relieves him from the pursuit of claims under the statutes of more than thirty different States, the increasing needs of our own commerce no less will insist on upholding it. In the dry dust of the discussions embalmed in these pages may be clearly discerned the outlines of two forms under which the Federal Government will hereafter rightfully and legally assert its power. One is, the control in all cases of bankruptcy and insolvency alike over the legislation of the several States. Not only do the Federal courts inhibit the prosecution of suits in such cases before the State tribunals, but it is also the settled doctrine that the jurisdiction and legislation of a State as to the settlement of insolvent estates are wholly suspended so long as the national Bankrupt Act remains in force. And one reason for this is well stated by our author, that under State laws "the appointment of an assignee rests with the debtor, which the Bankrupt Law clearly defines as the prerogative of the creditors." Another dormant power of the National Government which will spring into salutary action under the Bankrupt Law is the control over insolvent corporations, irrespective of any State laws regulating their dissolution. No one can doubt the necessity of such control who remembers the ownership of property in more than one State by some of the great railroad corporations, and their corrupt practices with some legislatures for its protection. Upon this point our author justly remarks: "There is no other proceeding provided by law whereby railroad and insurance companies and banks whose affairs have been mismanaged can be so promptly and efficiently compelled to go into liquidation as by the wise provisions of the United States Bankrupt Act."

Of course, the development of these features of the Bankrupt Law will be as warmly combated as its enactment was, by arguments addressed to the dread of centralization—and as irrelevantly. There are fields of State legislation which the National Government has no right to invade, but this is not one of them. Uniformity among the several States in the laws regulating the descent of property and the collection of debts is desirable, but it cannot be imposed by Federal authority. The diversities between East and West in the law of divorce shock the moralist. The laxity of Illinois attracts temporary settlers from her sister States, as the historian Strada relates that the privileges of Brabant drew mothers expectant from the neighboring provinces, eager to graft their coming offspring on that happier tree. But much as we may desire it, Congress cannot be called on to teach her virtue. It is not so with the jurisdiction of the several States over a subject of such general concern in our commercial country as the management of a bankrupt's property. In the very early years of the Federal Government it was settled, upon stronger grounds than those which afterwards seemed to justify the creation of a national bank, that this interest was within its constitutional sphere of exclusive legislation, and if as an indirect result those corporate monsters which are the danger and offence of this day are to be brought under Federal oversight and chastisement, that will be a sort of centralization there is reason to pray for heartily.

L'Education Sentimentale. Par Gustave Flaubert. (2 vols. Paris: 1870.)—This novel, which appeared shortly before the beginning of last year's war, so that it was one of the last novels of the Empire, we should be glad to see placed upon a high shelf; and we would have the shelf high in order that the book might not be thoughtlessly taken up by any one who only sought an evening's entertainment. He will not find it here, but rather two or three days of deep despondency. Indeed, it seems to us to be the most horrible novel we have ever read. It is simply a black picture of corruption. The author's most celebrated work, "Madame Bovary," prepares one for a grim, serious treatment of his subject. That novel, by its faithfulness of execution, its pitiless analysis of character, and, above all, by its moral dignity, stands eminent and almost alone among French novels. The author is a moralist who does not disdain to use in defence of virtue those very weapons that have so long been attacking it. His unflinching severity would be almost terrifying did we not remember how widespread is the plague he was attacking. "Salambo" has shown us what a rare power of description is his. In the present story we see much of the same quality, although at times the descriptions are labored and somewhat tiresome, and the story itself is so painful that admiration is hardly possible. It is the account of the demoralization of a man, a Frenchman, who leads what it would be too severe to call the ordinary life of the time and country, although there is nothing in the book for which numberless examples cannot be found in many an experience. Frederic Moreau, the hero, if we may be allowed to misuse the word, comes to Paris from the provinces, a lad of eighteen or nineteen, with the firm intention of falling in love with some other man's wife. This youth is not, however, especially corrupt, that is to say, he does not sink to this state gradually, but finds this purpose of his set before him ready-made to his hands, as a creditable and ordinary way of making a successful start in life. Such conduct seems to him dangerous enough to be tempting, but not wrong enough to need discussion. He regards it as a matter of course. With a career of corruption, in comparison with which this is purity, we may be sure Flaubert makes no savory tale, nor is it one that will be attractive to any one by its impropriety. That certainly is the last thing one would say about the book. From this beginning the book rolls sternly on to its cynical ending. We watch Moreau exchanging this artificially formed attachment for a real one for the same woman, throwing away all opportunities for working, or for leading a decent life, but we watch without giving our sympathy, for his vice is never gilded, yet with an interest that Flaubert's pitiless power irresistibly demands of the reader. The poor fellow disappoints his doting mother, breaks with his friends, squanders his money, and in return gets nothing but dust and ashes. This is the sum of the book: it is the moralist's view of what is called a life of pleasure. Yet this is in no degree what we might call the grown-up Sunday-school story, where naughty Jack stays away from church, goes sailing, is upset by the squall, and drowns miserably, while Charles listens to the sermon, repeats the text at home, and gets two slices of cake at tea. Such easy solutions of a question always overshoot the mark; there are no more sensitive critics than sinners who may read such books; they well know how to avoid the solemn warnings and to distinguish themselves from the guilty; but in this tale there is no loop-hole, there is no call for fire from heaven to punish the sinner—he perishes by his own devices; he is no unnatural monster of crime, he is only weak, and his gradual fall is as probable and natural as it is sad. The termination of the book, the very last chapter, is the only one which we should find fault with in the matter of workmanship. It has touches of cynicism which are only wilful additions to the bitterness of the whole, as where Deslaurier's wife is said to have run away from him after living with him only a year. The account of the conversations of the Socialists and Republicans, and of the conduct of the mob in the Revolution of 1848, are interesting, as throwing a light on the events in Paris of the last few months.

First Lessons in Greek. By Prof. J. R. Boise. (Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co.)—Greek Lessons. By R. F. Leighton. (Boston: Ginn Bros.)—There has been hitherto no thoroughly satisfactory text-book for beginners in Greek; but this want has at last been supplied by two excellent works, both presenting the same general features, but sufficiently unlike to have each a distinctive character of its own. Both combine—as every book for beginners must do at the present day—grammatical instruction with constant practical exercises, both in translating from Greek into Latin and in forming sentences in Greek. Both are, moreover, merely "methods," omitting all matter that may be found in the grammars, and giving constant references to the grammars, so that the pupil requires both Grammar and Lessons from the first. Prof. Boise's "First Lessons" refers to Hadley's Grammar, and is intended as an introduction to the author's edition of Xenophon's "Anabasis." The lessons consist of very easy sentences, mostly constructed for this purpose, and arranged to illustrate the portions of the grammar successively taken up. When the regular forms of etymology have been gone over in this way, thirteen lessons of "Short Sentences" give practice upon rarer and more irregular forms, and, being taken, with more or less changes, from Xenophon's "Anabasis," serve as a special introduction to that work. These are prepared with a good deal of skill, and altogether the book possesses those qualities of skilful arrangement and expression, accuracy and simplicity, which have given Mr. Boise so distinguished a reputation as an instructor.

Mr. Leighton's "Greek Lessons" is adapted to Goodwin's Grammar, and is preparatory to his Reader, now in press. It is a book of much wider scope than the other, as it contains, besides the "lessons" proper, themselves much more extensive than Boise's, four chapters from the first book of the "Anabasis," and eighteen pages of advanced exercises to be translated into Greek. It is, therefore, no less a special introduction to the "Anabasis" than Prof. Boise's, but it aims further to lead the pupil to a practical command of the language, both in reading and writing. so as to enable him to take hold of any Greek of moderate difficulty. This end is further attained by the method of selecting all or nearly all the sentences for practice from the chapters of the "Anabasis" which follow, by which means a considerably greater range of expression and sentences of greater difficulty can be introduced, than is practicable on the other method. It will be seen that both books possess valuable features, and different teachers may with good reason prefer the one or the other.

Gold and Name, Birth and Education, The Wife of a Vain Man. By Madame Marie Sophie Schwartz. Translated from the Swedish by Miss Selma Borg and Miss Marie E. Brown. (Boston: Lee & Shepard. 1871.)—We cannot give praise to these works of Madame Schwartz, nor yet do they deserve too harsh treatment, for they carry their principal condemnation with them on every page, every page being dull. If novels were not primarily intended to be amusing, these works would be excellent. Their morality is unimpeachable. There are villains, of course, but they are villanously unattractive; so far from being fascinating in their rascality, they rather are such sad specimens of wickedness, that every time they open their mouths their prominent faults are exposed in a way that would well serve as a solemn warning to the youngest and most depraved reader, were it not that his elastic conscience would of a surety tell him that at all events he is nothing near so bad as these people. For instance, there is "The Vain Man," whose wife is the heroine of one of the novels—there never was just such vanity in any being of mortal mould. He is the stupidest kind of caricature of the foible. He has as much vanity as Pecksniff has hypocrisy, while, instead of being amusing, he is an ineffably tiresome bore. Here he is being vain; he is talking to his wife, p. 71:

"'I wish people to see us together, so that every one can say of us that we still live happily after a five years' marriage.' Evart (the vain husband), nodded to Ellen [his doting wife], and left the room. When he had made his toilet, which was no slight affair for him, he returned to his wife, perfumed and dressed with a care which showed how anxious he was to preserve his reputation of a 'handsome man.'

"'I forgot to tell you, Ellen, that I desire you to work more zealously on the second volume of your poems. I think, besides, that you ought never to receive morning calls anywhere but in your study; a literary woman ought to spend her forenoons there, else any one would think you were not such a person. One thing more: the subject of woman's education is now the fashion, and it seems to me you ought to write something about it. Adieu! Do not forget to think of your toilet for the first of May."'

With this the monster leaves. One sees how very vain he is; fastidious about his dress, shutting his wife in her study, lest people should not think her literary, making her choose the fashionable subject to write about, and, finally, encouraging her in thinking of perishable ornaments of dress. Alas! And so he is always. Now, this appears to be as morally useless as it is undeniably feeble. Yet one must read page after page of this delicate delineation of character, while the story languishes, and it is no wonder if the mind by-and-by revolts at such perpetual preaching. Passion and sentiment are all tamed or caricatured to serve the interest of morality and smug sentimentality.

It is, perhaps, better that these novels should be translated than, for instance, those of Miss Mühlbach, with their fatal silliness and often great offensiveness. At any rate, they give us some slight information about Sweden. But nevertheless it is a thing to be regretted, when one remembers how many really excellent novels there are which remain sealed books to those who only read English. A great deal has already been done, but there is still room for more, and it would be a pity if all foreign novels were considered by the average American reader to be divided into only two great classes—one composed of novels unreadable, on account of their impropriety; the other, on account of their feebleness and dulness. There are many which fall into neither class, such as those of Turgeneff, and although these and similarily good works might never become universally popular, there are certainly many who must regret the hour spent over Madame Schwartz who would be only too glad to be able to read the works of some of the ablest novelists now living, and whose enthusiasm for the study of other literatures will only be dampened by such very mediocre tales as those of this lady.

The Institutes of Medicine. By Martyn Paine, A.M., M.D., LL.D. Ninth edition. (New York: Harper & Bros.)—This is a volume which represents the researches and the speculations of its author, upon the themes of physiology, pathology, and therapeutics, for a period of twenty-three years—the period intervening between the appearance of the first and the present or ninth edition. It is addressed to the medical profession; and it presents the substance of what is known of the three subjects we have mentioned. Not being written in ignorance of the latest researches of medical science, its discussions are generally brought well up to date. Its faults are occasional diffuseness and a tendency to theorizing which impair the value of the work as a manual. We note a single sentence in paragraph 638, which covers seven closely printed pages—a quite uncalled-for eccentricity. But the general conscientiousness of the writing and research in this volume merits praise—the more so as a special effort would seem to be making at present to overthrow public faith in the value of medicine as a science. But a few days ago a newspaper as intelligent as the Tribune could puff a new "remedy" for cancer in an editorial article, and say, "We incline generally....to the quacks." Now, as is well known, we have our own opinion as to some of the gentlemen in politics who receive the support of the Tribune, but so distinct an avowal of enmity to honesty in science, and of cordiality towards a class of impostors whose ignorance is not their most dangerous endowment, is in every way indefensible. Dr. Paine's work ranks distinctly upon the side of disinterested science; we wish that its spirit might be transfused into some of our newspapers.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Cornell (J. H.), The Introit—Psalms for Sundays and Holy-Days	(Pott & Amery)	$1 50
Egli (J. J.), Nomina Geographica, Part 3, swd	(B. Westermann & Co)
Hunter (Dr. J. B.), Review of Darwin's Theory, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Hutton (R. H.), The Incarnation and Principles of Evidence	(Pott & Amery)	60
Inside Paris during the Siege	(Macmillan & Co.	2 00
MacDonald (G.), The Portent: a Tale	(A. K. Loring)
Palgrave (F. T.), Lyrical Poems	(Macmillan & Co.)	1 75
Proceedings of the Free Religious Association, swd	(Boston)	35
Roby (H. J.), Grammar of the Latin Language	(Macmillan & Co.)	2 50
The Sower's Reward, swd	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	25
Transactions of the American Philological Association, swd	(Hartford)
Whitney (Mrs. A. D. T.), Zerub Throop's Experiment: a Tale	(A. K. Loring)

YALE AND HARVARD USE

WHITNEY'S GERMAN COURSE,

OTTO'S FRENCH COURSE.

HOLT & WILLIAMS,

PUBLISHERS,

No. 25 Bond Street, New York.

The Publishers issue a very large assortment of works in the same department.

☞ A descriptive catalogue will be sent gratis to any one referring to this advertisement.

AGENTS WANTED TO SELL

EVERY HORSE-OWNER'S CYCLOPÆDIA.

This is the most complete work on the Horse ever published. It is by the best English and American authority, and illustrated with nearly 100 fine engravings representing every disease the horse is subject to, and portraits of the most celebrated horses.

Agents are meeting with unprecedented success, selling from five to ten copies a day. We allow Agents liberal discounts. Any good man can make $30 a week without trouble.

SOLD ONLY BY SUBSCRIPTION.

Send for Circular of Terms, etc., to

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,

PHILADELPHIA.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE PUPIL OF THE LEGION OF HONOR.

BY LOUIS ENAULT.

Translated from the French by Mrs. CHAS. P. TUFT.

8vo, paper, $1; cloth, $1 50.

A most delightful story; pure in tone, elevated in sentiment, and of the greatest interest, it will undoubtedly prove one of the literary successes of the season.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, AUGUST 17, 1871.

The Week.

"THERE be land rats and water rats, land thieves and water thieves," about New York City, and if half that is told about the Health Officer of the port is true, we have in him a very fit companion for the men who have been plastering and repairing the new Court-house. The Health Officer is despotic at the quarantine grounds especially for those months of the year, and over those vessels, in which is done the bulk of our trade with West Indian and other ports, called quarantine ports. The legitimate income of the place is large, having been in 1869 something like $37,000 in fees for mere inspection of vessels; while the gains (net) from vaccination of passengers and fumigating vessels are set at an annual average of more than $20,000. But our present Health Officer, looking about last year for an additional source of income, discovered it in selling to certain persons the sole privilege of towing, lightering, and stevedoring at quarantine—a business which had previously been, as it should be, open to free competition. These persons he permitted to charge about four prices for their work, and with him they divided the spoil, he getting for his services in compelling captains to employ his partners $20,000 down, and $1,250 a week in advance. They broke down under the Health Officer's weight, and this year the same system of pillaging is in force, about three prices being charged instead of four, and Dr. Carnochan manages matters himself without an intermediary. By the bye, the compulsory vaccination of some hundreds of people—it often happens—by a physician of this kind, who is probably very cautious and scrupulous about the lymph he uses, is an agreeable thing to think of. The piratical character of the quarantine arrangements—which, of course, work gross injury to the commerce of the port—may be seen in the comparative cost of getting a three-hundred-ton Cuban brig, with a clean bill of health, into Boston, and of getting her through Dr. Carnochan's hands. At Boston it would probably be $15, more or less, as the vessel would not be fumigated, and the time of delay would be less than half-an-hour. In our harbor she would be fumigated whether or no—or charged for fumigation—and the charge would be $15; she would be charged $55 for towage, which in Boston would cost her $10, and there would be $5 more to "Mr. O'Rourke" for examining hatches. These charges were actually made, and are constantly; and the difference in favor of the port of Boston in the case of the three-hundred-ton brig is $60. Our Health Officer, however, is probably a wealthier man than the Boston one; and has a good deal more political influence. Ours was appointed by Governor Hoffman, who is understood to have made the appointment with a reluctance which, no doubt, is now generally intelligible.

But after the ship-owner has escaped the doctor and his coopers and stevedores, he has the harbor-masters to meet, and, according to the printed charges—which they seem no readier to meet than the Mayor to meet those made against him—they in their turn levy on the commerce of New York an annual tax in the shape of tribute to their private treasuries of not less than a round million of dollars. There are ten of them, all appointed, and all appointed on our rigid American system of securing fitness in office and getting the public economically served—that is to say, they have all rendered services to the party; they all sought the office, and the office did not seek them; some of them know the bow of a canal-boat from the stern; others of them had seen full-rigged ships before their induction to office; and out of the whole ten, it is not estimated that there are many of them who are not thoroughly acquainted with the hereinafter-described system of transacting their business. A clause in the law defining the powers and duties of harbor-masters says that no master of a vessel shall move her from one part of the harbor to another without having obtained permission from the harbor-master in whose district he may happen to be. A shipmaster wishing to get this permission—and from twenty-five to thirty daily may be taken as the number wanting it in each district—he looks about for a harbor-master, whom usually, it is said, the shipmaster cannot find. A certain captain of a tug-boat, however, can always be seen, and the shipmaster finds that in case he can come to an agreement with that person as to the berth at the dock or the position in the stream which he wishes to take, the harbor-master, for his part, never makes any difficulty. Only the shipmaster finds that he must pay to his friend, the tug-boat captain, about four times as much money for towage as he would have to pay in any other waters; and he finds that as long as he remains at the berth a certain sum weekly in advance must be paid to the harbor-master, and that he must stipulate that all his towing shall be done by this particular tug-boat. If he curses and declines to do these things, he is permitted to stay where he is till the use of his reason returns to him, which is in no very long time, as he cannot move his ship without the harbor-master's leave, and, soon or late, moving his ship is a necessity to him—a fact of which our harbor-master was aware before he came down from the interior of the State, even when he first began rendering services to the party. We trust thoughtful and sincere people, without "constitutional objections" to civil service reform, will keep their eyes on the various illustrations that New York is just now furnishing of the condition to which the appointment system has brought a city in which one might have thought business interests and competition would compel something a little more like honesty.

We have had recent proof that the New York community is capable of being aroused; on the 11th and 12th of last month it was certainly in a very vicious temper, and would have turned out a hundred thousand men if necessary to guard the Orangemen walking in procession; but it is beyond a doubt that, despite the noise made in the papers, the city seems to be quite apathetic over the discoveries made in the Comptroller's office. It knew of them before, to be sure, in a general way at least, but one would have supposed that in no city in Christendom could the specified items of account which appeared in the Times have been published without arousing an indignation that would have demanded some definite satisfaction. Here, however, is the way in which Hall talks—and why he shouldn't if he likes it is not easy to see, except that he might in decency be content with the money and be a trifle less impudent. "Threatened men, the old proverb tells us, have long lives. Our friends in the country districts must not be surprised if the City Government of New York apply the principle of this proverb to their own case, and find good reason therein for treating with amiable contempt the furious diatribes now daily launched against them." He adds that "while the Times frets and rages, Comptroller Connolly admirably keeps his temper," which certainly is vastly to his credit, under the circumstances. The Mayor tells us, too, what the expectation of the Tammany leaders is, and there is precious little doubt that, despite the reputability of Mr. Seymour and Mr. Tilden, and other leaders, Hall and his friends are not relying on a reed that will fail them when they expect the party in general to sustain them for the sake of the Tammany voting power. Says the Mayor: "New York City is the great Democratic stronghold of the country. Shake the Democratic hold upon this mighty metropolis, and you shake the Democratic hold upon the Empire State"; shake its hold on the State, and the Republicans must continue in power at the Federal capital, etc. But the country districts will be apt to give the Mayor another response than he is bargaining for.

We suggest to such of our daily contemporaries as may be in search of news in this dull season that they endeavor to get replies in the proper quarters to these two questions: Has the Tweed Arms Company been for some time in the habit of purchasing of the Allen Arms Company such parts of the arms made by the latter as were, by reason of some flaw or imperfection, deemed by the Allen Company unfit for use? And is there any truth in the rumor, which we believe we saw in print in the World, that it is the intention of Mr. Tweed and the other fathers of our city to re-equip, so far as rifles go, the city regiments of the National Guard? Because, in case both these questions can be answered in the affirmative, there will be much solicitude on the part of many young men to retire speedily from military service, especially on days in which ball-cartridge is to be used, and the efficiency of our volunteer force will be much impaired.

The Washington correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette, "H. V. B.," begins one of his late letters with the assertion that "the Conservative Republican theory of Ku-klux outrages must be abandoned," and that the facts brought out by the Congressional Committee to investigate outrages done in the South show that "the loyal people of the North must once more make reconstruction the issue of a political campaign." These last are words of an ominous sound; but we venture to say that the man in the United States to-day in whose ear they would sound most ominous is the professional politician in whose mouth they have been oftenest during the last five years, and within the last ten months; and that not Mr. James M. Ashley himself would care to go on the platform, and undertake to carry the next Presidential election on the issue that reconstruction is not done yet, and, indeed, is to be done all over again. Why? people will ask. And what is the answer that "H. V. B." would give them? He certainly has an impressive one.

He is a good observer, a faithful reporter, a highly intelligent man, by no means immoderate in his opinions and sentiments; and he makes report which, briefly, is to this effect, concerning two prominent witnesses before the committee above-mentioned. One was a general, one a colonel, in the Confederate army; both are to some extent in politics; both are men of consideration in the part of the country where they live as neighbors. One had just been before the committee, had testified in the stereotyped manner—namely, that there was little or no disturbance in his neighborhood; that there was no Ku-klux; that there were no outrages for political reasons—and he called upon his friend, the colonel, to tell him what he had said to the examiners, and to secure perfect agreement between his story and the colonel's. To this the colonel replied that he should tell the exact truth; reminded the general that the "Klan" was in active existence at their home; that it had murdered a certain acquaintance of theirs; that it had met on the general's plantation on the night it rode to kill the murdered man; that he himself had a list of sixty of the gang, some of whom he intended to denounce and punish. All this we are inclined to believe. We are aware of "H. V. B.'s" claims to respect, and are aware, too, that in such matters it is very hard for a Southern gentleman, on his oath before Yankees, to satisfy his mind that he knows with sufficient certainty to swear to things which it is excessively odious to him to concede as true, though he does know perfectly well that they are true, and that he has gone dangerously near to perjury in denying them. Others do perjure themselves out-and-out, and deny; and the perjury and the outrages and the blind folly are all bad enough. But nevertheless, there is not a politician in the country who would have the face to go frankly before the people, and say to them: Six years ago, we began reconstructing the South; you gave us unlimited power, all of which we used and not sparingly; the States are at last in the Union—are there just as New York is; but we find, as we look over them, that we have not changed the nature of the Southern man; we wish, therefore, to take another six years at him. Every act of the Ku-klux, till its final act of disbandment, makes stronger the hold of the Republican party on the country; but though the story of their outrages must of course be heard of from the Republican platform, the platform itself must not be made out of it, or success is hopeless.

Mr. Carl Schurz, who makes about the ablest speech that is now made by any of the leaders of the Republican party, has just been addressing a large meeting of Germans in Chicago. The main difficulties of the South, the Senator said, are two; the one was the banding together of men whose object was to keep down by violence the colored men and the white Unionists, and the other is the administration of the State governments by rapacious and unscrupulous men called carpet-baggers. The remedy for the evils arising from both these causes must, the speaker pointed out, come from the people themselves, and not from penal legislation by Congress; and, in his opinion, relief could come neither from the Republican party nor the Democratic, but must be sought in the union of the good men of both parties. This a general amnesty, which had worked wonders in Missouri in allaying hatred and strife, would greatly promote, and it had been, he thought, far too long delayed, and could not come too soon. As for such penal legislation as the Ku-klux law, Mr. Schurz asserted that it was not in the least true that the Republican party in Congress had passed it out of a desire to strengthen their hold in the Southern States; the party was, as a whole, honest, and intended only to put an end, if it could, to the disorders in that region. Nevertheless, the law was of very evil tendency, because investing the Government with powers more dangerous in effect than the abuse it was sought to correct; the lion would probably keep the wolf away from the sheep, but the wisdom of calling him in for that purpose became apparent when one asks who is to keep the sheep from the lion. There is no safety, he said, for free institutions but in this: that Government shall reign supreme, and that no man, except in periods of extreme peril, shall be entrusted with dictatorial powers—as the fathers used to say in Massachusetts, "to the end that this be a government of laws and not of men"—a saying not well remembered by General Sherman, and the editors who applauded him, when he made his remark the other day about the "nonsense" of Mr. Adams's assertion that the law in question was in theory subversive of our Government, and might yet become so in fact. But it is, indeed, true that we have been so accustomed to extreme measures of late years as to forget some of the simplest and most necessary of our political maxims. We are doing better, however; and this speech of Mr. Schurz is good as calling us back to the ancient landmarks. For the rest, the Senator spoke in condemnation of the San Domingo scheme, and said that his personal relations with the President had never been anything but friendly, a personal statement which might as well have been omitted, but was coupled with a deserved rebuke to a certain Republican journal, which, in the height of the San Domingo discussion, adjured Mr. Schurz and Mr. Sumner to lay aside "their personal differences" with the President.

Cotton is lower, but with some tendency to an upward reaction. The crop at the far South is fully a week earlier than last year, while in the Northern tier of cotton States it is at least as early, a circumstance which materially improves the prospective yield. At almost all the Southern ports, the first bales of the new crop are now arriving. Breadstuffs have further declined, but are now firmer, under a decline in ocean freights and a prospective export demand. Meats are lower than ever. The great centres of the cattle trade, St. Louis and Chicago, are overrun with the Texas cattle, which were to bring untold wealth to the new railroads through Kansas, Arkansas, and the Indian Territory north of the Texas frontier, but which are now scarcely salable at any price. Cut meats and other provisions are likewise lower, the decline having resulted in ruinous losses, though there is now an appearance of greater steadiness in the markets. General trade is dull, although the great decline in the prices of all leading staples necessarily leads to some business movement. The imports from abroad are extraordinarily large, and very sanguine anticipations are indulged in concerning the fall trade. The decline in wages in some industries, and the very great fall in the principal building materials, has induced some activity in the house-building trade, although many houses erected last year remain unsold, and although the number of mechanics' liens and foreclosures of mortgages continues to increase steadily. There is no change of note in coal. In addition to the advantages of the decline in bread and meat, the people are blessed with an abundance of choice fruit at low figures, the only drawback to which is the wastage of this priceless boon in consequence of our worse-than-barbarous system of gathering, packing, and marketing.

Money continues cheap and abundant, with here and there a faint indication of an increasing demand. Stocks have been somewhat more active at rather higher prices, but without visible cause. Gold is firmer, chiefly owing to a speculative movement to intensify the effect of the diminishing stock at the disposal of the community. Foreign exchange, from the same cause, is lower, since the scarcity of gold prevents or retards the purchase of bills. In the dearth of employment for money in Europe, American mining companies are again becoming conspicuous in London. Several large mineral properties have recently been disposed of for fabulous sums by Cable, showing the great advantage of the telegraph to the seller of such properties. The buyers will have time to discover these advantages more at their leisure. But there is no doubt that the recent discoveries in Utah and on the northern shore of Lake Superior are of great magnitude and importance.

The long-talked-of proposition for the prolongation of M. Thiers's term of office has finally been made in the National Assembly. The mover was M. Rivet, of the Left Centre, and the most important points were these: that the title of President of the Republic be conferred upon M. Thiers; that his powers be prolonged for a period of three years; that he be entrusted with the promulgation and execution of the laws, and with the right to appoint Cabinet ministers and diplomatic, military, and naval functionaries; and that the members of his Cabinet be responsible for their acts to the Assembly. This proposition was met by a counter-motion from the Extreme Right, expressing confidence in the Chief of the Executive, and continuing his present powers. M. Thiers himself is reported to have demanded a vote on the urgency of the motions, which was declared amid great excitement, and to the discomfiture, as it seems, of the Right, which was inclined to stave off action in the matter. No further decision, however, has as yet taken place. On the other hand, the Right has carried the Indemnification Bill, which provides compensation for losses and damages sustained in the provinces during the war, against the strenuous opposition of M. Thiers, who favored only relief for needy sufferers; and the Decentralization Bill, which bestows considerable power on the departmental Councils-General, against the remonstrances of the Left, whose orators, and among them Louis Blanc, exerted themselves to show that decentralization, beginning with the departments instead of with the communes, was an aristocratic measure, calculated to throw the power into the hands of the wealthy. To such arguments the majority was the less inclined to listen as the result of the elections of July 30 in Paris, supplementary to the municipal election of the 23d of that month, has shown a decided reawakening of Commune proclivities in the masses of the capital, disagreeably contrasting with the shocking apathy of the friends of order. The defiant tone of some of the Commune prisoners before the courts-martial must be equally provoking to the majority of the Assembly.

One of the first actions of the new Municipal Council of Paris, to which not only such Radicals as Clémenceau and Lockroy, but also members of the late Commune like Ranc and the notorious Mottu, have been elected among many others not particularly friendly to the victrix causa, was the sending of a deputation to Versailles to ask from M. Thiers the removal of the seat of Government to the metropolis. The answer of the Chief of the Executive was evasive, and by no means satisfactory. Nor is he likely to return to Paris as long as the German guns frown down upon it from the forts on the north and east. Their evacuation, however, will not be delayed much longer, though the report of an agreement concerning a speedy retirement of the army of occupation to near, or even beyond, the new frontier of France turns out to have been premature. M. Thiers is said to be in favor of large armaments, which, if true, may have some reference to contingencies which might possibly arise from the success or failure of the more than simply amicable arrangements which not only the Emperors of Germany and Austro-Hungary, but also their advisers, are meeting at Gastein to establish. This meeting, the closely preceding one of the Emperor William with the Czar, and the intentions of Russia concerning affairs both in the East and West, are the themes of much speculation in the press, but speculation mostly of a very vague and idle character. Whether the dissolution, reported without comment, of the Vienna Reichsrath and the provincial diets of Cisleithan Austria, is the result of some final action decided upon by the Hohenwart Ministry, in matters and on grounds of internal policy, or whether it is to be brought into connection with the aims of the Imperial conference at Gastein, may also be considered a puzzling matter of conjecture.

As interesting as any of the European news is that which speaks of the difficulties of the Ultramontanes in Germany, and of the difficulties also which those gentlemen occasion the secular authorities by their violence of conduct and language. Their newspapers rail at a great rate, and should they do all they are promising, the prospect of troublous times for several European monarchies is extremely good. One of these papers, addressing "ye powerful of the earth"—Gladstone, Bismarck, Beust, Andrássy—tells them that "either they will restore to the church all its rights, or not one of the present governments will remain in existence." Another of them threatens kings with destruction, and tells them that though they may hold the thrones the Holy Father has the people, and that he will use them for the uprooting of his enemies. The patience of Catholics is exhausted, it says. The infallibilist bishops rain excommunications on the recalcitrant professors, and the infallibilist missionary priests, going into the parishes of their opponents, invite the parishioners to assault their pastors. Meantime comes from the letter-writers the curious story, which avers that the Pope is out of all conceit of his Jesuit advisers, and has it for one of his principal pleasures nowadays to remind them that he always told them how it would be; that they have brought him to a nice pass; that they would not let him be a Liberal, as he wished to be, and that the result is what they see—all which, says the letter-writer, dejects the Jesuit advisers very much, and correspondingly elates and rejoices the other advisers. But both sections are said to be equally and excessively disgusted by an alleged intention of the Holy Father to appoint his own successor by bull.

As for the Ultramontanes in Prussia, where they are, if anything, rather more violent than anywhere else, it almost appears as if Bismarck was preparing for an "inner Sadowa," or as we ought, perhaps, now to say, for an inner Sedan. He has, from his place of retirement, Varzin, thrown down the gauntlet to the extreme churchmen, who have assumed an almost disloyal attitude towards the Empire, and seems to be in no mood to withdraw his challenge. Not only has the Prussian Minister of Worship and Instruction, Dr. Von Mühler—formerly a most zealous protector of the Catholic interests—energetically baffled the assumptions of the Bishop of Ermeland, in East Prussia, who excommunicated and removed an anti-infallibilist teacher in his diocese, and of the Archbishop of Breslau, who suspended an anti infallibilist priest in Upper Silesia—and everybody admits that Von Mühler has acted thus at the dictation of the rusticating Chancellor—but the Prussian Government has gone a step further, and abolished the separate ecclesiastical departments, Catholic and Evangelical, introduced thirty years ago in the Ministry of Worship and Instruction, and united them into one common department for "spiritual affairs.' The liberal construction given to this change by the organs of the Chancellor, and the undivided approval with which it was received by the public at large, add to the bitterness which the measure in itself was so apt to engender in the irritated minds of the German Ultramontanes, and the tone of the religious and political controversies between them and their opponents—whether Protestants or Döllingerites—grows from day to day more excited.

THE RECENT CHANGE IN THE INDIAN BUREAU.

A FEW days ago, Mr. Ely S. Parker, late Commissioner of Indian Affairs, retired from office. The letter announcing his resignation stated, in a tone of irritation and complaint, that the office had been reduced to a mere clerkship, and gave this fact as the reason for his throwing up the position. The President has appointed Mr. Felix R. Brunot, of Pittsburg, to fill the vacancy. The newspapers have scarcely noticed this occurrence, and yet in it we have the issue of a contest which has been waged at Washington since the inauguration of President Grant; in it we have a revolution in a most important branch of public affairs; in it we have, for the time at least, the complete overthrow of a most gigantic system of wrong, robbery, hypocrisy, greed, and cruelty, and the triumph of right, of official integrity, of administrative economy, and of the principles of a Christian civilization. That our readers may fully understand what has been accomplished by the persistent efforts of a few good men, impelled solely by considerations of public duty and welfare, and how they have at last put down an evil which was entrenched in all the high places at Washington, and which had its connections and supporters in all parts of the country, we propose to describe the operations of the Indian Bureau, and the changes made in it which led to the retirement of Mr. Commissioner Parker.

The Government might adopt one or the other of two alternatives in its treatment of the Indians. It might exterminate them rapidly and relentlessly; or it might seek to protect, to civilize, and to Christianize them. In theory, it has chosen the latter alternative. The practical administration of its Indian affairs, however, has rather been based upon the former, and has even been made the worse by the element of hypocrisy which the civilizing and Christianizing theory has necessarily introduced. The business of the Government growing out of its relations with the Indians is transacted through the Indian Office, a bureau of the Interior Department. Over this bureau is placed the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who is practically responsible for the management of the office, although under the general supervision of the Secretary of the Interior. Amid the very numerous and very different duties of his department, the Secretary has of course neither the time nor the opportunity to interfere with the details of the Indian Office, and he is probably not informed as to what takes place therein, unless some important question is directly brought to his personal attention by appeal. Until the last year, the Territorial governors were superintendents of Indian affairs within their respective jurisdictions. Agents are also distributed among the various tribes, who come into personal contact with the Indians, and are the means of all ordinary communication between them and the Government. In accordance with the provisions of various treaties, and with a policy which has long prevailed, immense sums of money are appropriated each year by Congress for the support of the Indians. A portion of this money is to be paid directly to the tribes or to their chiefs, but the larger part is to be expended in the purchase, transportation, and distribution of supplies.

Here lies both the source of the corruption which has made the Indian Bureau a disgrace to the Government, and the opportunity for the "Indian Ring" which has long intercepted so large a part of the public bounty destined for the savages, and which has grown so strong by its powerful connections, both political and commercial, at the East and at the West, that its overthrow has seemed impossible. This Ring was politically strong, for it rendered important partisan services, and its members were to be found in both Houses of Congress. Much of the Indian appropriations was actually expended for purposes purely political. The Territorial governors, as Indian superintendents, were expected to use all their patronage, and all the appliances so well known to "men inside politics," to secure the control of each new-formed State as it emerged from a Territorial condition. These expenditures, however, were merely for the sake of preserving power; the greater part of the Indian appropriations kept up its steady flow, undisturbed by any obstacle or opposition, into the pockets of the fortunate members of the Ring. The methods by which the money was intercepted on its way to the Indians were as numerous as the ingenuity of greed and dishonesty could invent. An army of contractors preyed upon the Bureau, and amassed vast fortunes by furnishing and transporting the most worthless supplies at the most exorbitant prices; others presented themselves beyond the confines of civilization and the reach of the law, at the time of annual payments to the tribes, and boldly demanded, and, by the connivance of agents, received, under the pretence of services rendered, a large percentage of the moneys as due to themselves; agencies were frequently sold to the highest bidder, who of course reimbursed himself with unlimited interest from the appropriations which passed through his hands. It is well known that most of the Indian wars have been caused by the violations of treaty obligations, these frauds for which the nation itself was held responsible; and the wars in turn reacted upon the "Ring," making it bolder and stronger; for war required more supplies, more transportation, more contracts, and more plunder. This is the system which a tempest of righteous popular indignation ought to have swept away, but which has required years of earnest labor from some of the best and ablest citizens of the country even to check.

President Grant seems to have been convinced that a reform in the administration of Indian affairs was necessary. Military man as he was, he favored a kindly and Christianlike treatment, rather than measures of repression and reprisal. Soon after his inauguration, he called upon the two Societies of Friends to nominate the superintendents for two of the many superintendencies, and to appoint and supervise the agents which were to be stationed in these districts. It is not probable that he was then familiar with the frauds and iniquities which had long been practised through the Indian Office, but his eyes were soon opened. A delegation of influential gentlemen from Philadelphia, including Mr. Eli K. Price, Mr. William Strong, now Justice of the Supreme Court, Mr. William Welsh, and others, waited upon the President and the Secretary of the Interior, and revealed the whole truth. This committee was acting primarily in behalf of schemes for civilizing and Christianizing the Indians, but incidentally in the interests of an economical and honest administration. It succeeded in convincing the President and Secretary that Indian civilization was impossible without a reformation in the department through which the Government holds intercourse with the tribes. At the suggestion of these gentlemen, the President and Secretary promised to recommend the creation of a board of unpaid commissioners, who should have joint control with the Secretary of the Interior over appropriations for the benefit of the Indians. The recommendation was speedily and earnestly made. Congress responded to the suggestion, and passed the required statute; and the President appointed as such commissioners some of the ablest, purest, and best citizens of the country. This was the first blow which the Ring received, but though a staggering one, it was not fatal, and the monster soon recovered all its original vitality and vigor.

In the meantime, the President had appointed as Commissioner of Indian Affairs and head of the Bureau General Ely S. Parker, who had been one of his military family, to whom he was warmly attached, and in whom he had the highest personal confidence. Mr. Parker is himself an Indian, hereditary chief of one of the Western New York tribes, and it was supposed that his sympathies would secure protection and justice for the whole race. He did not, however, co-operate with the advisory board. He thought, as he states in a published letter, that the power of supervision and joint control given to the board would produce confusion in his office. Through his influence with the President the law was virtually nullified, and, although it was soon apparent that the Ring was managing Mr. Parker as it had managed his predecessors, the advisory commissioners were unable to effect any important reforms in the management of the Bureau under the statute as it originally stood. Congress, therefore, at its next session, passed another statute so stringent in its terms that evasion seemed impossible. It directed and required the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to call upon the board of unpaid commissioners to aid in the purchase and inspection of goods, and to supervise all expenditures of money appropriated to the Indians. But even this peremptory command of the legislature was not enough. Mr. Parker nullified the statute by calling upon the board to aid in the purchase and inspection of dry goods only, which form a very small part of the supplies procured by the Bureau. From the evidence afterwards laid before a committee of Congress, it appears that, in the face of the law, he made private contracts at exorbitant prices for stores, provisions, transportation, and the like, without conferring with the board. The system of evasion was carried to such an extent that one of the commissioners determined to test the efficiency of the law in the most formal manner. In December last, he presented a communication to the Secretary of the Interior, setting forth all the foregoing facts in detail. This letter and the charges therein were referred to a committee of Congress. After a long and careful investigation, the committee made a report during the past winter, fully sustaining all the facts alleged; they pronounced the commissioner incompetent and neglectful; they found that affairs in his Bureau were conducted in direct violation of express provisions of the law; they simply absolved him from any personal complicity with the fraudulent practices. On the footing of their report, the committee recommended a further measure as a thorough and complete remedy, which Congress at once enacted into a law. It provides that the signature of the executive committee of the board of commissioners shall be a prerequisite for the full payment of every draft upon the Treasury for money appropriated to the Indians. Mr. Parker placed a construction upon this statute which greatly limited its efficacy, and decided that its restrictions applied only to contracts which might be entered into by the Bureau, and that he was left free to disburse moneys through the agents and superintendents without the supervision of the board. A number of vouchers, similar in their character to those of the prior year, were actually paid by the Treasury under this ruling. An appeal was taken to the Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Delano overruled the Commissioner, and decided that all drafts upon the Treasury for moneys appropriated to the Indians must first pass under the supervision of the executive committee of the board. The resignation of Mr. Commissioner Parker followed immediately upon this decision of the Secretary; it was this act which had, as he complained, reduced his office to a mere clerkship.

What the board of unpaid commissioners have already accomplished in the way of economy may be learned from one or two examples which we take from numerous similar instances. During the past year, over $179,000 were paid to one company under a private contract made by General Parker for the transportation of Indian goods up the Missouri River. This year, the contracts being let under the supervision of the board, the same transportation company has agreed to carry an equal weight of goods, over the same route and for the same distance, for a little more than $20,000. A contractor who furnished cattle the past year at exorbitant rates, has made bids for the like supplies during the present year. The prices paid him last year were 133 per cent. greater than his bids for the present year, although cattle are higher in Texas now than then.

It is plain, from the foregoing facts, that a reform has been commenced and carried on in the face of a determined opposition, unprecedented in the history of the Government. The snake has been scotched, but we are afraid not yet killed. Already the Ring is moving. On Friday, August 11, the following item appeared in the Washington correspondence of most or all of the New York daily newspapers: "It is believed here, by persons who profess to know, that the new Indian Commissioner is so strongly in sympathy with the Indians that he will be very much embarrassed in dealing with them and, at the same time, complying with the provisions of the law, which are not in accord with his broad views on the Indian question." This is mendacious to the last degree; it is a feeler sent out by the Ring. The laws, as we have seen, are favorable to the interests of the Indian; Mr. Brunot's influence was strongly exerted in favor of their enactment; they are in exact "accord" with his "broad views." It is not the laws, but the violation of the laws, to which he is opposed. The violators fear him, and will seek every means for his overthrow. But we have confidence in the result. Congress has done well; the President has done well; and it is cheering to the friends of Indian civilization, and of an honest and capable civil service, to learn that the Secretary of the Interior is anxious and urgent that Mr. Brunot should accept the most responsible position which the President has offered him. All that is now needed is the support of an enlightened and determined public opinion. Let this be aroused, and the Ring is crushed.

OUR DUTY AS REGARDS CHINA.

The doctrines of international law took their rise among the communities of Europe, and their application has, with a few exceptions, been confined to the Christian states of the European and the American continents. For a long time the Mohammedan countries of Southeastern Europe and of Northern Africa, although powerful in arms and possessing a considerable degree of civilization, were treated as not having the rights, and as not subjected to the duties, which the international code upholds and imposes. The change from this condition was gradual; and it was at a comparatively recent period that the great Ottoman empire was admitted to the freedom of the European powers. What has been true of the Mohammedan peoples has been true in a more marked manner still of the great heathen peoples of Asia. From their ignorance of the geography and of the politics of the world, and especially from the absence among them of those great principles of moral right and duty which underlie the whole system of modern international jurisprudence, it has been impossible to act towards them as equals, as independent, and as sovereign. In respect to them, the very postulate upon which the code of nations is built up, that all states are sovereign, independent, and equal, has failed. As they have admitted no equality, but have treated all other communities as outside barbarians; as they ignore, and perhaps cannot understand, the notion of an interstate faith, and of the obligations of solemn compacts; as they have endeavored to draw about themselves an impassable barrier, and thus to keep a large part of the earth closed to the needs and activities of civilization, it has been necessary to make approaches to them by force; to repress and punish at once, without any preliminary negotiation and with great severity, all breaches of good faith and all injuries to foreign private citizens; to demand and exact concessions of commercial freedom and of official intercourse with the bayonet and artillery, rather than by peaceful embassies. We do not now discuss the morality of this procedure, but only state the historical fact.

These means and measures have been used towards the two great empires of Eastern Asia, China and Japan. Two years ago, it was supposed by many in America, and perhaps by some in Europe, that China was entering upon a new course of international action. The embassy sent out under Mr. Burlingame was taken to be an announcement by the highest authority that this empire, beside which the states of Europe are the creatures of a day, possessing a civilization wonderful in its character, but hoary and decrepit with age, which had for centuries been taken as the type of formation and fixedness, was about to commence a new development of energy and greatness under the guidance of the principles and practices which the modern international code inculcates and enforces. These expectations have failed. The hopes of Christendom—religious, political, and mercantile—have been disappointed; and the problem of the relations between the civilized world and China stands yet unsolved. Can it be that the rifle and the shell are the only solvents? In order to understand the exact conditions of this problem, and the nature of our relations with China, we must refer to the important provisions of existing treaties.

Prior to the year 1858, foreigners were rigorously confined to a few points upon the coast; intercourse with the natives, except in these small districts, was forbidden; official communications and negotiations were carried on through inferior officials, approach to the Emperor, and even to his higher ministers, being refused. There were a few occasions when these strict rules were waived or suspended, but they were temporary and exceptional, and did not change the general conduct and disposition of the Chinese Government. The great nations of Europe had long demanded that their representatives should reside at Peking, near the court of the Emperor, and be admitted to his presence, and that they should transact their affairs with his privy council or immediate ministers. This demand had been steadily rejected. In 1857, upon the occurrence of some local outrage, Great Britain and France united their forces with an avowed and common design to bring the Chinese Government to terms. Their combined armies, after overcoming all opposition at the coast, penetrated the country until they reached Tien-tsin, ninety miles from Peking. The Russian minister and the American minister, Mr. Reed, accompanied this expedition, ready to obtain for their respective countries any advantage which might result from it, but taking no part as actors in the invasion. At Tien-tsin, the army was met by commissioners from the Emperor, who negotiated a treaty with each of the powers represented—Great Britain, France, Russia, and the United States. That concluded with the United States is known as the Treaty of Tien-tsin, and was signed June 18, 1858. Article I. pledges the good offices and help of the United States in bringing about the amicable settlement of disputes between China and other nations. Articles IV.–X. relate to the official intercourse and communication between the representatives of the United States and the Chinese Government. This intercourse is ordinarily to be carried on with the local governors, but the American minister, upon matters of business, and not oftener than once in each year, may visit the capital, and there confer with members of the privy council. It is added, however, that if the representatives of other powers shall be permitted to reside at Peking, the American minister shall be entitled to the same privilege. United States consuls may be appointed for the ports which shall be opened to commerce. Articles XI.–XIII. promise protection to the persons and property of American citizens residing within the districts open to them. Article XIV. makes seven ports free to foreign commerce and residents. Their number was increased to eleven by subsequent treaties with other powers. Articles XV.–XXIII. prescribe minute regulations of commerce at these ports. Article XXIX. is so important in its spirit that we quote it in full: "The principles of the Christian religion, as professed by the Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches, are recognized as teaching men to do good, and to do to others as they would have men do to them. Hereafter, those who quietly profess and teach these doctrines shall not be harassed or persecuted on account of their faith. Any persons, whether citizens of the United States or Chinese converts, who, according to their tenets, shall peaceably teach and practise the principles of Christianity, shall in no case be interfered with or molested." Finally: "If any other right, privilege, or favor, connected with either navigation, or commerce, or political or other intercourse, which is not given by this treaty, shall be given to any other nation, or to the citizens of any other nation, it shall immediately enure to the benefit of the United States and of American citizens." The treaties concluded at the same time, or soon thereafter, with Great Britain, France, and Russia opened four more ports to foreign trade and residence, declared the navigation of the Yang-tse-kiang free to all nations, permitted foreigners to travel through the country, and conceded the most important point, that representatives of the treaty powers might reside near the court at Peking. The United States, of course, took the benefit of all these additional stipulations. It should be remembered that these concessions—and we shall see that China has granted no others—were made in the face of a victorious army of invasion, after all resistance had been overcome, and when the capital of the Emperor lay at the mercy and within the grasp of the British and French forces. Not one of them was due to a desire for more intimate and friendly relations, nor to any feeling or movement in harmony with the civilization of Christendom.

In 1868, the embassy headed by Mr. Burlingame arrived in the United States. We need not recall to our readers the enthusiasm with which it was received, nor the glowing professions and predictions which were made in its behalf. The American people and the chief of the embassy seemed to have been carried away by a common excitement, at least in all of their public displays towards each other. Old China was now, under the auspices and guidance of the young Republic, about to renew its youth, to cast away the habits of thought and customs of centuries, and to us and to our peaceful policy was due the credit of this greatest political revolution of modern times. Such was the bright anticipation; but how meagre and empty the result! The convention of July 4, 1868, which was entitled "Additional articles to the treaty of 1858," did not grant a single new concession, or privilege, or favor to the United States or to its citizens. Stripped of their unmeaning professions of good feeling, every clause recognized and protected and perpetuated the traditional policy of the Chinese Government. These eight additional articles affirm the Emperor's dominion over the districts opened to foreign residence, and his jurisdiction over persons and things therein; declare that all internal commerce, except as may have been expressly regulated by prior treaties, shall be subject to the discretion of the Imperial Government; permit Chinese consuls in American ports; provide that citizens of the United States in China, and Chinese subjects in America, shall have liberty of conscience, and shall not be persecuted; and place American citizens in respect to trade or residence upon the same footing as those of the most favored nation. Article V., in set terms, recognizes the right of man to change his home and allegiance, and acknowledges the advantages of free migration from one country to another for curiosity, trade, or permanent residence. After this appropriate preamble, we might have anticipated that additional and greater privileges of commercial or other intercourse were to have been conferred. But no such thing was contemplated. This is only the preface to a clause prohibiting compulsory emigration. Chinese subjects are to enjoy the same privileges in the public educational institutions under the control of the United States as are granted to the subjects of the most favored nation. The same favor is given to American citizens in China. There is something exquisitely ludicrous about this stipulation. We suppose it must refer to our West Point and Annapolis military and naval schools, but to what Chinese seminaries it can refer we are ignorant. Finally, the United States disclaims all right and intention of interfering with the domestic affairs of China; but should the Emperor determine to establish a system of railways and other internal improvements, and apply for engineers to aid in their construction, the United States promises to furnish them. Mr. Burlingame and his fellow-commissioners were received very quietly, and perhaps coldly, in England. Our newspapers, oddly enough, said it was because the people and government were deeply chagrined at the triumph of American diplomacy. In due time, similar treaties were concluded with Great Britain and some others of the European powers. If these conventions have any meaning at all, and are not mere idle words, their implied effect is to bind the great contracting powers to treat with China diplomatically in the same manner in which all other states acknowledging the international law are treated—in other words, that there shall be no show of force, and à fortiori no resort to force, for the punishment of local outrages until negotiations with the central government have been tried and exhausted, and then force must mean and be open, acknowledged war. We say this result is implied from the fact of the treaties themselves; it is nowhere expressly set forth, nor is there a positive stipulation creating any additional right or privilege.

In the meantime, during the years 1867, 1868, and 1869, local outrages upon foreigners were becoming more frequent and serious. They soon took the shape of a combined and widely-extended assault upon Christianity, upon native converts, and especially upon the missionaries. Charges of the most terrible character against the religious teachers were put forth in an official form, and widely circulated. A book, purporting to be an exposure of Christianity, and filled with the most revolting falsehoods, was issued, evidently under the sanction of high authority, and sent out by thousands to inflame the ignorant zeal of the common people. We may remark, in passing, that the Chinese seem to be familiar with the trick, not unknown in some Western countries, of manufacturing a desired public opinion by the free use of governmental appliances, and then of appearing to be driven into a certain line of policy by the overwhelming force of this same public opinion. The movement which we have thus briefly described at length culminated in the massacre of Tien-tsin, which was openly abetted and promoted by the local officials, and at which all Christendom stood aghast. The immediate sufferers were principally under French protection, but all the resident foreign ministers at Peking supported the demands of the French representative for redress. The Chinese Government prevaricated and delayed, but at last sentenced a few of the subordinate local officers to death, leaving those of high and responsible rank unpunished, and promised to pay a sum of money as indemnity. Recent intelligence shows that affairs are fast approaching a crisis. The Imperial Government not only refuses to pay the promised indemnity, but has made a formal demand upon the foreign ambassadors "that schools for the education of females be abolished; that the teaching to male subjects of the empire of all doctrines opposed to those of Confucius be forbidden; that missionaries shall be considered Chinese subjects; and that women shall not be permitted access to the empire in that capacity."

The action is a carefully planned violation of a most important article of the Treaty of 1858, an article expressly reaffirmed in 1868. Coming as a sequel of the Tien-tsin massacre, it is a studied insult not only to France, but to all the great treaty powers. What is the duty of our own Government under these circumstances? The United States cannot in general be engaged in religious propagandism; but as we have twice stipulated for the toleration of Christianity and the protection of Christian teachers and converts, we are estopped from denying the propriety of a further protection. There are, however, reasons of state policy why the Government should act in a quick, decided, and peremptory manner. The repudiated stipulation is the key of the whole position. Its rejection is a return to the old system of absolute exclusion in all things; this is the first step, an experiment, perhaps, and, if successful, the others will surely and speedily follow. If we yield upon this point, the whole fabric of treaties, raised with so much labor, and at the cost of not a little blood, will fall like a house of cards. We do not urge action simply in the interests of religious missions; we urge it in the interests of commerce and of civilization. There should be no weak hesitation in the use of force. The events of the past twelve years prove beyond a doubt that diplomatic negotiation will accomplish nothing. Neither America nor Europe can again be amused or deceived by another Burlingame embassy. The United States and the other great powers should unite in a demand, accompanied by a sufficient display of force, that the Chinese Government shall recede from its present position, shall reaffirm the violated treaties, and shall give ample reparation for past and security against future outrages. Unless this demand is complied with at once, China must be taught, in such a manner that the lesson cannot be forgotten, the advantages of preserving international faith.

SCOTT'S BIRTHDAY.

SCOTT is now somewhat faded, it is common to say; and undeniably it is true to say so. We may even concede that, had he been an Englishman or an American, had he been the glory of any people less fervid in patriotism than the people whose country was his and which he loved so well, we should not now be celebrating his anniversary. It was, of course, inevitable that such fame as his should fade. But it is as inevitable that no fading will ever deprive it wholly of its brightness, and that there will always be honor for this new creator of the art of story-telling, and affectionate esteem for this most manly of men. Unless we feel too much of it, we of to-day can hardly feel at all our fathers' delighted and wondering admiration for this extraordinary genius. They had been reading dull romances, and he gave them, month after month, from his inexhaustible brain, stories which still, after we have listened to the countless multitude of the story-tellers whom he called into being, are a delight to old and young. They were absorbed in fierce discussions of fundamental problems of politics and of society itself, and he called them away and showed them, truly or falsely—truly and falsely, we may say—the beauty there was in the past which he so sincerely reverenced. And besides peopling the past for them with that wonderful throng of men and women—queens, kings, captains, knights, churls and barons, priests, outlaws and statesmen, wizards, ghosts, lovers—besides vivifying history for them, he educated their tastes also, and gave them higher views and a keener enjoyment both of nature and of art. It was of him they learned not only how to "view fair Melrose aright," that mediæval art was not a thing of horror, but the loveliness and the sublimity of mountain, lake, forest, river, and sky. He himself had sat at the feet of others perhaps greater than he, and had learned of them; possibly, his Highland nurses and their old-world songs and tales might not have awaked and fed to full strength the Gothic genius within him, had not Goethe already told the story of "Goetz of the Iron Hand," and the youthful Schiller embodied in Charles Moor some of the storm and stress of the time; but wherever he learned it, it was he who brought to our fathers the message, and it is little wonder that they accorded him a reverence which to us already seems, if right for them to give, yet more than we ourselves can yield.

But it may be doubted if our children will not be paying him as much homage as we, and if nearly all of him that was perishable has not already fallen away, leaving him to stand as now for generations yet to come. The first poet of his time he will never be again. There may be, as there have been, disputes as to whether the divine gift was really his at all, and if his "thumping metrical romances" merit the title of poems; but the boys, and the men, too, of 1971 will have better fortune than can well be hoped for them if, when next the great Scotchman's birthday is commemorated, they have found poetry more spirited, gallant, inspiriting, pictorial, honest, and human than they may read where Lord Marmion beards the Douglas, and rides across the quivering drawbridge; or King James joins battle with Surrey; or Roderic's men start from the heather, and vanish again at the black chieftain's signal; or day sets "on Norham's castled steep and Tweed's fair river"; or the stag makes his midnight lair in lone Benvoirlich; or the luckless page sings the boding song to her betrayer as they ride towards Flodden Field. We may venture to predict that to love this poetry will still, a hundred years from now, be an education in manliness as surely and truly as to love the Lady Elizabeth Howards of that day will be a liberal education.

And so, also, of the novels. There will, doubtless, be many a story-teller to help the many there have already been to draw away a portion of the public over which Scott once reigned sole sovereign. The Thackerays, Dickenses, Eliots, Hawthornes, and Reades of the future, each magician in turn as he exercises his spell and moves forward to his appointed and permanent place in literature, must of necessity draw away to himself some portion of the crowd which belongs to the moment, and belongs to him, as to Scott in his day and to every other, only as he himself belongs to the moment. Of more consequence than this, the critic and student will come, as they have come, and show how shallow was the philosophy of history and how insufficient was the historical knowledge, and how strong the prejudice, behind that wonderful painted stream of mediæval life; what gloom where the dazzled eye of the poet saw fictitious brightness; what necessary and beneficent forces where the poet could perceive only a headlong and devastating stream of disorderly movement miscalled progress; what selfishness and cruelty where the lover of aristocracy would discover chivalry and gallantry alone; what sublimity of devotion and firmness and enlightenment of conviction where fierce and blinded fanaticism was all that Scott could find. Further, they will show us the Romanist and the reactionist expressing their gratitude, and the Protestant and republican their grief, that the greatest literary influence of the time was cast on the side of the Roman Church and was adverse to the Reformation; John Henry Newman and George Borrow alike counting him as an effective preacher of Romish doctrine, and Charles, Saint and Martyr, getting profusely the veneration denied or but scantily accorded to Cromwell and Knox.

All this is doubtless true, and perhaps to be regretted; though if there is one thing in the world that we may probably be safe in remitting to the exclusive charge of Providence, it is past history. The doctrine that whatever was is right, may no doubt be affirmed without dread, and with no limitations. But be that as it may, after they have made the necessary deductions from Scott's claim, where will it be that our posterity, in the last quarter of the coming century, will have found their better story-teller? Will it be some one whom we have with us now, or have had with us, who will be thought to have beaten the "Antiquary"? Will "Vanity Fair," or "Pickwick," or "Adam Bede" be more read than "Ivanhoe" and "The Heart of Mid-Lothian," and the "Bride of Lammermoor" and "Waverley" and "Old Mortality"? Will our grandchildren know Clive Newcome, and Becky Sharp, and Henry Esmond, and Mr. Pickwick, and Mr. Squeers better, and be the better for knowing them better, than they will know Dugald Dalgetty and Dirck Hatterick and Dominie Sampson and Jeanie Deans and Meg Merrilies and Edie Ochiltree and Monkbarns and Rob Roy? Or will it be some novelist of their own? So far as we of to-day can judge, whatever they find in Scott's successors, as known to us, great as several of them have been, they will not find a work or a set of works which can ever balance that wonderful series of volumes which have held the last three generations captive; they will not find what will supersede that wonderful series of "Scotch novels." That is their appropriate name, no doubt; for though Rebecca and Rowena and Count Robert and King Louis and Charles and Richard and Saladin and Leicester and poor Amy Robsart and Elizabeth are immortal in his pages, and though we watch with him the combat beside the Syrian fountain, or thread the streets of Paris, or climb mountain-passes of Switzerland, or wander with Wayland Smith through English lanes, or take water with Raleigh on the Thames; nevertheless, of all the wide lands which we visit with him, and of all the men and women that people them, it is in Scotland and among his own countrymen and countrywomen that he is immeasurably best. Not only physically, but in all ways, he was strongest when on the heather; and it can hardly be but that the distinctively Scotch novels, from the deep tragedy of the "Bride of Lammermoor" and "St. Ronan's Well" to the racy comedy of "The Antiquary," will suffice to give him permanence so long as the main thing in a novel is truthful delineation of widely interesting characters and captivating story. The humor, the strong sense, wide observation, the perfect sincerity and kindness of heart, the almost universal tolerance and justice, the comprehensive sympathy, the hearty relish of the wholesome good of life—these qualities as shown in these books make it as certain as it is fortunate that they have in store for them a long immortality.

It is, indeed, upon Scott's goodness as a man that a great part of the esteem in which he will be held as a poet and as a novelist will be based. Few men placed in a position of pre-eminence like his have ever escaped with less of blame; and of such blame as he has had to bear with, the world is now disposed to withdraw much. We smile a little at the exaggerated loyalty which bent him to his knees before the Prince Regent; we are sorry to smile when we hear of his reluctance that a baronet should be known to have written "Waverley"; and we are sad when we think of Abbotsford, with its Gothic mansion, its piper and the pibroch, the baronial state and the lavish hospitality which brought the great genius in his age to a poverty not too honorable, and brought him, too, the fatal opportunity for that splendid exercise of courage and determination which broke his mind and body and ended his life. But we are all now beginning to remember the merciful saying, or rather the just saying, that every man has the faults of his virtues, and that the Scott who built Abbotsford for himself and others is the Scott who built for us the fabric of mediæval society. He had his piper to play before him at dinner; but what should we know of the wild Highlands had not the poet loved them and their ways, not only wisely and well, but too well also, and not with perfect wisdom?

Correspondence.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE CIVIL SERVICE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Although I was much gratified with the conclusive article in last week's Nation on the Constitutionality of Civil Service Reform, I wish another phase of it might be presented.

When I first noticed that the Commission had adjourned because of the suggested difficulty in the Constitution, I couldn't help wishing we knew who were those sincere friends of the reform in Congress who found the obstacle really serious. It really looked as if the Commission had been imposed upon. It is not only true, as the Nation has so well shown, that Congress has both had and exercised control over the question of tests of qualification for public service, and might repeal all laws giving to heads of departments the appointing power, and leave all appointments for the President, subject to the confirmation of the Senate; but it seems to me singular that any one could overlook the fact that under an administrative system the President has, by his absolute power of removal of his cabinet officers, the most complete control of the system on which they shall make their appointments.

Take Gen. Pleasonton's case. It does not matter whether we agree with him or not in his views of the internal revenue law he was administering; we must still admit that the Administration has a right to have its policy carried out, and ought to bear the responsibility for it, and to be free from any liability to be thwarted and have all its calculations on the budget marred by the action of a subordinate. It is not at all to the purpose to say that the law authorizes the Commissioner to decide certain things, or the Secretary to decide certain things: both, as Executive officers, represent and speak for the President, and, when they cease to carry out his views, they should resign. I know of no other way to have proper Executive responsibility, and even the exigencies of a revolutionary era cannot remove the blame from Mr. Stanton for "sticking" contrary to the wish of the President, nor from Congress for having tried to make Mr. Rollins independent of Mr. McCulloch.

It follows that the President is and must be to the fullest extent responsible for the civil service reform in all the departments. He has it in his power to carry out the reform by a simple Executive order, and, if he fails to do so, he, personally and officially, must bear the whole and sole responsibility for the failure to do so. It is nonsense to look for examples. The bound volumes of opinions of the Attorney-Generals are full of the recognition of the fact that the heads of departments are each an alter ego for the President in all official acts, and whilst they may not violate their own sense of right and duty in obedience to his wishes, their remedy is not by opposition to him, but by resignation, upon a public avowal of the cause of resigning, leaving him to settle accounts with the people who elected him, and with Congress and the courts, his co-ordinates in the constitutional system.

Everything claimed by the civil service reformers is clearly within the Executive power, for the period of the Executive term of office. Legislation is only needed to prevent what one Executive may do from being undone by the next, and not at all to give authority to the President to determine the mode in which all the employees of the departments shall be selected or removed. It is a real misfortune if the Commissioners have been befooled by the pretence of unconstitutionality, for it would show how easy is the process the Nation has so often exposed of finding objections to "this particular method" of reform. L. S.

August 11, 1871.

Notes.

Messrs. J. R. Osgood & Co.'s list of fall publications is long and varied, but consists in great part of new editions of works already before the public, and of books made up from articles that have appeared in the Atlantic. The two set down for this month are Miss Harriet Prescott Spofford's "New England Legends," comprising popular accounts of Captain Kidd, the Salem witchcraft, etc., and Mr. R. Shelton Mackenzie's "Life of Scott," referred to last week. The most noticeable among the works that are to follow are: a new edition of the late George Ticknor's "History of Spanish Literature," in three volumes, from a revised copy left by the author at his death; "The Wood Scenery of New England;" Clarence King's "Mountaineering in the Sierra Nevada;" "Bits of Travel," by Mrs. Helen Hunt ("H. H."); a "Dictionary of American Biography," by F. S. Drake; "Parnassus," and a new volume of Essays, by R. W. Emerson. The first work in preparation by the subscription department of this house is "Home Worship," by the Rev. Dr. Thompson, of this city.——Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Sons will publish immediately Mrs. Ames's long-deferred story of "Eirene; or, A Woman's Right;" "A History of England," by B. J. Lossing; "Stimulants and Narcotics," and "Eating and Drinking," two volumes of their handy volume series, prepared by Dr. G. M. Beard; "The Crayon Reader," being selections from the writings of Irving, arranged for schools and classes; and the first two volumes of the new Knickerbocker edition of standard poets, comprising the poems of Campbell, Collins, Gray, and Goldsmith.——Messrs. F. B. Felt & Co. will republish Robert Buchanan's "Land of Lorne."——Mr. E. A. Pollard, the biographer of the "Lost Cause," has in the press a new work entitled the "Lost Curse," in which he includes (and few will gainsay him) Mr. Jefferson Davis and the institution of slavery. He is convinced that "loss is the necessary occasion of compensation, thus, in fact, a form of gain," in the light of which philosophy, he says, "a candid man could not remain long disconsolate in his estimate of the late war."——Messrs. Appleton's announcements for August include new editions of their well-known "Hand-Book of American Travel," Northern and Eastern, and Western Tour; "Light Science for Leisure Hours," by R. A. Proctor; "Recent Discussions in Science, Philosophy, and Morals," by Herbert Spencer; and the following novels: Disraeli's "Tancred;" G. J. Whyte-Melville's "Sarchedon;" and "My Heroine."

—Of all the good people who take it to heart that Americans cannot sustain a comic paper, the Americans themselves are, we suspect, the least troubled. After all, the illustrations are the accident of such a paper, not the substance; and the humor we know we have, and can get, in plenty—small matter if it blossoms in papers not professedly humorous, and is diffused among a thousand, more or less, instead of concentrated in one. There is, too—if we may venture to add something to the already trite discussion—the same repugnance among us to the anonymous in comic as in serious journalism; and the highest success, therefore, awaits the acknowledged humorist, whose nom de plume is not long allowed to stand between him and the public. The individual exploits of sharpshooters have more interest for us than the operations of a corps of regulars delivering their weekly volleys from behind breastworks. Among our francs-tireurs, two only exhibit, in any high degree, the pictorial humor, and these are Mr. Bellew and Mr. Nast; and, so long as the latter appears regularly in Harper's Weekly, the American public has, we believe, all the comic paper that it wants. There is, to be sure, in this artist an earnestness of purpose and depth of feeling which often prove incompatible with comic effects, as those will agree who recall his caricatures of President Johnson. He is too much bent on painting things as they really are to be always mindful that his function as a humorist is to point out differences in things like. In his dealings with the Ring, however, we remember few instances in which this criticism is applicable to Mr. Nast, and certainly his two cartoons in the last Harper's (Aug. 19) are humorous beyond cavil. Mr. Greeley, in one of them, is represented as having asked Mr. Ingersoll (of Ingersoll & Co., of Court-house disbursements notoriety) who his "Co." is, and Mr. Ingersoll thereupon introduces him to a host of persons, led off by Mr. Tweed, behind whose capacious and elephantine body the other members of the Ring and their dependents make shift to hide themselves. In the second cartoon we have the Tammany Ring facing outwards, and answering the question of the Times, "Who stole the people's money?" with "'Twas him!"—each one with thumb or forefinger designating his neighbor; Mayor Hall pointing to the Comptroller, and Mr. Connolly to Mr. Sweeny, and Mr. Sweeny to his friend with the Kohinoor, Mr. Tweed, who, with a vigorous thrust of his fat index-finger, betrays the innocent chair-maker for the armories, and he, in turn, the underpaid plasterer of the new Court-house, and so round till the Old Board denounces the New Board, and the New Board points straight, with a smirk, at Mayor Hall. It is a deep-rooted villany that cannot be shaken by this sort of laughter.

—New editions rather than new works fill the English publishers' lists at this season. The place of the "Dame Europa" literature has been supplied by the "Battle of Dorking" (now attributed to Sir Francis Head) and its tribe, which hardly promises, however, to be as numerous as the first. Since our last summary, the following appear to be the principal publications worth examining: Austen Leigh's "Life of Jane Austen," enlarged edition, with fragments of unfinished tales; W. Skeen's "Adam's Peak," and "Mountain Life and Coffee Cultivation in Ceylon"; "Eastern Sketches, Notes of Scenery, Schools, and Tent Life in Syria and Palestine," by Ellen Clare Miller; "Scenes in the Sunny South, including the Atlas Mountains and the Oases of the Sahara in Algeria," 2 vols., by Lieut.-Col. C. S. Vereker; "Canoe Travelling: Log of a Cruise on the Baltic, and Practical Hints on Building and Fitting Canoes," by Warington Baden Powell, who might easily be a more attractive writer than his predecessor in the same waters, Mr. Macgregor—hitherto the monopolist in this branch of literature; and W. S. Banks's "Walks in Yorkshire; Wakefield and its Neighborhood." Relating to the Franco-Prussian war, we have: a reprint from the Contemporary Review of Mazzini's weighty and sensible words on "The War and the Commune," and "Our Adventures during the war of 1870," by Emma Maria Pearson and Louisa Elizabeth Maclaughlin. The Rev. Malcolm MacColl's "Ober-Ammergau Passion-Play" has reached a fourth edition, the appendix containing a continuous description of the scenes and tableaux of the play in the order in which they take place; and those who desire an exact libretto may find it in "The English Words of the Passion-Play," by Mrs. Edward Childe. Dr. Ginsburg's "Moabite Stone" has reached a second edition, and "The Rosetta Stone in Hieroglyphics and Greek," with a translation, by S. Sharpe, is now accessible to Oriental students. Dr. Solomon Deutsch's scholarly "Key to the Pentateuch, Explanatory of the Text and Grammatical Forms," is offset by H. Shepheard's fantastical "Traditions of Eden; or, Proofs of the Historical Truth of the Pentateuch, from Existing Facts and from the Customs and Monuments of all Nations." We notice one technical work on a subject that concerns good architecture: "Open Timber Roofs of the Middle Ages," by R. & J. Brandon. Three announcements are of interest: "Modern Belgian Art," by W. B. Scott, fully illustrated with photographs, which may go on the shelf beside Hamerton's essays on modern French art; Christina Rossetti's "Sing-Song: A Nursery-Rhyme Book," with numerous illustrations from the apt pencil of Arthur Hughes; and "Human Longevity, its Facts and its Fictions," by W. J. Thoms, editor of Notes and Queries, who has doubts whether anybody ever lived to be a hundred.

—The present would seem to be a good time for taking up and settling, or putting in the way to be settled, by an international congress, the whole question of the metric system—for coins, weights, and measures. In point of urgency, the monetary unification stands first; and what makes agitation for it now opportune is the fact that within a few weeks the German Reichsrath must undertake such a unification for the new empire, obliterating the seven existing systems. It is not too much to ask that the leadership which Germany has now won among civilized nations should be used to adjust the standard of coinage once for all. That it will be decimal, no one doubts; that it will be the present French system, of which, with some modifications as to fineness, Dr. Wiebezahn, of Cologne, is the principal advocate, is far from certain. Most in favor is the "Teutonic" system, supported among others by the Deutsche Handelszeitung, which makes a gramme of gold the unit of coinage, and assigns to all gold coins an integral number of grammes. On this plan, 3 thalers would equal 2 dollars gold; 6 thalers, 1 Russian half-imperial; 7.3 thalers, 1 pound sterling; 29 thalers, 100 francs. Little can be accomplished for international agreement until England is willing to surrender its complex currency. The adhesion of the United States to any rational and universal scheme may surely be counted on. There are, we know, objections to be raised on the score of expense in recoining, of debasement, of future decline in the value of the precious metals, etc., etc. None of them seem to us so serious as those which confront the adoption of the metric system for weights and measures, which has, nevertheless, been made compulsory in most European countries, and is tolerated by law in Great Britain and the United States. In a thin House, the other day, it was debated whether to make the system compulsory in England, and, though the Government opposed the reform, the majority against it was but five. It appeared in the discussion that there were ten systems of weights and measures in use in the kingdom, and the need of unity was not disputed. The old philological arguments against the metric, or any totally new, system were rehearsed, but we doubt if they are going to be effective much longer. The time-honored familiar names will linger long after the thing indicated has been superseded, just as the nomenclature in vogue before them survived their adoption. The change will be gradual, not sudden and shocking. Our decimal coinage has been contesting the memory of the shilling for nigh a quarter of a century, and has not driven the use of it yet out of our daily reckoning—neither the New England shilling nor the York shilling. It would be interesting to learn how completely the metric system prevails in France, and how long it was in driving out the old names as well as the old measures. The word "lieue" seems to be as tenacious of life as our "league."

—Between a mob which holds a city for three days and one that holds it for seventy, there is only a difference of degree; but in the latter case, the sober and law-abiding citizens are liable to much severer censure than in the former. The Commune was a mob of this kind; and the good people of Paris who endured it from the 18th of March to the 27th of May have been set down without distinction as imbeciles and madmen, as if accomplices of the organized anarchy. Their apology has just been written by Emile Beaussire in the Revue des Deux Mondes of July 1, of which he is one of the editors, and in this capacity was actually imprisoned by the Commune. He begins with remarking that the unjust stigma which rests upon his clients—"la majorité saine de la population de Paris"—partly proceeds from the French, and even from the Parisians themselves. "In France we are unmeasured in the evil as well as in the good that we speak of ourselves. We dislike any but general propositions and simple explanations. Our logic demands them; and whether they call us to partake of a universal glory, or involve us in universal infamy, our vanity is equally satisfied." For the full and succinct story of the firmness, loyalty, and civic courage of the friends of order, when abandoned by the government and the military authorities, we must refer our readers to the Revue. Among the classes whose devotion is signalized were the students, who for once resisted their revolutionary traditions; the concierges and domestic servants left in charge of deserted houses, who guarded them from pillage and incendiarism, and withstood all the temptation to join the movement of the class to which their station most nearly allied them; and, finally and especially, the under-officials in the public service. These last had the most delicate of positions, since they had to satisfy their new without betraying their trust to their lawful chiefs, who, indeed, held a secret and perilous communication with them from Versailles. "I yield," says M. Beaussire, "to a feeling of personal gratitude in making special mention, among these modest and courageous employees, of those of the pris ons. They were full of consideration for the respectable inmates (and there were few others). With a delicate attention, they selected those to walk together whom they guessed by education and tastes to have a certain affinity for each other. 'We were here before the Commune,' they used to say in an undertone, not without a certain pride."

—The attitude of the press throughout all this nightmare of government is praised, as it well merits, by M. Beaussire; and there is perhaps no higher example of moral courage than the journal that speaks its mind under mob rule, without fear of the mob. On this point, the record of the Paris press is honorable in the extreme, particularly as "almost all the journalists who were imprisoned or threatened with imprisonment, and the only one put to death, belonged to the Republican party." The Commune was very capricious in its suppression of newspapers, though the fact just stated "shows from what quarter criticism was most distasteful to it." The Journal des Débats was one of the first to be suppressed, and the Revue, which had fully recovered its poise after the Germans were out of sight, would quickly have shared the same fate, but that the Commune feared its effect upon public opinion abroad. One of its editors was arrested, his papers seized, the keys of his desk carried off, and he himself kept in durance, "in view of the next number." The next number, however, did not seem to the Commune to have profited from the "warning"—"la Revue ne changea rien au ton à la fois mesuré et ferme de ses appréciations." Then, on the 19th of May, the decree suppressing it was issued; but, in order to mask the incident as much as possible, nine other journals were made the companions of the Revue in punishment. In the fortnight that was necessary to give effect to this decree in the case of the Revue, the Commune was overpowered. The journals allowed to live took pains to show by their frankness that they accepted no favors of the Commune; and often, when suppressed, they reappeared the next day with merely a change of title. One newspaper had the distinguished honor of four successive suppressions under as many separate titles, and would have defied extinction if this expedient had not finally been threatened with a court-martial.

—Before leaving the subject of the Revue, we may express the hope that all who read the number from which we have been quoting will not omit the notice to subscribers printed under the table of contents. It is a modest appeal for support in an undertaking always difficult, and which has the distinction of being unique in journalism, and, apparently, inimitable by the literary genius of any other country than France. It serves for that country—not perfectly, we are well aware—the purposes of the English weeklies, the Spectator and the Saturday Review, while its range is more extended, and its political reviews more able and impartial, fitting it in all respects to be what it is—the favorite reading of cultivated men in all quarters of the globe. To increase its circulation is to aid the cause of sound scholarship, pure literature, and healthy politics; and its claims at this time on all who have these objects at heart are greater than ever before. Not only in gratitude for its independence under the Commune, but that it may succeed in its endeavor to regenerate its country—"by attacking the moral evil at its source, by recalling the public to its senses, by exposing every species of folly"—every well-educated American should feel it incumbent on him to sustain the Revue des Deux Mondes. Its agent in this city is Mr. F. W. Christern.

KAPP'S FREDERIC THE GREAT.*

THE main part of Mr. Kapp's last work, with which he purposes to conclude his career as a writer on American history, is strictly historical, and in no respect inferior to his former writings, while the appendix has a strong political coloring which is not likely to win the good graces of many American critics. Although the works which have been written on Frederic the Great constitute quite a respectable library, yet his relations to the United States had hitherto failed to enlist the attention of the historians, some superficial and erroneous ideas being transmitted from one generation of writers to another, until they had come to be received on both sides of the Atlantic as historical facts, whereas they were but a collection of worthless anecdotes. Mr. Kapp has filled this void in our knowledge of Prussia's greatest monarch, and he has performed his work with his wonted thoroughness and the unbiased mind of the true historian, whose duty it is not "to fix up" heroes, but to tell facts.

Frederic and a tincture, however slight, of the strong but vague enthusiasm of a Lafayette for liberty, and especially for liberty with a flavor of the spirit of the contrat social, is one of the oddest combinations imaginable. Mr. Kapp will be called to account by the sentimentalists among the historians for having proved beyond contradiction that this combination existed only in the imagination of Frederic's contemporaries. The Americans attributed to him the feelings which were burning in their own bosoms simply because he happened to be of some service to them, and accidentally at the very moment when success in their struggle for independence seemed all but impossible. Liberty never was a factor in his calculations, although he was too much of a really great man to play the policeman and detective on the throne, and the first and principal article in his catechism of "the rights of man" was the duty of the people obediently and diligently to pursue the way to happiness which it was the function of princes to mark out and prepare for them. What he wanted was purely and simply to vent his anger against England, and, when policy did not allow him to do that, he immediately turned his back upon the United States. His anger that the greediness of the petty princes had turned Germany into a market where England could buy as much human stock as she liked was by no means affectation; but it did not arise from his regard for the natural and inalienable rights of those who were sold, or from the fact that they were destined to fight against the natural and inalienable rights of the Americans. He was not more scrupulous than England in filling the ranks of his army, and he made it fight for whatever was to the advantage of Prussia, troubling his mind very little about the delicate question whether he thereby violated the rights of other people or not. But he regarded Germany as his domain, which he was anxious not to have drained of her supply of able-bodied men by England, partly because thereby was revealed the contemptible position which the German empire at that time occupied, and partly because he had himself to draw upon the rest of Germany to keep up the large army upon which the maintenance of his newly-acquired position depended.

While Washington was passing that terrible winter at Valley Forge, Howe was, in a certain degree, paralyzed by the unexpected news that Frederic had forbidden the transportation of the hapless "Hessians" through his dominions, thus rendering the future supply of troops from Germany wholly precarious. "This it is which makes Frederic's policy of importance for the American war. In its consequences it was as much to Washington as a new ally; it gave him time, and helped to turn the fortune of the war" (p. 71). Frederic, however, was not induced to assume this policy because it helped the United States, but exclusively because it served his own purposes. When, therefore, the Bavarian question rendered it desirable for him to be on good terms with England, he not only unhesitatingly pulled down the barriers which he had erected in her way, but at once dropped all negotiations with the Americans. In a word, there is not a moment during the whole war when Frederic ceased to be the shrewd, cool, calculating statesman, with a decidedly despotic turn of mind, bent with the whole force of his iron will upon absolutely nothing but what he considered the welfare of his own country, anxious to secure commercial advantages for it, but unwilling to risk anything. The idea that the Americans should think of his risking anything for the sake of their cause never entered his mind, for he could not but regard that as utterly absurd. The negotiations were, therefore, of necessity, completely fruitless, all the more because the position of the Americans was precisely that of the king, in that they also wanted to get everything and give nothing but all kinds of promises for the future. These are the conclusions to which Mr. Kapp comes, and they are so well supported by ample quotations, from mostly heretofore unknown historical documents, that the question may be considered as settled for ever. It may be mentioned here that Mr. Kapp goes so far in his disregard of the feelings of the sentimentalists—a disregard which, by the way, has received a well-deserved and severe rebuke from several of the German newspapers in the United States—that he bluntly states that the sword which Frederic is said to have sent to Washington was probably presented to Washington by a Mr. Theophilus Alte, in Solingen, but, at all events, not by Frederic.

The second part of the book, in which both parties—Frederic as well as the United States—appear on the whole to great advantage, is devoted to the treaty of amity and commerce of September 10, 1785. This treaty will always be considered as a prominent milestone in the progress of humanity from a state of barbarism to a state of true civilization, for the reason that in it are realized the best part of the instructions of Congress of May 7, 1784, to Franklin, Adams, and Jefferson—ideas of which Mr. Kapp justly says: "They stand like beacons of a better future, and assign to the United States, in the very beginning of their history, a proud position among the maritime powers. They are the great principles which proclaim the freedom of the sea; and up to the present day they have fought for them vigorously and with energy. It is the doctrine—which since the peace of Paris, in 1856, has become the common good of all nations—of the rights of neutrals, of the freedom of property on neutral ships, of the nature of contraband, and of the requirements of a valid blockade." The history of this treaty, therefore, well deserves to be written with great fulness; and the student who is willing to follow Mr. Kapp through all the changes which it had to undergo before it reached its final shape, and all the difficulties which had to be overcome, will not regret the time spent on it. It is the principal merit of the United States to have urged and initiated the great reforms, and the merit of Frederic to have become convinced that they were reforms, and to have adopted them in consequence. In some respects, however, Frederic was desirous of going even further than the United States. Thus, for instance, he wished to see it stipulated "that the effects and goods of either of the contracting parties which might be found on board a hostile ship, should be subject to confiscation only in case they were contraband or destined for the war, but should be returned to the proprietor, or taken at a reasonable fixed price, if they were the property of the subject of a neutral power." Congress, however, declined to accept this. Neither of the contracting parties had a navy, and their commercial relations were very insignificant. The treaty, therefore, proved to be of almost no immediate practical value. Its importance was wholly confined to the principles which were embodied in it.

* "Friedrich der Grosse und die Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika. Mit einem Anhang: Die Vereinigten Staaten und das Seekriegsrecht. Von Friedrich Kapp." Leipzig. 1871.

The rest of the book is less satisfactory, not so much because it contains many unpalatable truths, as because these truths are put in too strong a light, and partly because they are presented in a form which renders them liable to be misunderstood by those who are not well acquainted with the United States, either by personal observation or by study. After noticing the Treaty of Berlin of 1799 and the Treaty of 1828—in which the United States were far from being eager to develop further the principles laid down in the Treaty of 1785, and even weakened and crippled them, in some respects—Mr. Kapp, in the appendix, very highly commends the exertions of John Quincy Adams in the right direction, and then goes on to criticise the position assumed by the United States in 1856. He contends that the well-known propositions of Marcy, in his despatch of July 28, 1856, were only put forth because he did not want to accede to the stipulations which had been agreed upon in Paris. He hoisted the flag of an extreme liberalism because under its protection he could stick to the old practice not only unblamed, but hailed by the civilized world as the true champion of progress and liberty. It cannot be denied that there is great weight in what Mr. Kapp says in support of this opinion on pp. 163-167; and he adduces very good reasons for his further assertion that here we have another baleful effect of the curse of slavery, which has weighed so heavily upon the United States. But although we are strongly inclined to consider Mr. Kapp's opinion correct, yet we cannot say that he has established its correctness beyond all doubt. It is, however, true that in questions of such a character it is hardly ever possible to press the argument home with such irresistible force as to convince those minds that do not wish to be convinced. At all events, he has proved enough to give no one the right, without ample counterproofs, to throw stones at him because he contends that the United States have sadly wavered in their struggle for the reform of maritime law, more than once sacrificing their principles for the sake of momentary expediency. But he has not proved enough to warrant his conclusions concerning the future. It is absurd to assert, as it has been asserted, that Mr. Kapp is striving to sow enmity between the United States and Germany. He simply admonishes the Germans to get rid of the sentimentalism which has hitherto very strongly tinctured their judgment of the United States in its purely political capacity; and he deserves well of both countries for forcibly insisting on the truth that the best policy is always a strictly honest and reciprocal one—neither side trying to overreach the other. But it was at least unnecessary and impolitic to conclude the argument with an oderint dum metuant, which in fact, is not at all a correct summing up of what Mr. Kapp has himself been contending for, and which can in no way be applied from Germany towards the United States, or vice versa. But, even leaving that aside, Mr. Kapp's reasoning is too passionate not to offer several vulnerable points. He asserts that neither the wished-for reform in the maritime law, nor a just reciprocity in other respects, is to be expected from the good-will of the United States, and his argument in support of this assertion is based upon the general political status of the United States. What he says by way of characterizing this political status is undeniably true, but he does not say enough to render the picture correct. It would hardly be possible to do so in such a limited number of pages as he could devote to this question, which is only remotely connected with the principal object of the book; and, besides, it may have been necessary to make the medicine rather strong to cure the Germans of their sentimental view of looking at the United States. But this will not be deemed sufficient to justify the historian, even though he has overstepped the line which separates the domain of history from that of politics. He draws his illustrations too largely from New York City, and the rest have so deep a coloring that he offers his adversaries too good opportunities to accuse him, with seeming justness, of having exaggerated. He says on page 181 that what there is "great and noble" in the United States keeps proudly aloof from political life. This sentence refutes the charge, which else could have been made with apparent justice, that he knows nothing great and noble in this country, and that he pretends to have pointed out all the main features of our life. But, on the other hand, the assertion is so sweeping that an unjustifiable inference with respect to the status of our political life must needs be drawn from it. The whole context, in the main part of the work, however, furnishes sufficient proof that Mr. Kapp does not consider our political condition quite so hopeless as the terms of this sentence, as well as of the second half of the appendix, would seem to indicate.

With regard to what the rest of the world may expect from us towards the reform of maritime law, Mr. Kapp does not sufficiently take into account the enormous changes which have been wrought in the condition of the country by the utter defeat of the secessionists and by the emancipation of the slaves. He will not deny that the latter has a strong bearing on the question at issue, as he has himself so forcibly urged the influence slavery exerted on the position assumed by Marcy. It is apparent how much the danger of war has been diminished for this country by the crushing of the extreme State-rights school and by the abolition of slavery; and it is evident that the less we have to fear war, the more we shall be inclined honestly to work for the abolition of privateering, which, in our peculiar situation, as Mr. Kapp himself concedes, is a good deal to demand from us. If the treaty of Washington had been concluded at the time when Mr. Kapp was finishing his book, he would have had a strong proof of the correctness of the assertion that we are in future comparatively secure against being involved in war, and one which would have made it appear more likely to him that—however it be with our willingness or ability to sacrifice expediency and occasional advantages to sound and humane principles—we should earnestly resume the policy of Franklin and John Quincy Adams, and not cease contending for it until the last consequences of it have been incorporated into the law of nations.

In conclusion, we may mention that Mr. Kapp administers a severe rebuke to the Nation for the position it assumed in No. 269 with regard to the "Freedom of Belligerent Commerce."

A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION.*

We do not know if we are prurient and prudish, which is what Mr Reade has called some of his critics; it shall be as he likes about that; but we feel it laid upon us, as they say, to give it as our judgment that in this last book of Mr. Reade's there is an amount of gestation and parturition, and wet-nursing, not to mention life with the demi-monde, that makes "A Terrible Temptation" rather disagreeable to us, and, we fear, a book of dubious tendency. Sir Charles Bassett, who is first shown to us in the parlor of a woman whom he has had in keeping, is almost insanely desirous of a son; in fact, he is pretty safe to become insane unless Lady Bassett bears children. Lady Bassett, for her part, is a weak sort of person, who is almost ready to go insane unless her husband is pleased with her in all respects; and when she discovers him to be so strongly bent, heart and mind, on her presenting him with an heir, she feels "a terrible temptation." To do what? Mr. Reade endeavors strenuously to throw us into doubt as to what it is to which Lady Bassett is tempted; and it is in his particularly clumsy attempt to mislead us on this point, and prevent our seeing through his plot from the beginning that he lays himself most open to the charge of immorality and indecency. Really her ladyship, in her affectionate desire to please Sir Charles, whom she loves very fondly, is tempted to pass off on him as her own the child of her maid, who has been seduced. What Mr. Reade tries to make us believe to be the temptation is that Lady Bassett should be unfaithful to her husband, and bear a son to a Mr. Angelo, a young clergyman. There is something needlessly offensive, too, in the way in which this supposed affair is treated. Unfaithfulness in wives is not unknown, especially in our novels; and we have all had to make up our minds to listen year by year to a certain amount of talk on that subject, and, indeed, have all agreed, reluctantly or otherwise, that it is a legitimate subject for the novelist, or even that it may legitimately be made his principal subject. But why need the moralist take pains to insist upon it that the virile sinner is big-boned, very athletic, and very dark-complexioned, while the female whom he moves to admiration of him is small, slight, fair-complexioned, and light-haired, and that it is on these physical grounds that they are attracted toward each other. This, however, is what Mr. Reade has done, and, in our judgment, he ought to be somewhat ashamed of himself for doing it. His management of the Angelo business is much in the tone of those highly anthropomorphic letters which some of the female correspondents write from Washington concerning this or that senator with whose views the correspondent happens to be in accord, and who, as the California satirist remarked, must "almost have dewlaps," if the admiring writers are to be believed.

* "A Terrible Temptation. By Charles Reade." Boston: J. R. Osgood & Co. New York: Harper & Bros. 1871.

Usually Mr. Reade is—we had almost said, a pure writer. We should hesitate, however, to apply to him just that word, for while he certainly is not an impure writer, yet purity is a word not very precisely descriptive of him. The passion of love is what he has always dealt with; and with him love is always the flesh-and-blood love of entirely human lovers. It is clearly the love of the sexes. As we say, however, Mr. Reade usually treats of it without coarseness, although rarely without a warmth which, to speak within bounds, is not always marked by delicacy. And in the case of Lady Bassett and Mr. Angelo he passes over the boundary, and becomes coarse to the point of indecency. After the tortures and contortions of heroes and heroines of some of the modern schools, people with nothing but nerves and fine sentiments, with no blood in their veins nor flesh on their bones, it is not disagreeable to come upon men who are sound animals, who wish to be lovers, and healthy women who recognize the fact that all affection is not of the platonic kind, and that it is good to be loving and beloved wives; and we are among those who think that some of our women whom Mr. Reade has most displeased by his way of handling the female heart, and by his representations concerning men, do, in criticising him harshly, really make harsh criticism of themselves. But there is a very definite limit to the freedom which an author may allow himself in this regard, and Mr. Reade's taste and sense of delicacy have not always proved an unerring guide. It is proper, moreover, to be the more displeased with him in this particular case because his introduction of the clergyman at all is worse than unnecessary. Except novel-readers of a kind so unsophisticated that Mr. Reade should be above deceiving them, no one is deceived into forming any other opinion as to Lady Bassett's fault than that she passed off Mary Wells's child for her own, and our author's attempt to force the other opinion is at once resented, and he condemned for making it.

Sir Charles's natural desire for a child to perpetuate his name and succeed to his great estates is further increased by the hatred he bears his cousin Richard, who will inherit all in case Sir Charles dies childless, and who is an ill-conditioned person, with a native power of venomous hating, developed by long nursing. He conceives himself injured because Sir Charles's father, though a younger son, secured the estates which, but for misconduct, his own father would have had. All his hope is that Sir Charles, who has led a sufficiently careless life, may die without issue; and his endeavors to bring about that event form the staple of the novel. He begins—pretty near the beginning—by himself falling in love with the lady who, as Lady Bassett, is in the sequel to disappoint his hopes and plans; but his evil genius, Sir Charles, a very gentlemanly, good fellow—whose gentlemanliness, by the bye, as is apt to be the case in Mr. Reade's books, is a little too much insisted upon—finds no great difficulty in carrying off the young lady's affections. He is not to get her so easily, however. Richard writes an anonymous letter to Miss Bella, telling her that Sir Charles, who has just left her rapturously happy in the thought of speedy marriage, is, at that present writing, in the house of a woman of the town named Somerset. Bella shrieks, and her father, at once proceeding to the house of Miss Somerset, of course finds that Sir Charles has indeed been there; he and his lawyer were making a final call on the lady of the house, putting the necessary signatures to certain legal papers, providing for a complete severance of the connection between her and the baronet. Miss Bella's father forbids her lover the house, and the two are separated for a long time, in the course of which we have Miss Somerset figuring in the foreground, first as Sir Charles's nurse, in the dress of a sister of charity, and afterwards as Bella's adviser and helper in her troubles, she being a young woman of resource and great audacity. Moreover, she has a talent for morality and piety unusual in any rank of life whatever. She is an amazonian sort of a creature—tall, strong, handsome, and healthy, imperious, untutored, but of much natural ability; very good-hearted, though hot-tempered—a woman of the kind that Mr. Reade is as fond of taking for his secondary heroine as he is of taking, for his first heroine, the graceful, tender-hearted, affectionate, clinging creature who tells white and black lies when she is in difficulties, sheds tears, idolizes her husband divinely, and is, on the whole, Mr. Reade's ideal woman.

In his treatment of this secondary heroine and her surroundings, Mr. Reade avoids very thoroughly most of the impropriety inherent in the subject; but we do not know that in so doing his cleanliness is not almost as blameworthy—that is, supposing that the thing had to be brought in at all—as his coarseness in the passage of which we have been speaking. Hardly at all, and, indeed, we might say not at all, do Miss Somerset's steps take hold on hell, as in Scripture and in fact such steps are so apt to do. "Her house inclineth unto death, and her paths unto the dead, and she hath cast down many wounded," beyond a doubt, but she appears here as a highly admirable young lady, does good to everybody, is generous, brave, and unselfish, and, in the end, makes an excellent wife and a field-preacher who, by her eloquence, turns many from their sins. There are such women as La Belle Somerset, doubtless; and probably some few such may be found among the rapacious, cruel, and stupid harlots of the demi-monde; but we suppose it was straining a point both in morals and in art to offer Miss Somerset as at all a fair specimen of her class. Still, to have done so is to keep the book cleaner than it would otherwise have been. Though, for the matter of that, we see little reason or none why she should have been brought in at all, and should imagine that Mr. Reade's passion for, being venturous and audacious he might gratify after some fashion less likely to be dangerous to his readers, than making them acquainted with a beautiful and virtuous demirep.

As the story goes on, it soon becomes plain that it is in the worse of Mr. Reade's two manners. He was always fond of exciting incidents and of situations dramatically telling, and he early showed a disposition to bring in extraneous matter, and make his story depend on two or three distinct and mutually independent sources of interest. He must have his Australian mining and his English prison discipline to add to the love of George and Susan; or, while we are following the thread of Alfred Hardie's fortune, he calls us aside to teach us the mysteries of speculation and of lunatic asylums. Such perfect gems of art as "Peg Woffington," and some of the other stories in which everything is beautifully evolved from a central motive which governs all the parts, he no longer cares to produce, and in their place we are yearly more likely to get from him some astonishing farrago of improbabilities, in which there is little of his characteristic excellences except his wit, which is brilliant, and occasional flashes of light on human nature. Unity and natural coherence of plot, as in the early stories, which are of poetic and beautiful simplicity, we no longer expect; nor well-drawn characters, nor a probable story; and in this "Terrible Temptation" we get none of them any more than in its immediate predecessors, as "Put Yourself in his Place" and "Griffith Gaunt."

It is, however, as we have said, very interesting and very clever, and although Mr. Reade appears to have only too little respect for himself, and not enough for his readers either, it is certain that in losing the power or the will to delight he has not diminished in the least his power to amuse; and, moreover, might, if he would, keep us all pleased and excited, without hovering on the perilous verge of forbidden regions, or going over the border. It would be curious, by the way, to trace the connection between the improprieties of which we have spoken and that want of, we do not say delicate, but even decent reserve which has made it possible for Mr. Reade to introduce himself as a character in "A Terrible Temptation," and tell us his own opinion of himself, his method of working, his personal appearance, and the like. In itself this is perhaps all laughable rather than anything else.

MR. GREELEY AS A FARMER.*

Of all the books that have served as a foot-ball of fun for men who were utterly ignorant of its subject, none has been more bandied back and forth than Mr. Greeley's bucolic effusions. "What I Know of Farming" has pointed the funny moral of all manner of political screeds, and adorned many an editor's tale of his neighbors' follies. As an illustration of political economy, of social manners and customs, of the woman's-rights movement, of the wickedness of the Tribune, of the folly of Mr. Greeley himself, it has been (or has been made) of almost universal application. All the newspaper world has had a fling at it, and those who themselves have known the least about its subject have hit the hardest. By an odd fatality, it has awakened the merriment of the whole editorial fraternity, and the result is that only those who have read the book have any just conception of its character. The agricultural press has had singularly little to say about it.

* "What I Know of Farming. By Horace Greeley." New York: Carleton.

We have, ourselves, taken it up without a clue to its quality, and with no preconceptions to affect our judgment of it. We have found it to be a perfectly honest exposition of its author. Every page is redolent of Horace Greeley; his knowledge, his want of knowledge, his prejudices, his aspirations, his arbitrary judgment, his enthusiasm. All these—and all else that is in him—is as plain as sunshine through the whole text. Mr. Greeley's faults and Mr. Greeley's virtues are fully apparent. It is emphatically what "I" (H. G.) know (and think, and hope, and fear, and wish, and guess, and trust) about farming, and there is much room for fault-finding—perhaps some, too, for ridicule. At the same time, there is a vast deal that can only command respect and inspire confidence—confidence, at least, in the author's enthusiasm in favor of good farming (which to him is the best of all good things), as the channel through which down-trodden humanity is to sail out into the placid waters of the millennium.

As an instance of slapdash extravagance, Mr. Greeley "admiringly" dedicates his book "To the man of our age who shall make the first plough propelled by steam, or other mechanical power, whereby not less than ten acres per day shall be thoroughly pulverized to a depth of two feet, at a cost of not more than two dollars per acre." An acre of soil two feet deep weighs about five million pounds, which, by its own weight and from the action of rains sinking through it, is tolerably well bound in place. It is not likely that this mass will ever be handled for two dollars while coal and labor command their present prices. Taken literally, this dedication is nonsense. As an illustration of the vehemence with which Mr. Greeley believes in deep and thorough cultivation, it is very effective. There are, in the book, very many instances of similar extravagance; but these will mislead no one, and at most they only detract from the effect of very much which is shrewd and sensible, which comes of an original way of looking at the faults and the possibilities of practical farming. It is to be remembered that our author was born in cold New Hampshire, where less than almost anywhere else does nature smile on her children; where (at least in his time) very hard and very patient toil brought little else than a bare subsistence. His early knowledge of agriculture was gained in a rough childhood, passed in poverty on a hired farm in this thankless land. He says that at this time he had not really learned much more of farming than a good plough-horse ought to understand. At the age of twelve he left farming and turned printer, and during the last half-century agriculture has been a beloved art with him, but never an occupation. It has had much of his thought, much of his money, not much of his time, and but a meagre share of his talent for success. Judging it by its treatment of himself, he would be justified in decrying Improved Agriculture as a deceitful jade whose smile lures to destruction. Yet his faith is as strong, and as cheerful, and as rosy as when he first began to dream of a higher farming than even Mechi has forecast; and no one has ever better explained his motive in writing on an unfamiliar subject:

"I only lay claim to an invincible willingness to be made wiser to-day than I was yesterday, and a lively faith in the possibility—nay, the feasibility, the urgent necessity, the imminence—of very great improvements in our ordinary dealings with the soil. I know that a majority of those who would live by its tillage feed it too sparingly, and stir it too slightly and grudgingly. I know that we do too little for it, and expect it thereupon to do too much for us. I know that, in other pursuits, it is only work thoroughly well done that is liberally compensated; and I see no reason why farming should prove an exception to this stern but salutary law. I may, indeed, be deficient in knowledge of what constitutes good farming, but not in faith that the very best farming is that which is sure of the largest and most certain reward."

How strong this faith has been those know who have watched Mr Greeley's own conduct. He bought a farm where nature had not only done nothing, but had made it impossible for art to do much, and he showered down his money like the rain upon its impossible acres. He applied to it "the very best farming," as he understood it, and if it had been possible to make a good farm of the rocks and morass o Chappaqua, he would have done it. That it is not possible in nowise deters him from trying, even; nor does it one whit discourage him in the wide dissemination of a knowledge whose vital importance he still believes in, in spite of its uselessness when applied to the surroundings of his own spring—for he bought the spring as a source of the purest water, and took the land incidentally; he has the sense to know that his failure, with such land, is a matter of course, and to argue from it the most complete success wherever farming is really practicable. Not only does his faith in the soil keep strong—he believes in every enthusiastic worker of it. The book under consideration has been written, we doubt not (indeed, he tells us so), that those young farmers whose steps incline upward may have the benefit of his encouragement, and we can well conceive that the greatest reward that could come of it was the glow with which he murmured, as he wrote this or that rhapsody: "That will help such a man," or "So-and-so will poke his plough-nose an inch deeper when he reads that!" As our readers may suspect, Mr. Greeley has not our fullest confidence either in party politics, political economy, social philosophy, science, religion, literature, or art—or even in agriculture; but no one who knows him can doubt his tenderness to all who love good farming, nor fail to admire the enthusiasm and benevolence with which he gives them both moral and material aid. Those young men may be counted by dozens who are indebted to him for their success in farming, and whose halting steps have often been supported by his ever-ready generosity. There was never a surer way to his affection than a fellow-feeling on farm topics, and any man of tolerable ability might have earned his support for the mission to France if he ploughed with a double team, and turned up a soil that had never seen the light before.

Let it not be thought that we are reviewing the author too much, and the book too little, for the book is not one to bear accurate criticism. What there is of science in it is not much, and not of much value—nor does it pretend to be. As a guide to practical farming, other works we could name are fully its equal. Its title is unfortunate, as it leads the reader to expect instruction that he does not get. Whatever Mr. Greeley may be in his secular vocations, in agriculture he is a poet—a man of the warmest enthusiasm and the gentlest feeling. He is a poet who has written himself down in his book, and, criticise him as sharply as we may, we shall be moved by his vigorous song of honest labor, intelligent ambition, and bursting barns, whether we will or not. It is rather sad to think that an unlucky title should have drawn only the light gabble of ridicule where so much praise and appreciation are due, and that so many wild statements and crude fancies in the book itself should have half-justified the misfortune.

To give a more precise idea of the character of the book than we have done would not be easy, for it contains so many inexact statements, and so much ill-considered advice, that we might easily discourage its perusal Our desire is exactly the opposite of this, for, in spite of its faults, it will do vastly more good than harm, and, while few will be misled by its errors, many will be benefited by its influence. It contains the unrestrained expressions of a man of much ability, on a subject of which he really knows a great deal, and to which he has always given his best attention.

Ten Great Religions: An Essay in Comparative Theology. By James Freeman Clarke. (Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1871. 8vo, pp. x.-528.)—The religions of which Mr. Clarke treats in this volume are Confucianism, Brahmanism, Buddhism, Zoroastrianism, the religions of ancient Egypt, Greece, and Rome, that of the Germanic race (especially the Scandinavians), the Jewish system, and Mohammedanism. His design is, by comparing them with one another and with Christianity, to bring clearly to view both their distinctive traits and their characteristic weaknesses; to show that each is at least defective in some important feature which is found only in the Christian religion, the latter being the "pleroma," or fulness of life, the one perfect and infinitely perfectible faith, the true universal religion. It is, however, in no narrow spirit, nor by the often exhibited methods of the special Christian theologian, that he reaches this result. He treats the ten condemned faiths in a spirit of the fullest reverence, anxious to bring to light whatever of good is contained in them, regarding each as in reality a religion, an essay toward the truth, even if only a partially successful one. This is the point of view to which the sincere enquirer is necessarily summoned by the deeper knowledge and wider charity of the present epoch of enquiry; and Mr. Clarke occupies it, so far as we can see, heartily and sincerely; in all his volume we have not noted a particle of unfairness, of bigotry, of boastful superiority, of offensive unction. In this highly important requisite, his work is completely successful. In it, moreover, is brought together a great body of valuable and not generally or easily accessible information upon a difficult class of subjects. The author's researches have been wide-reaching and diligent; and their results, as set forth by him, are as generally reliable as those of a single student, and of one who takes up the subject by the way, in the character rather of a dilettante than of one devoted to such studies, could be expected to be. Of course, there are in every chapter statements to which well-grounded exception may be taken; of course, too, there is not a little of that mixing of bad authorities with good to which any but the profoundly versed scholar—and even he, in his own manner and degree—is liable. But, in the present stage of the study of religions, such faults are inevitable and excusable: so many points, even of prime consequence, are still in dispute, that he who would altogether avoid erroneous statement must be more than moderate and wary—he must practise absolute abstinence. To go through the volume and point out and refute what we cannot accept would require a protracted essay, and we have no idea of attempting the tedious and ungrateful task. It is but seldom that the author gets so far astray as in his suggestion (p. 230) that, Egyptian civilization being of Asiatic or Indian origin (a thoroughly exploded dogma), Egyptian religion was probably "a natural reaction from the extreme spiritualism of the Hindoos"—any excess of spiritualism in the Hindoos being demonstrably later by some thousands of years than the development of Egyptian culture; or as in his assumption (p. 184) of a grand geological convulsion and change of climate as the prelude to Zoroastrianism, and recorded in the first chapter of the Vendidad; or as in his absurdly fanciful recognition (p. 124, note) of a characteristic Hindoo tendency to Unitarianism in the three voices—active, passive, and middle—of the Sanskrit; or as in his overcredulous acceptance, from a notoriously unsound authority like Pictet, of the common Indo-European home as being "on the great plains east of the Caspian Sea" (p. 87), and "some 3,000 years B.C."

But if Mr. Clarke has thus approved himself an industrious collector and an impartial reporter, we cannot conscientiously award him praise of a higher order. Of penetrating perception, of acuteness of divination, of power to combine, and organize, and present in new and faithful aspects, we do not find him possessed. His work will fill, we trust, a highly useful office in instructing and enlightening the general reader; but it will not perceptibly advance the scholar's comprehension of its subject. No one of the vexed questions of the study of religions is solved, or pushed forward towards a solution, by it. The Egyptian creed and practice, for example, remain the same painful and puzzling problem after its exposition as after those of its predecessors; the rise of Brahmanism and its change into later Hindooism are not less mysterious than before. The reasonings of the introductory chapter are in great part more specious and "genial" than profound. The author's distinction of "ethnic" and "catholic" religions is far less intrinsically important than that of national religions, and religions having an individual founder. And he commits what we cannot but regard as one of the most fundamental errors of which a student of the history of religion can be guilty, in postulating our original monotheism as lying beneath and behind the ancient polytheistic systems. This, to be sure, is also Müller's view; but it is one of Müller's characteristic weaknesses, and supported by arguments which will not bear a moment's examination.

A point of minor consequence, and admitting of correction in another edition, if the work should come to that, is the orthography of the proper names, which is both inaccurate and inconsistent to a degree that is very annoying. Now and then, too, Mr. Clarke is guilty of an exasperating bit of bad spelling. For example, what possible reason can he have for writing Vishnu always with a c in it, as "Vischnu"? Why Germanize the name of this divinity, any more than that of Krishna, or any other that contains our sh sound? We strongly object, also, to the spelling fetich instead of fetish. The word is written fétiche in French, to be sure, but only for the same reason that it is fetisch in German—namely, because its final sound is that of our sh. Nothing but ignorance, then, or affectation, or undue subservience to foreign orthographies, would give it in English any other form than fetish.

HARVARD AND YALE,

TOGETHER WITH MANY OTHER LEADING INSTITUTIONS, IN THEIR COURSES OF

FRENCH AND GERMAN,

USE ALMOST EXCLUSIVELY THE PUBLICATIONS OF

HOLT & WILLIAMS,

25 BOND STREET, NEW YORK.

☞ As Messrs. HOLT & WILLIAMS have made French and German School-Books a specialty, they trust there is nothing invidious in calling attention to the fact that, for the study of these languages, they publish more than twice as many works as any other house in America, presenting a variety suitable to the wants of all instructors, from the nursery governess to the university professor.

Full Descriptive Catalogues will be forwarded gratis, on application.

AGENTS WANTED TO SELL

EVERY HORSE-OWNER'S CYCLOPÆDIA.

This is the most complete work on the Horse ever published. It is by the best English and American authority, and illustrated with nearly 100 fine engravings representing every disease the horse is subject to, and portraits of the most celebrated horses.

Agents are meeting with unprecedented success, selling from five to ten copies a day. We allow Agents liberal discounts. Any good man can make $30 a week without trouble.

SOLD ONLY BY SUBSCRIPTION.

Send for Circular of Terms, etc., to

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE PUPIL OF THE LEGION OF HONOR.

BY LOUIS ENAULT.

Translated from the French by Mrs. CHAS. P. TUFT.

8vo, paper, $1; cloth, $1 50.

A most delightful story; pure in tone, elevated in sentiment, and of the greatest interest, it will undoubtedly prove one of the literary successes of the season.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY, CAMBRIDGE, MASS.,

COMPRISES THE FOLLOWING DEPARTMENTS:

HARVARD COLLEGE.
THE UNIVERSITY LECTURES.
THE DIVINITY SCHOOL.
THE LAW SCHOOL.
THE LAWRENCE SCIENTIFIC SCHOOL.
THE SCHOOL OF MINING AND PRACTICAL GEOLOGY.
THE EPISCOPAL THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.
THE MEDICAL SCHOOL.
THE DENTAL SCHOOL.
THE BOTANIC GARDEN.
THE ASTRONOMICAL OBSERVATORY.
THE MUSEUM OF COMPARATIVE ZOÖLOGY.
THE PEABODY MUSEUM OF ARCHÆOLOGY.
THE BUSSEY INSTITUTION (a School of Agriculture and Horticulture).

The Academic Year begins in all departments on the THURSDAY FOLLOWING THE LAST WEDNESDAY IN SEPTEMBER, and ends on the last Wednesday in June.

The Second Examination for admission to Harvard College will be held on September 28, 29, and 30, beginning at 8 A.M. on September 28.

The Examinations for admission to the Engineering Department of the Lawrence Scientific School, the Mining School, and the Bussey Institution will be held on September 28, beginning at 9 A.M.

UNIVERSITY LECTURES FOR 1871–72.

PHILOLOGY.

PROF. JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL, on Early French Literature—Bartsch's Chrestomathie. Once a week throughout the year. Fee $10.

Mr. EZRA ABBOTT, on the Sources, Principles, and History of the Textual Criticism of the New Testament. Two Lessons a week in the second half of the year. Fee $10.

PROF. F. J. CHILD; Three Lessons a week, on Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Thursdays, at 4 P.M., throughout the year, in Gothic and Icelandic, or in Anglo-Saxon, at the pleasure of the students. Fee $30.

PROF. G. M. LANE; One Lesson of an hour and a half, at 3.30 P.M., on Mondays throughout the year, on Plautus the first half of the year, and on the Roman Satirists the second half. Fee $15.

PROF. FERDINAND BOCHER, on Historical French Grammar. Once a week throughout the year on Saturdays, at 3 P.M. Fee $10.

PROF. W. W. GOODWIN, on the Legal Orations of Demosthenes, or (at the pleasure of the students) on Plato's Republic and Aristotle's Ethics. Once a week throughout the year on Wednesdays, at 12 M. Fee $10.

MR. JAMES B. GREENOUGH; Eighteen Lectures on the Comparative Etymology of Greek, Latin, and Sanskrit, on Tuesdays, at 5 P.M., beginning October 3. Fee $5. Eighteen Lectures on the Comparative Inflections of Greek, Latin, and Sanskrit, on Thursdays, at 5 P.M., beginning October 5. Fee $5. Seventeen Lectures on the Comparative Syntax of Greek, Latin, and Sanskrit, on Thursdays, at 5 P.M., beginning February 25. Fee $5.

MR. FRANK E. ANDERSON, on Books I., II., and III. of Homer's Iliad. Two Lessons a week for advanced students and teachers during the first half of the year. Fee $10.

MR. THOMAS S. PERRY; Two Lessons a week throughout the year in the Elements of Sanskrit. Fee $20.

HISTORY, JURISPRUDENCE, AND POLITICAL SCIENCE.

PROF. E. A. SOPHOCLES; One Lesson a week, on Fridays, at 11 A.M., throughout the year; on the Early Christians as viewed by Pagan Authors, during the first half of the year; on the Semi-Christian, Pseudo-Christian, and Anti-Christian Sects of the first three centuries, during the second half. Fee for either course, $5.

MR. SAMUEL ELIOT, on the History of the XIXth Century. One Lecture a week, on Wednesdays, at 4 P.M., in the second half of the year. Fee $5.

PROF. C. F. DUNBAR. Twelve Lectures on Political Economy in the second half of the year. Fee $3 50.

MR. O. W. HOLMES, Jr. Eighteen Lectures on Jurisprudence, twice a week, on Tuesdays and Fridays, at 4 P.M., in the second half of the year. Fee $5.

ART.

MR. CHARLES C. PERKINS, on the History of Art. One Lecture a week, on Wednesdays, at 3 P.M., in the second half of the year.

MR. JOHN LAFARGE, on Composition in Art. Six Lectures, on Wednesdays, in the second half of the year. Fee $2.

MR. JOHN K. PAINE; Twenty Lectures on the History of Music, on Saturdays, at 12 M., in Boston, beginning October 19. Fee $6.

SCIENCE.

PROF. ASA GRAY, on Botany, twice a week, from April 20 to June 10, 1872, with laboratory work. Fee $5.

PROF. JEFFRIES WYMAN, on Ethnology. One lecture a week, on Wednesdays, at 12 M., in the second half of the year. Fee $5.

PROF. J. D. WHITNEY, on Higher Structural Geology, three lessons a week in the second half of the year. Fee $15.

PROF. H. A. HAGEN; private laboratory lessons in Entomology for advanced students, twice a week throughout the year. Fee $20.

PROF. WILLIAM H. BREWER, on the Botany of the Pacific States Six Lectures in November and December. Fee $2.

PROF. N. S. SHALER, on Palæontology, with practical exercises, three times a week in the first half of the year. Fee $15. Also Excursions and Practical Exercises in Geology every Saturday, when the weather permits, throughout the year. Fee for the year, $10; for either half, $5.

MR. J. B. PERRY, on the Life of the Primordial Era. One Lecture a week in the first half of the year. Fee $5.

MR. J. A. ALLEN, on Ornithology. One Lecture a week, beginning in November. Fee $5.

PROF. BENJAMIN PEIRCE, on Celestial Mechanics; Two Lectures a week, on Mondays and Wednesdays, at 11 A.M., in the first half of the year. Fee $10.

PROF. J. M. PEIRCE, on Modern Methods in Geometry; Two Lectures a week, on Tuesdays and Fridays, at 12 M., in the first half of the year.

PROF. J. P. COOKE, on Special Subjects of Advanced Chemistry; One Lecture a week throughout the year, on Wednesdays, at 12 M. Fee $10.

The following documents may be obtained on application to J. W. Harris, Secretary, Cambridge, Mass.: The University Catalogue for 1870–71, the list of Elective Studies for 1871–72 in Harvard College; the Examination Papers used in the year 1870–71; the Announcements for 1871–72 of the University Lectures, the Law School, the Medical School, the Dental School, the Lawrence Scientific School, the Mining School, and the Bussey Institution.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S SELECT

FOR USE IN ACADEMIES,

CLASSICAL AND SCIENTIFIC.

Cicero. The Second Philippic Oration. With an Introduction and Notes. Edited, with corrections and additions. By John E. B. Mayor, M.A. 12mo, $1 25.

Cicero. The Orations of Cicero against Catilina. With Notes and an Introduction translated from the German of Karl Halm, with many additions. By A. S. Wilkins, M.A. $1 25.

Demosthenes on the Crown. The Greek Text with English Notes. By B. Drake, M.A. To which is prefixed Æschines against Ctesiphon. With English Notes. $1 25.

Juvenal for Schools. With English Notes. By J. E. B. Mayor, M.A. New and cheaper Edition. Part I. Cr. 8vo, sewed. $1 25.

Marshall's Table of Irregular Greek Verbs, classified according to the arrangement of Curtius's Greek Grammar. By J. M. Marshall. 40 cents.

Mayor. First Greek Reader. Edited after Karl Halm. With corrections and large additions. By John E. B. Mayor, M.A. 12mo, $1 50.

Mayor. Greek for Beginners. By the Rev. J. B. Mayor, M.A. 12mo, $1 50.

Roby. A Grammar of the Latin Language. From Plautus to Suetonius. By Henry J. Roby, M.A. Part I. 12mo, $2 50.

Sallust. Caii Sallustii Crispi Catilina et Jugurtha. With copious Notes. By C. Merivale, B.D. New and revised Edition. In press.

Tacitus. The Agricola and Germania of Tacitus. A revised Text, English Notes, and Maps. By Alfred J. Church, M.A., and W. J. Brodribb, M.A. 12mo, $1 25.

Tacitus. The Agricola and Germania. Translated into English. By A. J. Church, M.A., and W. J. Brodribb, M.A. With Maps and Notes. 12mo, $1.

Thring. A Latin Gradual. A First Latin Construing Book for Beginners. By Edward Thring, M.A. New and enlarged Edition. 12mo, $1 25.

Thucydides. The Sicilian Expedition. Being Books 6 and 7 of Thucydides. With Notes. New Edition, revised and enlarged. By Rev. Percival Frost, M.A. 12mo, $1 50.

Virgil. The Works of Virgil rendered into English Prose. With Introductions, Running Analysis, and an Index. By James Lonsdale, M.A., and Samuel Lee, M.A. 12mo, $1 50.

Wright. Hellenica; or, A History of Greece in Greek, as related by Diodorus and Thucydides. Being a First Greek Reading Book. With Explanatory Notes, Critical and Historical. By J. Wright, M.A. 12mo, $1.

Wright. The Seven Kings of Rome: an Easy Narrative. Abridged from the First Book of Livy. Being a First Latin Reading Book. By the same Author. 12mo, $1. With Vocabulary and Exercises, $1 50.

MATHEMATICS.

Airy. A Treatise on Magnetism. Designed for the Use of Students in the University. By G. B. Airy, Astronomer-Royal. $3.

Airy. On Sound and Atmospheric Vibrations. With the Mathematical Elements of Music. By the same Author. $3 50.

Cambridge Course of Elementary Natural Philosophy, for the Degree of B.A. By J. C. Snowball, M.A. Revised and enlarged by Thomas Lund, B.D. $1 75.

Drew. Geometrical Treatise on Conic Sections. By W. H. Drew, M.A. 4th Edition. $1 75. Solutions to the Problems in Drew's Conic Sections. $1 75.

Jones and Cheyne. Algebraical Exercises. Progressively arranged. By Rev. C. A. Jones, M.A., and C. H. Cheyne, M.A. New Edition. 75 cents.

Parkinson. An Elementary Treatise on Mechanics. For the Use of the Junior Classes at the University and the Higher Classes at Schools. By S. Parkinson, D.D., F.R.S. 4th Edition, revised. $3.

Parkinson. A Treatise on Optics. By the same Author. 3d Edition, revised and enlarged. $3 50.

Puckle. An Elementary Treatise on Conic Sections and Algebraic Geometry. With numerous Examples. By G. H. Puckle, M.A. $2 50.

Reynolds. Modern Methods in Elementary Geometry. By E. M. Reynolds, M.A. $1.

Snowball. The Elements of Plane and Spherical Trigonometry. With the Construction and Uses of Tables of Logarithms. By J. C. Snowball, M.A. 10th Edition. $2.

Tait and Steel. Dynamics of a Particle. With numerous Examples. By Professor Tait and Mr. Steel. New Edition. $3 50.

Taylor. Geometrical Conics; including Enharmonic Ratio and Projection. By C. Taylor, B.A. $2 50.

Todhunter. Works by I. Todhunter, M.A., F.R.S. of St. John's College, Cambridge:

The Elements of Euclid. For the Use of Colleges and Schools. New Edition. $1 25.

Mensuration for Beginners. With numerous Examples. $1.

Algebra for Beginners. With numerous Examples. New Edition. $1 25.

Key to Algebra for Beginners. $2 25.

Trigonometry for Beginners. With numerous Examples. $1.

Mechanics for Beginners. With numerous Examples. $1 50.

Algebra. For the Use of Colleges and Schools. 4th Edition. $2 25.

Key to Algebra for Colleges. $3.

An Elementary Treatise on the Theory of Equations. $2 25.

Plane Trigonometry. For Schools and Colleges. 4th Edition. $1 75.

A Treatise on Spherical Trigonometry. 2d Edition, enlarged. $1 75.

Plane Co-ordinate Geometry, as applied to the Straight Line and the Conic Sections. 4th Edition, revised and enlarged. $2 25.

A Treatise on the Differential Calculus. With numerous Examples. 4th Edition. $3 50.

A Treatise on the Integral Calculus and its Applications. 3d Edition, revised and enlarged. $3 50.

Examples of Analytical Geometry of Three Dimensions. 2d Edition, revised. $1 50.

A Treatise on Analytical Statics. 3d Edition, revised and enlarged. $3 50.

Wilson. Elementary Geometry. Angles, Parallels, Triangles, Equivalent Figures, The Circle and Proportion. By J. M. Wilson, M.A. $1 25.

Wolstenholme. A Book of Mathematical Problems, on Subjects included in the Cambridge Course. By Joseph Wolstenholme. $2.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Abbott. A Shakespearean Grammar. An Attempt to illustrate some of the Differences between Elizabethan and Modern English. By Rev. E. A. Abbott, M.A. New and enlarged Edition. $1 75.

Bryce. The Holy Roman Empire. By James Bryce, D.C.L. 3d and cheaper Edition. $2 50.

Freeman. Old English History. By Edward A. Freeman, D.C.L. With 5 colored Maps. New Edition. $1 50.

Jephson. Shakespeare's Tempest. With Glossarial and Explanatory Notes. By Rev. J. M. Jephson. 50c.

Oppen. French Reader. For the Use of Colleges and Schools. By Edward A. Oppen. $1 50.

Sewell and Yonge. European History narrated in a Series of Historical Selections from the Best Authorities. Edited and arranged by E. M. Sewell and C. M. Yonge. First Series, A.D. 449—1153. $1 75. Second Series, A.D. 1088—1228. $1 75.

Yonge. Cameos from English History. From Rollo to Edward II. By the Author of "The Heir of Redclyffe." 2d Edition, enlarged. $1 50.

Yonge. Cameos from English History. Second Series. The Wars in France. By the Author of "The Heir of Redclyffe." $1 50.

Yonge. A Parallel History of France and England; consisting of Outlines and Dates. By Charlotte M. Yonge, Author of "The Heir of Redclyffe." $1 25.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S SCIENTIFIC CLASS-BOOKS.

Astronomy. By the Astronomer-Royal. Popular Astronomy. With Illustrations. By G. B. Airy. Sixth and cheaper Edition. 18mo, cloth. $1 50.

"Popular Astronomy in general has many manuals; but none of them supersede the Six Lectures of the Astronomer-Royal under that title. Its specialty is the direct way in which every step is referred to the Observatory, and in which the methods and instruments by which every observation is made are fully described. This gives a sense of solidity and substance to astronomical statements which is obtainable in no other way."—Guardian.

Astronomy. Mr. Lockyer's Elementary Lessons in Astronomy. With colored Diagram of the Spectra of the Sun, Stars, and Nebulæ, and numerous Illustrations. By J. Norman Lockyer, F.R.A.S. 18mo, $1 75.

"The book is full, clear, sound, and worthy of attention not only as a popular exposition, but as a scientific index."—Athenæum.

"An admirable text-book. Those who do not know much of science could not find a better and more accurate guide."—Museum.

"This book (Macmillan's Author's edition) is by far the best of its kind in our language. It is rare, indeed, that the great masters of a science can be induced to pause, in their work of research to help the beginner over his difficulties by writing a text-book. It is, moreover, of the greatest interest to education that these works should be written by masterly hands."—The Nation.

In ordering the above, please specify Macmillan's Author's Edition.

Questions on Lockyer's Elementary Lessons in Astronomy. For the use of Schools. By John Forbes-Robertson. 18mo, cloth, limp, 50c.

Physiology. Prof. Huxley's Lessons in Elementary Physiology. With numerous Illustrations. By T. H. Huxley, F.R.S. Thirteenth Thousand. 18mo, cloth, $1 50.

"The very best descriptions and explanations of the principles of human physiology which have yet been written by an Englishman."—Saturday Review.

"It is a very small book, but pure gold throughout. There is not a waste sentence or a superfluous word, and yet it is all clear as daylight. It exacts close attention from the reader, but the attention will be repaid by a real acquisition of knowledge. And though the book is small, it manages to touch on some of the very highest problems. . . . . The whole book shows how true it is that the most elementary instruction is best given by the highest masters in any science."—Guardian.

In ordering the above, please specify Macmillan's Author's Edition.

Questions on Huxley's Physiology for Schools. By T. Alcock, M.D. 18mo, 50c.

These questions were drawn up as aids to the instruction of a class of young people in Physiology.

Botany. Prof. Oliver's Lessons in Elementary Botany. With nearly 200 illustrations. By Daniel Oliver, F.R.S., F.L.S. Ninth thousand. 18mo, cloth, $1 50.

"It is very simple, but truly scientific, and written with a clearness which shows Prof. Oliver to be a master of exposition. . . . No one would have thought that so much thoroughly correct botany could have been so simply and happily taught in one volume."—American Journal of Science and Arts.

Chemistry. Prof. Roscoe's Lessons in Elementary Chemistry, Inorganic and Organic. By Henry E. Roscoe, F.R.S., Prof. of Chemistry in Owens College, Manchester. With numerous illustrations and Chromo-Litho. of the Solar Spectrum, and of the Alkalies and Alkaline Earths. New edition. Twenty-third thousand. 18mo, cloth, $1 50.

Chemical Problems, for use in Colleges and Schools. Adapted for the preparation of Students for the Government, Science, and Society of Arts Examinations. By T. E. Thorpe, Ph.D. With a Preface by Prof. Roscoe. 18mo, cloth, 50 cents.

Political Economy. Political Economy for Beginners. By Millicent G. Fawcett. 18mo, $1.

Logic. Elementary Lessons in Logic, Deductive and Inductive. By W. Stanley Jevons, M.A., Professor of Logic in Owens College, Manchester. With copious Questions and Examples, and a Vocabulary of Logical Terms. 18mo, $1 25.

Physics. Elementary Lessons in Physics. By Balfour Stewart, F.R.S., Prof. of Natural Philosophy in Owens College, Manchester. Copiously illustrated. 18mo, $1 50.

LIST OF EDUCATIONAL WORKS

COLLEGES, AND UNIVERSITIES.

THE CLARENDON PRESS SERIES.

"Such Manuals, so admirable in matter, arrangement, and type, were never before given to the world at the same moderate price."—SPECTATOR.

GREEK AND LATIN CLASSICS, ETC.

A Greek Primer, in English, for the Use of Beginners. By the Right Rev. Charles Wordsworth, D.C.L. 60 cents.

Greek Verbs, Irregular and Defective. By W. Veitch. New and revised edition. In Press.

The Elements of Greek Accentuation. Abridged from his larger work by H. W. Chandler, M.A. $1.

The Golden Treasury of Ancient Greek Poetry. By R. S. Wright, M.A. $3 50.

A Golden Treasury of Greek Prose. By R. S. Wright, M.A., and J. E. L. Shadwell, M.A. $1 75.

Homer, Odyssey, Books 1–12. By W. W. Merry, M.A. $1 50.

Sophocles Œdipus Rex. With Notes by Ven. Archdeacon Basil Jones, M.A. 60 cents.

Theocritus. With Notes by H. Snow, M.A. $1 50.

Xenophon, Selections from. With Notes and Maps, by J. S. Phillpotts, B.C.L. $1 25.

Cæsar, The Commentaries. Part I., The Gallic War: with Notes, etc., by Charles E. Moberly, M.A. $1 50.

Cicero's Philippic Orations. With Notes by J. R. King, M.A. $3.

Cicero pro Cluentio. With Introduction and Notes by W. Ramsay, M.A. $1 25.

Cicero. Selection of Interesting and Descriptive Passages. With Notes by Henry Walford, M.A. $1 25.

Cicero. Select Letters. With English Introduction and Notes by Albert Watson, M.A. $6 50.

Cornelius Nepos. With Notes by Oscar Browning, M.A. $1.

Ovid, Selections from. With Introductions, etc., by W. Ramsay, M.A. Edited by G. G. Ramsay, M.A. $1 75.

Selections from the less known Latin Poets. By North Pinder, M.A. $5.

Passages for Translation into Latin. Selected by J. Y. Sargent, M.A. $1.

MENTAL AND MORAL PHILOSOPHY.

The Elements of Deductive Logic. Designed mainly for the use of junior students in the Universities. By T. Fowler, M.A. $1.

The Elements of Inductive Logic. Designed mainly for the use of students in the Universities. By the same author. $1 50.

A Manual of Political Economy. By J. E. Thorold Rogers, M.A. $1 25.

MATHEMATICS, ETC.

Acoustics. By W. F. Donkin, M.A. $3.

An Elementary Treatise on Quaternions. By P. G. Tait, M.A. $5.

Book-keeping. By R. G. C. Hamilton and John Ball. 60 cents.

HISTORY.

Select Charters and other Illustrations of English Constitutional History. Arranged and edited by W. Stubbs, M.A. $3 50.

A Manual of Ancient History. By George Rawlinson, M.A. $3.

☞ In ordering, please specify Macmillan's Author's Edition.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE.

Natural Philosophy. By Sir W. Thomson, LL.D., and P. G. Tait, M.A. Vol. I., $10.

Descriptive Astronomy. By G. F. Chambers, F.R.A.S. $8.

Chemistry for Students. By A. W. Williamson, F.R.S. $2 50.

A Treatise on Heat. By Balfour Stewart, LL.D. New edition. In press.

Forms of Animal Life. By G. Rolleston, M.D. $6.

Exercises in Practical Chemistry. By A. G. Vernon Harcourt, M.A., and H. G. Madan, M.A. Series I. $2 50.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE.

A First Reading Book. By Marie Eichens. 15 cents.

Oxford Reading Book. For Junior Classes. 50 cents.

On the Principles of Grammar. By E. Thring, M.A. $1 50.

Grammatical Analysis, designed to serve as an Exercise and Composition-Book. By E. Thring, M.A. $1.

Specimens of Early English, from 1250 to 1400. With Notes by R. Morris. $2 25.

The Vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman. By William Langland. Edited by W. W. Skeat. $1.

Typical Selections from the best English Authors from the 16th to the 19th century. $1 25.

FRENCH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE.

Brachet's Historical Grammar of the French Language. Translated into English by G. W. Kitchin, M.A. $1.

Corneille's Cinna, and Molière's Les Femmes Savantes. Edited by Gustave Masson. $1.

Racine's Andromaque, and Corneille's Le Menteur. By the same editor. $1.

Molière's Les Fourberies de Scapin, and Racine's Athalie. By the same editor. $1.

Selections from the Correspondence of Madame de Sévigné. By the same editor. $1.

Voyage autour de ma Chambre, Ourika, La Dot de Suzette, etc. By the same editor. $1.

GERMAN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE.

Goethe's Egmont. With a Life of Goethe, etc. By Dr. Buchheim. $1.

Schiller's Wilhelm Tell. With Notes by Dr. Buchheim. $1 25.

ART, ETC.

A Hand-Book of Pictorial Art. By R. St. J. Tyrwhitt, M.A. $7.

A Treatise on Harmony. By Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart. $4.

A Treatise on Counterpoint, Canon, and Fugue. By the same author. $5.

The Cultivation of the Speaking Voice. By John Hullah. $1 25.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A System of Physical Education, Theoretical and Practical. By Archibald Maclaren. $2.

The Modern Greek Language, in its Relation to ancient Greek. By E. M. Geldart, B.A. $1 25.

A SERIES OF ENGLISH CLASSICS.

Chaucer. The Prologue to the Canterbury Tales, etc. Edited by R. Morris. $1.

Spenser's Faery Queene, Books I. and II. With Notes by G. W. Kitchin, M.A. $1 each.

Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, Book I. Edited by R. W. Church, M.A. 75 cents.

Shakespeare. Select Plays. Edited by W. G. Clark, M.A., and W. Aldis Wright, M.A.

1. The Merchant of Venice. 40 cents.
2. Richard the Second. 60 cents.
3. Macbeth. 60 cents.

Bacon. The Advancement of Learning. Edited by W. Aldis Wright, M.A. $1 50.

Milton. Poems, in 2 Volumes. Edited by R. C. Browne. $2. Vol. I., $1 25; Vol. II., $1.

Dryden. Select Poems. Edited by W. D. Christie, M.A. $1 25.

Pope. Essay on Man. With Notes, etc., by Mark Pattison. 50 cents.

LIDDELL & SCOTT'S GREEK LEXICONS, ETC.

A GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. Compiled by Henry G. Liddell, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, and Robert Scott, D.D., Master of Balliol College. Sixth edition. Crown 4to, cloth, pp. xvi., 1864, $12.

The present edition has been again carefully revised throughout; and, though brevity has been studied, the number of pages has been increased by one-eighth. Much of this increase is due to a collation of the copious Greek-German Lexicon of Palm and Rost, and of the last numbers of Dindorf's Stephanus; much also to the length at which the forms of Irregular Verbs have been treated—an addition for which full acknowledgments ought to be made to the Exhaustive List of these Verbs by Mr. Veitch, lately published at the Clarendon Press.

AN ABRIDGMENT OF LIDDELL & SCOTT'S GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. Thirteenth edition. Square cloth, pp. 782. $3.

A GREEK-ENGLISH VOCABULARY. Compiled from the best authorities. 24mo, cloth, pp. 1031. $1 50.

A New Edition of Macmillan & Co.'s Descriptive Catalogue of Educational Works is now ready, and will be sent free by mail on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., 38 Bleecker Street, New York.

VALUABLE EDUCATIONAL WORKS

PUBLISHED BY

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,

PHILADELPHIA.

SANFORD'S ARITHMETICS.

SANFORD'S FIRST LESSONS IN ANALYTICAL Arithmetic. 16mo.

SANFORD'S INTERMEDIATE ANALYTICAL Arithmetic. 16mo. Half-bound. 50 cents.

SANFORD'S HIGHER ANALYTICAL ARITHMETIC. 12mo. Half roan. $1 50.

CUTTER'S PHYSIOLOGIES.

CUTTER'S NEW ANALYTIC ANATOMY, Physiology, and Hygiene, Human and Comparative. 200 Illustrations. 12mo. Half-roan. $1 70.

CUTTER'S ANATOMY, PHYSIOLOGY, AND Hygiene. 150 Illustrations. Half-roan. $1 70.

CUTTER'S FIRST BOOK IN ANATOMY, Physiology, and Hygiene. 83 Illustrations. 12mo. Half-roan. 80 cents.

CUTTER'S (Mrs.) ANATOMY, PHYSIOLOGY, and Hygiene. 100 Illustrations. 12mo. Half-bound. 50 cents.

CHAUVENET'S MATHEMATICS.

CHAUVENET'S ELEMENTARY GEOMETRY. 8vo. Cloth. $2.

CHAUVENET'S PLANE AND SPHERICAL Trigonometry. 8vo. Cloth. $1 75.

CHAUVENET'S METHOD OF LEAST Squares. 8vo. Cloth. $1 75.

CHAUVENET'S SPHERICAL AND PRACTical Astronomy. 2 vols. 8vo. Cloth. $7.

JOHNSON'S ELEMENTARY ANALYTICAL Geometry. 8vo. Cloth. $2.

SUE'S PRACTICAL FRENCH COURSE.

ATWATER'S ELEMENTARY LOGIC. 16mo. Cloth. $1 50.

SAMSON'S ART CRITICISM. 8vo. Cloth. $3 50. Abridged. 12mo. Cloth. $1 75.

MORTON AND LEEDS'S STUDENT'S PRACtical Chemistry. 150 Illustrations. 12mo. Cloth. $2.

WICKERSHAM'S SCHOOL ECONOMY. 12mo. Cloth. $1 50.

WICKERSHAM'S METHODS OF INSTRUCtion. 12mo. Cloth. $1 75.

LINCOLN PHELPS'S SCIENTIFIC SERIES.

WEBSTER'S DICTIONARIES.

ETC., ETC., ETC.

WORKS OF REFERENCE.

LIPPINCOTT'S PRONOUNCING DICTIONary of Biography and Mythology. 2 vols. Large 8vo. Cloth. $11 per vol. Sheep, $12 per vol.

LIPPINCOTT'S PRONOUNCING GAZETteer of the World. Large 8vo. Sheep. $10.

ALLIBONE'S DICTIONARY OF AMERICAN and British Authors. 2 vols. Large 8vo. Cloth. $7 50 per vol. Sheep, $8 50 per vol.

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF UNIversal Knowledge. Revised Edition. Illustrated. 10 vols. Cloth. $5 50 per vol. Sheep, $6.

 Circulars and Descriptive Catalogues furnished on application, by mail.

CASSELL'S POPULAR EDUCATOR.

COMPLETE IN SIX VOLUMES.

PRICE, $15.

"We have gone over its pages with sentiments of real wonder. We know no work like it. It has occupied and filled up a field of education vast and most important to the community."—Dublin University Magazine.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,

596 Broadway, New York.

JUST PUBLISHED:

A TRIBUTE TO THE CENTENARY OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.

I.

SIR WALTER SCOTT:

THE STORY OF HIS LIFE.

BY R. SHELTON MACKENZIE.

With Portraits and Illustrations. 1 vol. 12mo, $2.

The author has, as an appropriate and lasting tribute to the memory of his distinguished fellow-countryman, prepared this biography of Scott, which is designed to fill a place that the magnitude and expense of more voluminous biographies render them impracticable to occupy. It is that of a popular life of the illustrious author, which will contain in a convenient and accessible form minute details of his varied and eventful experiences.

For the convenience of the reader, the epochs in the career of Scott, from his birth upwards, are chronologically divided into chapters, with detailed descriptive headings, giving a careful and correct synopsis of the significant events described in each chapter. Comprising many well-ascertained facts and particulars within the personal knowledge and recollection of the author, who was honored with the friendly acquaintance of Sir Walter, the book forms a most complete and valuable transcript of the life-work of Scott, and a fitting and useful companion to his published works, to which it serves as an indispensable guide and introduction.

II.

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE'S WORKS.

ILLUSTRATED LIBRARY EDITION.

THE

HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES

AND

THE SNOW IMAGE.

12mo, $2.

Illustrated and bound in handsomely stamped cloth. This forms the fifth volume of the new edition of Nathaniel Hawthorne's Works, designed both as an elegant and popular edition.

For sale by all Booksellers and Newsdealers. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price by the Publishers,

JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO.,

BOSTON.

E. P. Dutton & Co., 713 Broadway, New York, Special Agents for J. R. O. & Co.'s Publications.

THE FAMILY GARDEN,

A Monthly Paper, devoted to the interests of the FRUIT, FLOWER, AND VEGETABLE GARDEN.

No reading matter on any other subject will be found in any of its columns.

TERMS—Seventy-five Cents per year, or Five Copies for Three Dollars. Address,

Publishers of "FAMILY GARDEN,"

P. O. Box 2982, New York City.

HENRY K. VAN SICLEN,

BIBLIOPOLE,

133 NASSAU STREET

Catalogues sent on application.

Special attention given to orders by letter.

ARUNDEL SOCIETY.

This Society was founded in 1848, for promoting the knowledge of Art by copying and publishing

IMPORTANT WORKS OF ANCIENT MASTERS.

Its publications are beautifully executed

CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHS,

Fac-similes of the originals, both in color and drawing, and are manufactured under the superintendence of well-known artists. The following are among the

MOST POPULAR SUBJECTS.

CHRIST AND MARY MAGDALENE IN THE GARDEN. From a fresco by Fra Angelico, in the Convent of St. Mark, at Florence. Size, 15x8¼ inches. Price $6 25.

THE ADORATION OF THE KINGS. From a fresco by Pietro Perugino, at Cetta Della Pieve. Size, 22x18½ inches. Price $13 75.

ST. PETER DELIVERED FROM PRISON. From a fresco by Raffaelle, in the Stanza of the Vatican. Size, 28x19 inches. Price $12 50.

THE CORONATION OF THE VIRGIN. From a fresco by Fra Angelico, in the Convent of St. Mark, at Florence. Size, 18x19 inches. Price $10.

THE VIRGIN AND CHILD. From a fresco by Fra Bartolomeo, now placed in the Convent of St. Mark, at Florence. Size, 11x16½ inches. Price $8.

THE ADORATION OF THE LAMB. From the centre-panel of the Altar Piece painted by the brothers Van Eyck, in the Cathedral of St. Bavon, at Ghent. Size, 26x15½ inches. Price $15 75.

The sizes above-given are the actual sizes of each picture, all of them being mounted on a heavy white cardboard, so that when framed the white border can either be left as a margin, or not, at pleasure.

Any of the above pictures will be securely packed, free of charge, and sent by express, on receipt of advertised price.

POTT & AMERY,

Cooper Union, Fourth Avenue, New York.

LONDON BOOKS.

We invite the attention of Book-buyers to our Stock of RARE,

STANDARD,

AND

VALUABLE ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS,

which we offer at very low prices.

PRICED CATALOGUES

sent free of charge to any address.

A. DENHAM & CO.,

IMPORTERS OF ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS,

17 MURRAY STREET

(Near Broadway), New York.

BOOK-BUYERS.

Send for Catalogue of INTERESTING, USEFUL, and SCARCE BOOKS added to the Stock in hand of

FRANCIS EMMINS,

80 Nassau Street, New York.

ROBERTS BROTHERS, BOSTON,

HAVE IN PRESS,

ENGLISH LESSONS FOR ENGLISH LEARNERS,

BY REV. E. A. ABBOTT, M.A.,

Head Master of the City of London School, and

PROF. J. R. SEELEY, M.A.,

Author of "Ecce Homo."

One volume 16mo, price $1 50.

This is a Manual of the Study and Use of Language, intended for the general reader as well as for students. The Editor of the Boston "Literary World," who inspected the proof-sheets of the English edition, says of it in the issue for August:

"We have not space to speak of it at length, but a glance at its pages has qualified us to pronounce it a book of great value. It supplies a want very generally felt—that of some guide to the thorough understanding of language, and its correct, graceful, and forcible use—a branch of instruction which, until recently, has been sadly neglected in our schools. This book, in the language of its preface, 'deals only with those difficulties which, in the course of teaching, we have found to be most common and most serious.' Among these difficulties are ignorance of the meanings of words, inability to arrange words, the unfounded contempt for simple words, obscurity, etc, etc. The first part of the work is designed to furnish help to the student in these difficulties; another part treats of Diction; a third of Metre, etc. We can safely say to the many who are constantly wishing to learn how to write well, and complaining that no helps to that end are attainable, that in this book they will find judicious counsel and effective aid.

RECORD OF A SCHOOL,

Exemplifying the Principles and Methods of Moral Culture.

With a Prefatory Note by Miss Louisa M. Alcott, Author of "Little Women" and "Little Men."

One Volume 16mo, price $1 50.

Since the publication of "Little Men" there has been a good deal of curiosity to know if there ever existed a school like the "Plumfield School," and it has induced Mr. A. Bronson Alcott to bring out this new and revised edition of the Record of his School, taken down at the time by Miss Elizabeth P. Peabody, and published thirty years since. The School at Plumfield was in many respects modelled on an actual experience.

These books will be furnished to Professors and Teachers at the wholesale price, postage added.

ROBERTS BROTHERS,

Publishers,

BOSTON.

THE CORNELL UNIVERSITY.

The following General Courses are now fully established: Course in Philosophy (degree of Ph.B.); Course in Science (degree of B.S.); Course in Arts (degree of B. A.); together with various elective and special courses.

The following departments for Special Training are also organized and in operation: Agriculture; Architecture; Civil and Mechanical Engineering; Chemistry applied to Manufactures; Applied Geology; and Veterinary Surgery; in these, either diplomas or licentiate certificates are conferred.

Entrance Examinations, September 11 and 12. For circulars address

THE PRESIDENT OF THE CORNELL UNIVERSITY, ITHACA, N. Y.

WILLIAMS COLLEGE,

WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.

Applicants for admission to Williams College will be examined on Tuesday, June 27, at 9 A.M., in Alumni Hall.

There will be another examination at the same place on Wednesday, August 30, and private examination will be given to those who cannot conveniently be present on either of these days on application to the President.

Pecuniary assistance will be given to all young men of character and ability who may need it.

MARK HOPKINS, President.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY, CAMBRIDGE, Mass.

LAW SCHOOL—Instructors and Subjects for 1871–72.

PROFESSORS.

Emory Washburn, LL.D., Real Property and Constitutional Law.
Nathaniel Holmes, A.M., Evidence, Equity, and Bailments.
C. C. Langdell, A.M., Contracts, Sales of Personal Property, Civil Procedure.

LECTURERS.

George T. Bigelow, LL.D. (late Chief-Justice of Massachusetts), Marine Insurance.
Charles S. Bradley, LL.D. (late Chief-Justice of Rhode Island), Corporations.
Nicholas St. John Green, LL.B., Criminal Law and Torts.
John Lathrop, LL.B., Shipping and Admiralty.
John C. Gray, Jun., A.M., Conflict of Laws.

The Academic Year begins Sept. 28, 1871. Important changes have been made in the terms of admission, the course of study, the requisites for the degree, and the fees For a circular containing full information, address

JAMES W. HARRIS, Secretary, Cambridge, Mass.

YALE COLLEGE.

THE SHEFFIELD SCIENTIFIC SCHOOL

Offers professional training to Civil and Dynamical Engineers, Chemists, Geologists, Naturalists, etc., and also courses preparatory to such pursuits as Mining, Medicine, Agriculture, Manufacturing, etc. Letters may be addressed to Prof. D. C. GILMAN, Secretary, New Haven, Conn.

SCHOOL OF MINES, COLUMBIA COLLEGE.

Practical and theoretical instruction in civil and mining engineering, metallurgy, geology, mineralogy, assaying, analytical and technical chemistry, physics, mechanics, mathematics, drawing, French, German, etc., with laboratory practice. Regular courses for the degrees of Civil and Mining Engineer, Bachelor and Doctor of Philosophy. Special students received without examination. Pecuniary aid extended to those students who require it. Reopens Monday, October 3. Examinations for admission to the regular courses, Thursday, September 29. For further information and for catalogues apply to C. F. CHANDLER, Dean of the Faculty, East 49th Street, New York.

PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR ETON,

Harrow, Rugby, and the other Public Schools at Pickhurst, Chiddingfold, Surrey, England. Boys under fourteen years of age, 120 guineas. Age of admission from seven to ten years. These terms include instruction in the Classics, Mathematics, Arithmetic, French, the Elements of Natural Science, Drawing, History, Geography, Drilling, Gymnastics. ERNEST H. COLERIDGE, B.A.

References.—To the Rev. C. A. Johns, Winton House, Winchester; the Solicitor-General, Sussex Square, Hyde Park, London; the Hon. Horace Binney, Philadelphia; Ellis Yarnall, Esq., Philadelphia.

The Rev. Derwent Coleridge, Rector of Hanwell, near London, son of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, thus writes to a friend in Philadelphia in reference to the above: "My son Ernest is about to open a Preparatory School—as he hopes—of high class. He is well qualified for the undertaking, being an accomplished teacher and fond of the work. He has taken an excellent house, with ample grounds, in a beautiful part of the country in Surrey, about forty miles from London. He will be assisted by his elder sister, who thoroughly understands the business, and by an experienced housekeeper and matron. In a social point of view, I think I may say that the school will offer superior advantages for young lads who have some expectations in life."

RIVERVIEW MILITARY ACADEMY,

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.

Location healthy; Scenery unequalled; Building convenient; Teachers highly educated, earnest, working men; System of Order unsurpassed. A wide-awake, thoroughgoing School for Boys wishing to be trained for Business, for College, or for West Point, or the Naval Academy. Address OTIS BISBEE, A.M., Principal and Proprietor.

A FAMILY SCHOOL FOR BOYS

Of a high order is the

NEWBURGH INSTITUTE.

For circulars, etc., address

HENRY W. SIGLAR, Newburgh, N. Y.

COTTAGE HILL SEMINARY,

FOR YOUNG LADIES,

POUGHKEEPSIE, NEW YORK.

Reopens Wednesday, Sept. 13. With much personal care and culture are provided the best educational advantages offered in European or Home schools. For the prospectus, address the Rev. GEORGE T. RIDER, A.M., Rector.

MISSES PORTER & CHAMPNEY, FAMILY BOARDING SCHOOL, Old Hadley, Mass.

The Fall Term will commence on WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1871. For circulars and particulars address the Principals.

FAMILY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

FALL TERM commences SEPTEMBER 19. Number of Pupils limited. For Circulars apply to MRS. T. PRENTISS ALLEN, Northboro', Mass.

DARTMOUTH HOME SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES.

Instruction given in all departments. Apply for Circulars to

MISS L. J. SHERMAN, Principal, HANOVER, N. H.

BRADFORD ACADEMY

FOR YOUNG LADIES.

The next term of this institution, which is the first term of the year, will commence on Wednesday, the 30th of August, 1871. The new building is unsurpassed for its purposes. The course of study has been carefully revised, and is comprehensive, embracing both the solid and ornamental branches. Able teachers are employed, and are aided by the most learned lecturers in the country. Miss Johnson, the principal, now in Europe, will resume her duties at the beginning of the term. Application may be made to Miss ABBY H. JOHNSON, Principal, Bradford, Mass., or Rev. Rufus Anderson, LL.D., Boston, Mass.

JOHN D. KINGSBURY, Secretary, Bradford.

July 10, 1871.

STAMFORD INSTITUTE FOR BOYS.

TWENTY-FIRST YEAR.

Address W. C. WILLCOX, A.M., Rector.

STAMFORD, CONN.

CHEGARAY INSTITUTE.

English and French for Young Ladies and Misses, Boarding and Day Pupils, 1527 and 1529 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Will reopen on Wednesday, Sept. 20. French is the language of the family, and is constantly spoken in the Institute.

MADAME D'HERVILLY, Principal.

"AMER. SCHOOL INST."

FOUNDED 1855.

Is a reliable and practical Educational Bureau—
To aid those who want well-qualified Teachers
To represent Teachers who seek positions;
To give parents information of good Schools;
To sell, rent, and exchange School properties.

Sixteen years have proved it efficient in securing "the right Teacher for the right place."

J. W. SCHERMERHORN, A.M., Actuary,

14 Bond Street, New York.

COLLEGE TEXT-BOOKS.

WILSON, HINKLE & CO.,

PUBLISHERS,

CINCINNATI AND NEW YORK.

I.

RAY'S GEOMETRY AND TRIGONOMETRY. By Eli T. Tappan, A.M. 8vo, sheep, 420 pp.

II.

RAY'S ANALYTIC GEOMETRY. By Geo. H. Howison, A.M., Master in English High School, Boston. 8vo, sheep, 754 pp.

III.

RAY'S ELEMENTS OF ASTRONOMY. By S. H. Peabody, M.A., Professor of Natural Sciences, Chicago High School. 8vo, sheep, 336 pp.

IV.

COMPLETE ALGEBRA. By A. Schuyler, M.A. 12mo, sheep, 368 pp.

V.

PRINCIPLES OF LOGIC. By A. Schuyler, M.A. 12mo, cloth, tinted paper, 168 pp.

VI.

ELEMENTS OF PLANE AND SOLID GEOMETRY. By E. W. Evans, M.A., Professor of Mathematics, Cornell University. 12mo, cloth, 102 pp.

VII.

ELEMENTS OF NATURAL PHILOSOPHY. By Sidney A. Norton, A.M. 12mo, cloth, 468 pp. 360 Illustrations.

☞ Full DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE and PRICE-LIST of the above and other valuable Educational Publications sent to any address on application.

WILSON, HINKLE & CO.,

137 Walnut Street, Cincinnati,

or,

28 Bond Street, New York.

VALUABLE TEXT-BOOKS

FOR

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES,

RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY

D. VAN NOSTRAND,

23 MURRAY STREET AND 27 WARREN STREET, NEW YORK.

WEISBACH'S MECHANICS. Mechanics of Engineering and of the Construction of Machines. By Julius Weisbach, Ph.D. Translated from the Fourth Augmented and Improved German Edition by Eckley B. Coxe, A.M., Mining Engineer. Vol. I. Theoretical Mechanics. 8vo, 1,100 pages, and 902 Woodcut Illustrations. Revised Edition, $10.

THE PLANE TABLE AND ITS USE IN TOPOGRAPHICAL SURVEYING. 8vo. Illustrated. Cloth, $2.

LINK AND VALVE MOTIONS. By W. S. Auchincloss. Illustrated with Twenty-two Copperplate Engravings and Thirty-eight Woodcuts, including the Travel Scale. Third edition, revised and enlarged. 8vo, Cloth, $3.

LESSONS AND PRACTICAL NOTES ON STEAM, THE STEAM-ENGINE, PROPELLERS, etc. For Young Marine Engineers, Students, and others. By the late W. R. King, U.S.N. Revised by Chief-Engineer J. W. King, U.S.N. Thirteenth Edition, enlarged. 8vo, Cloth, $2.

A TREATISE ON THE PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE OF LEVELLING. Showing its application to purposes of Railway Engineering, and the Construction of Roads, etc. By Frederick W. Simms, C.E. Fifth Edition, revised and corrected, with the addition of Mr. Law's Practical Examples for Setting Out Railway Curves. Illustrated with three Lithographic Plates and several Woodcuts. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

TREATISE ON OPTICS; OR, LIGHT AND SIGHT. Theoretically and Practically Treated, with the application to Fine Art and Industrial Pursuits. By E. Nugent. With 103 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2.

PRACTICAL USE OF THE BLOW-PIPE. Being a Graduated Course of Analysis for the Use of Students and all those engaged in the examination of Metallic Substances. Second Edition, with an Appendix and a Copious Index. By Prof. G. W. Plympton, of the Polytechnic Institute, Brooklyn. 12mo, Cloth, $2.

A COMPENDIOUS MANUAL OF QUALITATIVE CHEMICAL ANALYSIS. By C. W. Eliott and F. H. Storer, Professors of Chemistry in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $2.

MECHANICAL DRAWING. A Text-Book of Geometrical Drawing for the Use of Mechanics and Schools. Illustrated with over 200 Diagrams engraved on Steel. By William Minifie. Eighth Edition, revised. Royal 8vo, Cloth, $4.

GEOMETRICAL DRAWING. Abridged from the Octavo Edition for the Use of Schools. By William Minifie. Seventh Edition. Illustrated with 48 Steel Plates. 12mo, half-roan, $1 50.

THE MECHANIC'S AND STUDENT'S GUIDE in the Designing and Construction of General Machine Gearings, as Eccentrics, Screws, Toothed Wheels, etc., and the Drawing of Rectilinear and Curved Surfaces. With Practical Rules and Details. Edited by F. H. Joynson. Illustrated with 18 folded Plates. 8vo, cloth, $2.

BURT'S SOLAR COMPASS. Key to the Solar Compass and Surveyor's Companion; comprising all the Rules necessary for use in the Field. By W. A. Burt. 1 vol. 18mo, pocket-book form, tuck, $2 50.

Copies of the above Works sent free by mail on receipt of Price.

☞ My New Catalogue of American and Foreign Scientific Books, 72 pages 8vo, sent to any address on receipt of Ten Cents.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form Libraries or enrich their Literary Collections, is respectfully invited to Harper's Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—COMPREHENDING OVER THREE THOUSAND VOLUMES—which are offered, in most instances, at less than one-half the cost of similar productions in England.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, etc., who may not have access to a trustworthy guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable for reference.

The Catalogue is arranged alphabetically by the authors' names, anonymous works by the titles. The index is arranged by the titles of the books, besides having numerous appropriate heads, each general head being followed by the title of every work on the subject. Persons desirous of obtaining information regarding any foreign land, will find under the name of the country the title of all books of travel, history, or biography relating thereto.

The Publishers believe this will meet a long-felt want.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books cannot be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will receive prompt attention.

Sent by mail on receipt of Six Cents.

Address

HARPER & BROTHERS,

Franklin Square, New York.

GAZZAM'S TREATISE

ON THE

BANKRUPT LAW.

SECOND EDITION JUST OUT.

For sale at all Law-Book Stores.

THE NATION PRESS.

The Proprietors of THE NATION PRESS give notice that they have established a Book, Pamphlet, Job, and Newspaper Printing-Office in this City, and are prepared to execute at moderate prices, for cash, the best of work in any and all of these branches.

For BOOKS they will furnish Electrotype or Stereotype Plates, as desired, and will guaranty unusual accuracy in their preparation.

J. ROSS & CO., 27 Rose St., New York.

THE "NATION" ABROAD.

Subscriptions and Advertisements for the Nation are received in Europe by the following

AGENTS:

GREAT BRITAIN AND THE COLONIES: George Street, 30 Cornhill, E.C., London.

FRANCE: Bowles Brothers & Co., 12 Rue de la Paix, Paris.

SWITZERLAND: Vérésoff & Garrigues, Place Bel-Air, Geneva.

ITALY: Furse Brothers & Co., 9 Piazza di Spagna, Rome.

BADEN-BADEN.

HOTEL DE FRANCE.

First-class Family Hotel. Splendid situation in the middle of the park.

PENSION

In the early and later part of the season.

WOOLWORTH, AINSWORTH & CO.,

51, 53, AND 55 JOHN STREET, NEW YORK. 111 STATE STREET, CHICAGO.

PUBLISH THE FOLLOWING

TEXT-BOOKS OF A HIGH ORDER, FOR UNIVERSITIES, COLLEGES, AND ACADEMIES.

HANSON'S NEW LATIN COURSE.

1. Preparatory Latin Prose Book. Containing all the Latin Prose necessary for entering College. With Notes and a Complete Vocabulary. Price $3.

2. A Hand-Book of Latin Poetry. Containing Selections from Virgil, Ovid, and Horace. With Notes and References. Price $3.

3. Selections from Ovid and Virgil. A Shorter Hand-Book of Latin Poetry. With Notes and Grammatical References, and a Vocabulary. Price $2.
This volume comprises all the Latin Poetry, Notes, and References contained in the larger volume, with the exception of Horace.

No. 1 embraces all the Latin prose requisite to preparation for college, with reference to the grammars most in use, Critical and Explanatory Notes, and a Vocabulary.

No. 2 completes the plan—furnishing all the requisite Latin poetry. The two volumes comprise all the Latin necessary to be read in preparing for a collegiate course, and all that is needed to complete the Latin reading of pupils who terminate their classical studies in our High Schools and Academies.

No. 3 is the same as No. 2, omitting the Selections from Horace.

4. Orations and Letters of Cicero. With Notes, References, and a Vocabulary. $2.

5. Cæsar. With Notes, References, and Vocabulary. $2.

CROSBY'S GREEK SERIES.

Scholars familiar with Professor Crosby's Works will be pleased to hear of the revisions now completed and in preparation, and of an entirely new condensed grammar. The Series as now ready comprises:

Greek Grammar, revised edition	$2 00
Compendious Greek Grammar (new)	1 50
Greek Lessons	1 00
Greek Tables, revised edition	60
Xenophon's Anabasis	1 25

MAGILL'S FRENCH SERIES, COMPLETED.
By Edward H. Magill, A.M., Prof. of Ancient and Modern Languages, Swarthmore College, Pa.

1. Magill's French Grammar. Presenting in a Concise and Systematic Form the Essential Principles of the French Language; including English Exercises to be translated into French. With Vocabularies, an Alphabetical List of the most Common French Idioms, and a Copious Index. To which is added a French, English, and Latin Vocabulary, containing the most Common Words in French which are derived from Latin. $1 50.

2. An Introductory French Reader. Containing Grammatical Exercises, progressively arranged, Familiar Conversations on various subjects, and Selections for Reading and Declamation. Together with Explanatory Notes, References to the Author's French Grammar, and an adequate Dictionary. $2.

3. Magill's French Prose and Poetry. Being an advanced French Reader, containing selections from the principal Classical French Poets and Prose Writers during the past two hundred years, or from the age of Louis XIV. to the present day. With Biographical Notices of the authors. The whole chronologically arranged; forming a brief Compendium of French Literature. Also a treatise upon French Versification, and Notes upon the Selections, Explanatory and Critical. $2.

The publishers take pleasure in announcing the completion of this French Series by the recent issue of Magill's "French Prose and Poetry." This volume of choice selections is prepared as a sequel to the author's "Introductory French Reader," an advanced French Reader, designed for the use of pupils who have made some progress in the study of the French language. The selections are culled from the principal classic French poets and prose writers from the age of Louis XIV. to the present day. The several authors are introduced in chronological order. In connection with the more prominent authors, introductory notices are given (in French) which, taken together, form a brief outline of the history of French literature during the past two hundred years.

This compilation has been made to meet the growing demand for selections from the best authors, "such as will most thoroughly train the pupils in idiomatic usages and the complete understanding of the language, and render them familiar with the treasures of its literature."

Part I. is devoted to selections in prose, beginning with Balzac, whose style is remarkable for its purity, and who is regarded as the founder of modern French prose literature, and ending with extracts from some of the most illustrious writers of the present day.

Part II., containing selections in poetry, begins with Malherbes, and, following chronological order, comes down to our own times.

Part III. consists of a brief treatise on French versification. The whole is followed by explanatory and critical notes on the text of the several authors, which add much to the interest and the usefulness of the work as a class text-book. (All the French extracts of this volume have been taken from works printed in France, and every avoidable source of typographical errors has been guarded against.)

A New Elementary Course of the German Language, for the use of Schools. By Gabriel Campbell, M.A., Professor in the State University of Minnesota. 12mo, pp. 200, $1 25.

The aim of this work is to make a practical application of the improvements developed by the growth of the modern science of Comparative Philology.

The author presents the German language to American learners, who are presumed to be acquainted with the English language, by way of comparison with the English in its points of similarity and of difference.

The plan is simple, philosophical, and practical, and the work is proving itself eminently successful. It has received very flattering encomiums from high authorities in all parts of the country where German is taught.

The book is divided into three parts:

Part I. General Principles.
Part II. Synopses—Forms of Words.
Part III. Special Principles, Reading and Analysis;

followed by a German and English Vocabulary to Part III. It contains also an English and German Vocabulary to Part I.

Campbell's Course in German has been officially adopted by the State of Minnesota, by the cities of Chicago, Milwaukee, and in many other smaller places. It is achieving remarkable success for a book so recently published.

The Cambridge Course in Physics. By William J. Rolfe, formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass., and Joseph A. Gillet, Professor of Mathematics and Physics in the Normal College of the City of New York. In 3 vols.

I. Chemistry	$2
II. Natural Philosophy	2
III. Astronomy	2

These books are inductive in method, fresh in matter, simple in style, fully illustrated, and handsomely printed, and they exactly meet the wants of our advanced Seminaries and Academies, and of those High Schools which can devote considerable time to these subjects.

They are not only used in the best schools, but they have also been extensively introduced into colleges.

THE HANDBOOK SERIES.

BY THE SAME AUTHORS.

In 3 vols.

I. Handbook of Chemistry	$1 25
II. Handbook of Natural Philosophy	1 25
III. Handbook of Astronomy	1 62

These books are especially adapted to a short course, extending through a single term of school.

They are not abridgments of the larger works by the same authors, but are wholly new and independent books, differing from the others in the selection, arrangement, and treatment of topics, so far as was necessary to fit them for a briefer and easier course of study. They are simple in style and eminently practical, yet thoroughly scientific, and giving the results of the latest discovery and research.

They are sure of a hearty welcome from teachers who desire books that shall be brief without being dry, and easy without being puerile. They contain just those facts and principles that every educated person should be acquainted with.

It is impossible to prepare books which shall be adapted to all schools; but it is hoped that the plan of these Handbooks is such that they may meet the wants of quite a wide range of schools.

The following points will commend the Series to all who wish for really valuable books:

1. They contain the results of the very latest discovery and research.
2. They are written in plain and simple English.
3. They are brief, but comprehensive.
4. They are inductive in method.
5. Each topic is followed by a carefully prepared Summary.
6. They will be kept fully up with the times by additions and alterations in the Appendixes, as these are demanded by the progress of science.
7. They are superior in point of illustration and mechanical construction.

BY JOHN BASCOM,
Professor of Rhetoric in Williams College:

I. Æsthetics; or, Science of Beauty. $1 75.
II. Philosophy of Rhetoric. $1 50.

BY J. T. CHAMPLIN, D.D.,
President of Waterville College, Maine:

I. Intellectual Philosophy. $1 50.
II. Ethics. $1 50.

Payson, Dunton & Scribner's National System of Penmanship. In 12 numbers, 15 cents each.

The most extensively used of any system in the world. The original model system.

DRAWING A PRACTICAL STUDY.

Bartholomew's System of Drawing.

This system of drawing is based upon the idea that drawing is a study, and that it can be taught; and is the only system adapted to schools of all grades. It consists of,

A SERIES OF TWELVE PROGRESSIVE DRAWING-BOOKS. 40 CENTS EACH.

In the first four numbers of the series, the author presents a course of instruction suited to the wants of the pupils in our public schools. The object aimed at is to give to the student that facility of hand, that discipline of eye, and that knowledge of the principles of drawing, which all should possess, let their calling in life be what it may. The remaining numbers of this series are intended for the use of those who have the time and opportunity to pursue the study further.

The following brief statements indicate the subject-matter of each book:

No. 1. Horizontal and vertical lines, together with plane figures and ornamental forms composed of these lines.
No. 2. Inclined lines, and ornamental forms composed of horizontal, vertical, and inclined lines; curved lines, circles, and ornamental forms composed of curved lines.
No. 3. Initiatory lessons in perspective; the method of drawing from objects explained; the laws of light, shade, and shadow presented.
No. 4. Advanced lessons on the subjects presented in No. 3.
No. 5. Lessons in drawing fruit and flowers.
No. 6. Initiatory lessons on foreground and foliage.
No. 7. Lessons on landscape-drawing.
No. 8. Marine views and landscapes.
No. 9. Initiatory lessons on animal-drawing.
No. 10. Advanced lessons on animal-drawing.
No. 11. Initiatory lessons on figure-drawing.
No. 12. Advanced lessons on figure-drawing.

TEACHER'S GUIDES.

As many of the teachers in our public schools have no experience in teaching the art, the author has prepared for their assistance a series of Manuals called the "Teacher's Guide." In these books, each example given in the drawing-books is fully explained. And, in addition to this, special pains have been taken to point out the author's method of teaching. With the aid afforded by these "Guides," any good teacher may not despair of leading a class to successful results.

Numbers 1, 2, 3, and 4 are designed to accompany the corresponding numbers in the series of Drawing-Books.

PRIMARY-SCHOOL DRAWING AND WRITING CARDS.

Price, 20 cents per package, of 24 Lessons.

The copies in these lessons are white on a black ground. Each set of cards contains examples in drawing and writing. This series of cards will consist of four sets. The two first sets are now ready. Each set contains twenty-four plates.

Set No. 1 contains a progressive series of Examples made up of dots and lines, so arranged as to form pleasing and useful subjects for practice; also, lessons in Printing and in Writing.

Set No. 2 embraces simple ornamental forms, outlines of familiar objects, and lessons in writing.

Sets Nos. 3 and 4 will contain examples similar to Nos. 1 and 2, but more advanced.

BARTHOLOMEW'S PRIMARY-SCHOOL SLATE.

Price 33 cents.

To make this primary series complete, a slate has been prepared especially adapted to these cards, with permanent ruling for writing and music on one side for the writing exercises, and a groove in the frame to hold the copy at an angle most favorable to the scholar's eye.

Accompanying these cards and slates there is a series of manuals for the use of teachers, prepared by Miss Stickney, Superintendent of the Boston Training School, called "The Teacher's Guide, Companion to Bartholomew's Lessons for Primary Schools," in which the method of teaching is so fully stated as to make the system available for every teacher, with or without previous skill or knowledge in drawing.

Wilson's Punctuation, for Authors, Editors, Proof-Readers, and all writers. New and elegant edition. $2.

GILLET'S NEW WORK.

The Federal Government, its Officers, and their Duties. $2.

Any of our Publications furnished for examination or introduction at liberal prices. Correspondence invited. Address the publishers,

WOOLWORTH, AINSWORTH & CO.,

111 State Street, Chicago. 51, 53, and 55 John Street, New York.

THEOLOGICAL AND MISCELLANEOUS WORKS

PUBLISHED BY

W. F. DRAPER, ANDOVER, MASS.

A HARMONY OF THE FOUR GOSPELS, IN GREEK. According to the Text of Tischendorf; with a Collation of the Textus Receptus, and of the Texts of Griesbach, Lachmann, and Tregelles. By Frederick Gardiner, D.D., Professor in the Berkeley Divinity School; author of "A Commentary on the Epistle of St. Jude," "A Harmony of the Gospels, in English," etc. 8vo, $2 50.

"A new and critical Harmony of the Gospels, prepared with great care; with Notes, Parallel References, etc., etc. Each column is clear and distinct, never interwoven with another on the same page.

A HARMONY OF THE FOUR GOSPELS, IN ENGLISH. A Reproduction of the Greek Harmony, in English. By the same Author. 8vo. $2.

WINER'S N. T. GRAMMAR. A Grammar of the Idiom of the New Testament: prepared as a Solid Basis for the Interpretation of the New Testament. By Dr. George Benedict Winer. Seventh Edition, enlarged and improved. By Dr. Gottlieb Lüneman, Professor of Theology at the University of Göttingen. Revised and authorized Translation. 8vo, pp. 744. Cloth, $5; sheep, $6; half-goat, $6 75.

"This standard work is complete in this Edition. It contains all the additions and corrections of the Author, and of his Editor, in the Seventh German Edition; with a full Index of Principal Subjects, a Greek Index, and an Index of Scripture Passages, distinguishing those commented upon from those simply referred to, in all over Eighty Pages of Indexes. Figures in the margin refer to corresponding pages of the Sixth and Seventh German Editions, and of Masson's English Translation, enabling one to find in this book any passage referred to in any one of these Editions."

STUART'S (PROF. M.) NEW TESTAMENT GRAMMAR. Second Edition, half-cloth. $1 25.

QUESTIONS ON KÜHNER'S ELEMENTARY GREEK GRAMMAR. By Charles W. Bateman, LL.D.; with Modifications and Notes by Samuel H. Taylor, LL.D., Principal of Phillips Academy. 12mo, flexible covers, 40c.

"These Questions are applicable to all other Elementary Greek Grammars, and are a valuable aid to both Teacher and Pupil.

HEBREW GRAMMAR. The Elements of the Hebrew Language. By Rev. A. D. Jones, A.M. 8vo, pp. 163, $1 75.

HEBREW PSALTER. Text according to Hahn; clear and beautiful. 32mo, morocco, $1.

HEBREW ENGLISH PSALTER. The Book of Psalms, in Hebrew and English, arranged in parallelism. 16mo, $1 50.

HEBREW GRAMMAR OF GESENIUS AS EDITED BY ROEDIGER. Translated, with Additions, and also a Hebrew Chrestomathy. By Prof. M. Stuart. Half-cloth, $1 25.

DÖDERLEIN'S HAND-BOOK OF LATIN SYNONYMES. Translated by Rev. H. H. Arnold, B.A., with an Introduction by S. H. Taylor, LL.D. New Edition, with an Index of Greek words. 16mo, $1.25.

THE FUNCTION OF THOUGHT. 16mo, pp. 213 (just published), $1 25.

"This volume forms one part or chapter of a larger proposed work under the title of 'Thoughts on Mediation; or, The Relation of Christ to the World.' The author proposes in this volume to show the base which exists in the normal constitution of humanity for the doctrine of Mediation; and also that this base is as wide and as universal as the whole scope of human thought.

CLASSICAL STUDY: its Usefulness illustrated by Selections from the Writings of Eminent Scholars. Edited, with an Introduction, by S. H. Taylor, LL.D., Principal of Phillips Academy. 12mo, $2.

"Twenty-two Essays by as many Scholars, presenting that subject in various lights."

A COLLECTION OF THE PROVERBS OF all Nations. Compared, Explained, and Illustrated. By Walter B. Kelly. 12mo, tinted paper, $1 25.

"This is one of those books, like Roget's Thesaurus, Haydn's Dictionary of Dates, and Lippincott's Pronouncing Gazetteer, which contain a vast amount of information in a very small space—books that a writer cannot afford to be without, for they contain information that by days of research in libraries one would hardly be able to obtain. This collection contains all the proverbs which are familiar in all nations. They are classified under various heads, such as Women, Love, Marriage, Home, Self-conceit, Ingratitude, and so on. There is also a full index, which enables one at once to find any particular proverb. Another excellent feature is that, when a proverb is taken from another language, not only the English, but the original is given. The book is replete with good things. It supplies a want that many a one has felt, a want that no dictionary, gazetteer, or book of quotations now supplies."—College Courant.

GOD'S OWNERSHIP OF THE SEA. By Leonard Swain, D.D. 8vo. Reprinted from the Bibliotheca Sacra. Paper covers, 25c.

STUDIES IN PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY. By Joseph Haven, D.D. 12mo, $2.

DISCOURSES AND ESSAYS. By Prof. William G. T. Shedd. 12mo, $1 50.

"The Doctrine of Original Sin. The Atonement a Satisfaction for the Ethical Nature of both God and Man," etc.

THE THEOLOGY OF THE GREEK POETS. By Prof. W. S. Tyler. 12mo, $1 50.

WHATELY'S ESSAYS. Some of the Difficulties in the Writings of St. Paul. 12mo, pp. 297, cloth extra, gilt tops, $2.

PECULIARITIES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION, and Historic Doubts relative to Napoleon Bonaparte. 12mo, pp. 264 and 48, $2.

HISTORIC DOUBTS CONCERNING NAPOLEON, pp. 48, 50c.

WONDER-WORKING PROVIDENCE OF SION'S SAVIOUR IN NEW ENGLAND. By Captain Edward Johnson, of Woburn, Massachusetts Bay. London. 1654. With an Historical Introduction and an Index. By William Frederick Poole, Librarian of Boston Athenæum. 4to, pp. 443. Published by Subscription. Edition limited to 200 copies, small paper, price $10 per copy; 50 large paper, $20 per copy; and 10 on drawing paper, $30 per copy. Only a few copies for sale. Terms to the Trade, special.

W. F. DRAPER, ANDOVER, MASS.

W. F. DRAPER also Publishes the Commentaries of Bishop O. J. Ellicott, Drs. E. Henderson, J. B. Lightfoot, and Prof. M. Stuart, etc. All Andover Publications may also be had of Hurd & Houghton, Felt & Co., New York; Smith, English & Co., Phil.; W. G. Holmes, Chicago; and all Booksellers. Send for a Descriptive Catalogue.

LIBRARIANS AND PRESIDENTS OF COLLEGES.

J. SABIN & SONS, Booksellers and Importers, New York and London, have most extensive facilities for the purchase of books in foreign markets. They will furnish estimates and lists to contemplating purchasers. A lengthened experience and a knowledge of books and their values will enable them to serve those who may trust them with commissions in an intelligent and satisfactory manner. A member of the firm will shortly leave for Europe for the purpose of executing commissions for the purchase of books. Any who may contemplate favoring them with orders will be supplied with further particulars on communicating their wants.

J. SABIN & SONS keep constantly on hand a large assortment of books in all Departments of Literature. A few of the Books for sale:

APPLETON'S AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA AND ANNUALS. 21 vols., half russia. $105.

PENNY CYCLOPEDIA. 27 vols., bound in 14, 8vo, calf. London, 1832. $27 50.

THIERS. History of the Consulate and Empire. 4 vols. 8vo, half-calf. Philadelphia, 1868. $13 50.

ROBERTS, D. Holy Land, Egypt, and Nubia. 4 vols. folio, half-mor., gilt edges.
A nice copy of this most magnificent work. $175.

GUIZOT. The History of Civilization. 4 vols. 12mo, calf, gilt. New York, 1864. Nice copy. $9.

GROTE. The History of Greece. 8 vols. 8vo, tree-calf, gilt top, uncut. London, Murray, 1862.
A splendid copy of this fine work. $70.

MILNER, THOS. The Gallery of Geography. A Pictorial and Descriptive Tour of the World. 2 vols. 8vo. London and Edinburgh. $7 50.

PROCTOR, R. A. The Sun, Ruler, Fire, Light, and Life of the Planetary System. Post 8vo, half-calf. London, 1871. $3 75.

CAMDEN SOCIETY PUBLICATIONS. Cloth, $100.
This valuable collection is of the highest interest to the Historical Student.

NOTES AND QUERIES. A fine set from the commencement to the present date. 43 vols. 8vo, half mor., gilt top, newly bound. All the indexes included. $175.

MERIVALE. History of the Romans under the Empire. 7 vols. 8vo, half-calf. New York, 1863. $20.

BEAMISH. History of the Discovery of America by the Northmen. 8vo, cloth. London, 1841. $1 75.

MONOGRAM AND ALPHABET ALBUM. A Collection embracing two series of Monograms. Over 1,000 different designs after the most tasteful French Artists. Cloth, portfolio, $6 50; bound, $7 50; half-mor., $8.

J. SABIN & SONS, Booksellers and Importers,

84 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.

22 BUCKINGHAM STREET, STRAND, LONDON.

ATHENS.

VIEWS OF THE ACROPOLIS.

The undersigned publish for the author an Album of photographic views, entitled "The Acropolis of Athens, Picturesquely and Architecturally Illustrated, by W. J. Stillman," printed in carbon by the Autotype Company, London.

These indestructible photographs are from 8x10 inch negatives, taken by Mr. Stillman during the winter and spring of 1869, and include all the views which are necessary to give the most complete idea of the existing ruins on the Acropolis, and their relation one to the other. They were taken with architectural lenses correcting the perspective distortions, and so that the proportions of the buildings may be measured as to scale, on any given plane; and most of them by Dallmeyer's wide-angle rectilinear lens, by the aid of which views never before successfully photographed have been rendered.

Of the twenty-five subjects, sixteen have not been taken by any other photographer, and the negatives used are selected from not less than 300 taken. The picturesque views show the Acropolis from five exterior points of view, and the architectural show those characteristics of Greek architecture which contribute to its unexplained as unapproached perfection—the curves of the horizontal lines, pitch of the columns, etc.

They are mounted on board about 13x22, with a page containing description opposed to each print; the whole bound in substantial and elegant style. Nothing finer of the kind, it may be safely asserted, has ever been offered for sale in this country. Edition limited to 100 copies.

Price, delivered at the Nation office, 3 Park Place, New York, $25.

Orders received by

E. L. GODKIN & CO.,

March 16, 1871. Office of the Nation, New York.

SINGLE VIEWS.

Enquiry having been made for single copies of the photographs contained in the Album, Mr. Stillman, while unable to furnish these in autotype, offers for sale a few duplicates printed by the ordinary silver process, along with other views enumerated below. The duplicates are marked with an asterisk:

VIEWS OF ATHENS (8x10):—Plain of Athens, from the East.—Valley of the Ilissus.—Mars Hill.—The Parthenon, from the South-east.—Columns of the Propylæa.—Tribune of the Caryatides.—Interior of the Propylæa.—Western façade of the Propylæa ().—Eastern façade of the Erectheum ().—Acropolis, from the Turkish town ().—Acropolis from the Ilissus ().—Fragments of Sculpture: Victory untying her sandals.—Victories with bull.—Victory elevating an offering.—Metope from the Parthenon.—Fragment of frieze from the Parthenon (Aeginetan school); do. do. (Attic school).

CRETAN VIEWS (8x10):—Bridge of Kalepa (Venetian).—Village of Kalepa.—View from Kalepa.—Convent of St. John (exterior); do. (interior).—Convent of the Holy Trinity: Olive-tree avenue; Cypress avenue; From the olive-trees; From the cypresses; The interior and church; The Cloisters.—Canéa: The city and plain; Ruins of the citadel (Venetian); Fortifications; Doorway of ruined palace (Venetian); Courtyard of a mosque; Marina and dogana; Gate of the Castelli.—Town of Platania (ancient Pergamos).—Statue of Minerva found at Kisamos.—Ravine of Theriso.

VIEWS IN AND NEAR ATHENS (7¼x4½):—Port of Peiræus.—Secret Port of ancient Peiræus.—Ruins of the Long Wall and Plain of Athens.—Ruins of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius.—Acropolis, with columns of the temple of Jupiter.—Choragic monument of Lysicrates.—Theatre of Bacchus; Altar from ditto (4½x3½); Choragic monument above ditto (4½x3½).—Arch of Hadrian.—Temple of Theseus (three views).—Pnyx.—Way of the Enneapylæ (footprints of the sacrificial animals).—University of Athens (modern).—Byzantine church (4½x3½).—Temple of the Winds (4½x3½).—Portico of Hadrian 4½x3½).—Bed of the Ilissus.—Two views on the Cephisus.—Town of Aegina and Temple of Venus.—Two views of the Temple of Minerva (Aegina).—Plain of Marathon and mound of the Greek dead.—Athens from Plato's Academy.—Acropolis from Mars Hill.—Grotto of Pan.

AMERICAN VIEWS (7¼x4½):—Glen Ellis fall (White Mountains).—Glen Ellis, with fall in the distance.—Crystal cascade.—Glen below the Crystal cascade.—Two views of Mt. Kineo (Moosehead Lake).—Forest study.—Moosehead trout.

Price of the large views (8x10)—mounted, $1; unmounted, 85 cts. Of all the rest—mounted, 60 cts; unmounted, 50 cts. Payable in advance, together with postage on orders for less than six, viz.: for one to five large photographs—mounted, 30, 35, 40, 45, 50 cents; unmounted, 30 cents. For one to five small ones—mounted, 15, 20, 25, 30, 35 cents; unmounted, 15 cents. Orders to be filled in the course of thirty days after receipt.

Address E. L. GODKIN & CO., as above.

BOOKS FROM LONDON.

J. SABIN & SONS

Are in constant receipt of Fine, Standard, and Miscellaneous Books direct from London.

SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

A few of the Books for Sale.

ACCOUNT OF THE ENGLISH STAGE, from the Restoration, in 1660, to 1830. 10 vols. 8vo, half-morocco (newly bound), $22 50. Bath, 1822.

BURNS, BYRON, DEFOE, CHAUCER, and Spencer, Smollett, Swift. Large 8vo edition of the Works of the above authors. Cloth, gilt top, new and fresh. Edinburgh. Sold separately, $1 50 each.

DICKENS'S WORKS. Household edition. 53 vols. New York. Vellum cloth, $40.

PROCTOR. The Sun. 12mo, cloth. London, 1871. $4. Copies somewhat damaged, $2.

POE, E. A. Poetical Works. With Original Memoir. Beautifully illustrated by Tenniel, Birket Foster, Darley, etc. Printed on fine paper. 8vo, morocco, gilt edges. New York, 1858. $5.

DR. SYNTAX. His Three Tours. Illustrated by Rowlandson's Humorous Plates, colored. 3 vols. 8vo, half-calf, gilt. A nice copy, with good impressions of the plates. $16.

SHAKESPEARE. Knight's beautiful edition. Original impression. 8 vols. 8vo. A handsome copy bound in calf, gilt. Very cheap. $60.

A member of our firm will leave for Europe next month for the especial purpose of filling orders for Public or Private Libraries and Booksellers. Address communications to

J. SABIN & SONS,

BOOKSELLERS AND IMPORTERS,

84 Nassau Street, New York, and 22 Buckingham Street Strand, London.

POPULAR BOOKS

FOR SUMMER READING.

KINGSLEY. At Last: A Christmas in the West Indies. By Charles Kingsley. With numerous Illustrations, $2.

YOUNG. A Memoir of Charles Mayne Young. With Extracts from his Son's Journal. By Julian Charles Young. With Portraits. $2 25.

BARKER. Spring Comedies. Stories. By Lady Barker, author of "Station Life in New Zealand." $1 50.

WAR. The Daily News Correspondence of the War between Germany and France. 1870–1. Edited with Notes and Comments. Complete in one volume. With Maps and Plans. $2 50.

PARIS. Inside Paris during the Siege. By an Oxford Graduate. Crown 8vo, $2.

PALGRAVE. Lyrical Poems. By Francis Turner Palgrave. Fcap. 8vo, $1 75.

MACMILLAN & CO.,

38 BLEECKER STREET, NEW YORK.

THE BEST EVENING PAPER.

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

PUBLISHED AT 2, 3, 4, AND 5 O'CLOCK.

One year, invariably in advance	$9 00
Six months, in advance	4 50
Three months, in advance	2 25
Per month, in advance	0 75

Single copies, for sale everywhere, at 3 cents.

Terms of Advertising in Daily.

Advertisements, Leaded or Displayed, on First, Second, and Fourth pages, 10 cents per line each insertion.

Local Items, on Editorial page, before Business Notices, 25 cents per line agate measure, each insertion.

Business Notices, 20 cents per line each insertion.

Notices after Money Article, or in Editorial columns, 50 cents per line, agate measure, each insertion.

Advertisements on Third page, Leaded or Displayed, 15 cents per line each insertion.

☞ All advertisements charged for the space they occupy, on a scale of 14 lines to an inch.

☞ No advertisement inserted in any part of the paper for less than 75 cents first insertion.

NEW YORK SPECTATOR.

The Cheapest Reading,
The Best Weekly,
The Largest for the Price.

TELEGRAPHIC, POLITICAL,
PERSONAL, LOCAL,
LITERARY, COMMERCIAL.

Its News, Market Reports, Financial Review, and Editorials are made up from the New York Commercial Advertiser, the leading evening paper of the country, the oldest, best, and most reliable journal published in the United States.

In the columns of the Spectator will be found matter interesting and instructive to the farmer and his family.

Its Financial, Commercial, and Market Reviews will be full, complete, and satisfactory to merchants and business men.

Especial attention is to be given to that department which will be most attractive to the ladies. The Latest Fashions, Household Miscellany, Stories, Poetry, etc., for the home circle.

Its Editorial Matter will be found fresh and sparkling, bold in tone, spicy in matter, accurate, concise, and read-

Terms of Subscription.

Single copies, one year	$1
10 copies, one year	9
20 copies, one year, one address	16
40 copies, one year, one address	30

Terms of Advertising in Weekly.

Published on Thursday.

One month, or 4 insertions, 10 cents per line each insertion.

Three months, or 13 insertions, 8 cents per line each insertion.

Six months, or 26 insertions, 6 cents per line each insertion.

One year, or 52 insertions, 5 cents per line each insertion.

Advertisements must be received by 3 o'clock on Wednesday to ensure insertion.

Be particular and direct all orders,

HUGH J. HASTINGS,

Corner of Fulton and Nassau Streets, New York.

Weekly papers copying the above Prospectus, and sending us a marked copy, will be entitled to a copy of the Spectator for one year.

STANDARD TEXT-BOOKS & WORKS OF REFERENCE

PUBLISHED BY

CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO.,

FOR COLLEGES, ACADEMIES, AND HIGH SCHOOLS.

ALEXANDER.

OUTLINES OF MORAL SCIENCE. By Archibald Alexander, D.D. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

BOWEN.

AMERICAN POLITICAL ECONOMY. By Prof. Francis Bowen. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

CLARK, N. G.

AN OUTLINE OF THE ELEMENTS OF the English Language. For the Use of Students. By N. G. Clark, Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in Union College. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.

CRAIK.

A COMPENDIOUS HISTORY OF ENGLISH Literature, and of the English Language, from the Norman Conquest. With numerous Specimens. By George L. Craik, LL.D. 2 vols. 8vo, cloth, $7 50.

DE VERE, PROF. M. SCHELE.

STUDIES IN ENGLISH; or, Glimpses into the Inner Life of our Language. By M. Schele De Vere, LL.D., Professor of Modern Languages in the University of Virginia. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

HOPKINS.

THE LAW OF LOVE AND LOVE AS A Law; or, "Christian Ethics." By Mark Hopkins, D.D., LL.D., President of Williams College. 1 vol. 12mo, $1 75.

LORD.

THE OLD ROMAN WORLD. The Grandeur and Failure of its Civilization. By John Lord, LL.D. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $3.

ANCIENT STATES AND EMPIRES. By John Lord, LL.D. 1 vol. crown 8vo, $3.
A new and cheaper edition for schools. 1 vol. 12mo, $1 50.

McILVAINE.

ELOCUTION; The Sources and Elements of its Power. By Prof. J. H. McIlvaine. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 75.

MÜLLER.

CHIPS FROM A GERMAN WORKSHOP. Essays on the Science of Religion; on Mythology, Traditions, and Customs. By Max Müller, M.A., Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford. 3 vols. crown 8vo, uniform with "Lectures on Language," etc., $7 50.

LECTURES ON THE SCIENCE OF LANGUAGE, delivered at the Royal Institution of Great Britain, in April, May, and June, 1861. 2 vols., cloth, crown 8vo, $6.

MARSH, G. P.

THE ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF THE English Language, and of the Early Literature it Embodies. By George P. Marsh. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $3.

LECTURES ON THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE. First series, 4th edition, revised and enlarged. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $3.

MAN AND NATURE; or, Physical Geography, as Modified by Human Action. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $3.

PORTER.

Books and Reading.

WHAT BOOKS SHALL I READ, AND How shall I Read Them? By Pres. Noah Porter, of Yale College. 1 vol. crown 8vo, with a complete Index, $2.

THE HUMAN INTELLECT. With an Introduction upon Psychology of the Human Soul. By Noah Porter, D.D., LL.D., President of Yale College. 1 vol. 8vo, $5.

PERRY.

ELEMENTS OF POLITICAL ECONOMY. By Arthur Latham Perry, Professor of History and Political Economy in Williams College. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

WHITNEY.

LANGUAGE AND THE STUDY OF LANGUAGE. Twelve Lectures on the Principles of Linguistic Science. By William Dwight Whitney, Professor of Sanskrit and Instructor in Modern Languages in Yale College. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

WOOLSEY.

INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF International Law. Designed as an Aid in Teaching and in Historical Studies. By T. D. Woolsey, D.D., LL.D. This edition revised and enlarged, cloth, $2 50.

Full Descriptive Catalogue of Charles Scribner & Co.'s Miscellaneous, Theological, and Educational Publications sent on application.

These books are for sale by ALL Booksellers, or sent, post-paid, on receipt of the price by the Publishers.

CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO., PUBLISHERS,

654 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

VALUABLE NEW WORKS

JUST IMPORTED BY

SCRIBNER, WELFORD & CO.,

654 BROADWAY, BETWEEN BLEECKER AND BOND STREETS.

RAWLINSON'S EASTERN MONARCHIES.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

The Five Great Monarchies of the Ancient Eastern World; or, The History, Geography, and Antiquities of Chaldæa, Assyria, Babylon, Media, and Persia. By Geo. Rawlinson. A new and thorough edition, partly rewritten. Complete in 3 handsome vols. 8vo, with maps and 650 illustrations. Price reduced to only $15.

A CURIOUS BOOK. Napoleon III.: The Man of His Time. Part I. The Story of the Life of Napoleon III. By James M. Haswell. Part II. The Same Story as Told by Popular Caricaturists of the Last Thirty Years. 1 thick vol. 12mo, with nearly 200 comic illustrations. $3 75.

THE WORLD-RENOWNED COMIC ALMANAC. The Comic Almanac, containing Merry Tales, Humorous Poetry, Quips, and Oddities. 1 very thick vol. crown 8vo, illustrated by George Cruikshank with many hundred irresistibly comic engravings. $3 75.

VALUABLE WORK OF REFERENCE. The Dictionary of Biographical Reference, containing 100,000 names, including the greatest number of distinguished Americans ever collected in one work. By Lawrence B. Phillips. 1 large handsome vol. 8vo, half-morocco. Price reduced to $13 50.

THE NEW BIBLE COMMENTARY.

A NEW SUPPLY.

The Holy Bible according to the Authorized Version, 1611. With an explanatory and critical commentary, and a revision of the Translation, by Bishops and other Clergy of the Anglican Church. Edited by F. C. Cook, M.A., Canon of Exeter. Vol I. in two parts, containing the whole of the Pentateuch. Beautifully printed in very clear type. Price reduced from $15 to only $8.

NEW WORK ON FRANCE. France and Hereditary Monarchy. By John Bigelow. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth, $1 50.

THE SUNNY SOUTH. Scenes in the Sunny South: including the Atlas Mountains and the Oases of the Sahara in Algeria. By Col. Vereker. 2 vols. 12mo, $10 50.

THE BEST BOOK ON BANKING. The Principles and Practice of Banking. By the late I. W. Gilbart. New edition, revised, and in great part rewritten. 1 large vol. 8vo, cloth, $6 50.

PRIMITIVE CULTURE. Researches into the Development of Mythology, Philosophy, Religion, Art, and Custom. By Edward B. Tylor. 2 vols. 8vo, cloth, $12.

TRAVELS IN THE AIR. By James Glaisher, Camille Flammarion, W. de Fonvielle, and Gaston Tissandier. Edited by James Glaisher, F.R.S. One very handsome volume royal 8vo, with 118 illustrations, extra cloth. $12 50.

CARLYLE'S WORKS.

PEOPLE'S EDITION.

MR. THOMAS CARLYLE'S WORKS, People's Edition, now being published in Monthly Volumes, each 90 cents. Small crown 8vo, handsomely printed in clear type, with good paper and cloth binding, each 90 cents.

Vol. 1. Sartor Resartus. 1 vol., with Portrait of Mr. Carlyle.
Vol. 2. French Revolution. Vol. I.
Vol. 3. " " Vol. II.
Vol. 4. " " Vol. III.
Vol. 5. Life of Sterling. (Ready Sept. 1.)

SYNONYMES DISCRIMINATED. A Complete Catalogue of the Synonymous Words in the English Language, with Descriptions of their Various Shades of Meaning, etc. Illustrated by quotations from standard writers. By C. J. Smith, M.A., Christ Church, Oxford, author of Synonymes and Antonymes Collated and Contrasted, etc. One handsome vol., demy 8vo, cloth, reduced from the regular price of $8 to only $6.

LIGHT SCIENCE FOR LEISURE HOURS. A Series of Familiar Essays on Scientific Subjects, Natural Phenomena, etc. By R. A. Proctor, B.A., F.R.A.S., Author of "Saturn and its System," "Other Worlds than Ours," "The Sun," etc. 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth extra, $3.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, AUGUST 24, 1871.

The Week.

SUPPOSE Warmoth and his Republicans in New Orleans had been men of nerve enough to attempt the enforcement of their right to seats in the State Republican Convention, and the State Governor had been shot down by United States troops surrounding the convention, not in obedience to the requisition of the Governor, but of the United States Marshal, who wishes to be nominated as governor, and at the instance of the United States Collector, who wishes to be a senator; could the President in that case have withstood the demand for the punishment of those officials by removal? He has most certainly not acted with sufficient promptness for the country's good, or the party's, or his own in this business; and in case he should not act at all, his offence must surely be recollected against him. That "he means no harm" in no way relieves a maker of legal precedents against the freedom of a country; and nothing better than that is said for General Grant, while worse things are said in plenty, and not without color of truth.

Senator Morton continues his speech-making, his last performance having been in St. Louis. Whether his be taken as the "utterances of the President's counsellor," or simply as those of "an eminent member of the Republican party," they are always worth attention. No other politician watches public sentiment—the sentiment of his public, that is—more closely, or trims to it more carefully. That he is capable of grossly misjudging it concerns those chiefly who pin their faith to him; his false intuitions only make him more interesting as a political weathercock. When he came, in the course of his remarks at St. Louis, to deal with the civil-service reform, and the probable policy of the party in regard to it, he was an especial object of interest, inasmuch as, during Grant's administration, the senator has probably made more unfit and corrupt recommendations to office than any of his colleagues in Congress. Some of the worst of them were for judicial positions, and it was, perhaps, in recollection of these that, denouncing life-tenures in the civil service, he said: "We have got only one institution of that kind, that is, the Supreme Court of the United States; and if we had to make that over, we would not put these gentlemen on the bench for life." Beyond his belonging, however, to the "great Republican reform party," which "wants to make any reform in that department that it can," the senator said nothing that indicated any personal desire for the purification of the civil service, or any but the vaguest notions in regard to it. He must "be allowed to say, in justice to General Grant, that he appears to be the first man that has taken a practical step in that direction." But it turns out that the commission appointed by the practical President, when asked in its turn "to devise something that was practical," was "met with difficulties at the very threshold," although some of its members, if Mr. Morton had been correctly informed, were "distinguished editors who had been writing very voluminously in favor of civil-service reform." Our civil service is imperfect, as human nature is imperfect, but it is "by far the best in the world"; and, considering the perfection of our Constitution, it is certainly not strange that constitutional objections should have arisen to the proposed change. As to the "particular measure" of reform, Senator Morton was wisely undecided. He would not vote to constitute "an aristocracy sufficient to revolutionize this government in twenty-five years"; but neither would he commit himself to a limited instead of a life tenure. He concluded his remarks on this topic by warning off the Democratic party from a reform which the Republican party had pre-empted—if anything was to be made out of it.

The Ohio Republicans are doing very much better than they expected, and now may have good hopes not only of beating McCook for Governor, but also of getting the Legislature into their hands, a thing which looked more than doubtful, and which is of importance because it will elect a senator—perhaps himself, perhaps not—to succeed Mr. Sherman, and because it will have charge of the redistricting of the State. This latter task requiring an exercise of pure justice for its right fulfilment, and man being the creature he is, Republicans as such are rejoicing that the work is to fall to them and not to the Democrats. The Democrats have certainly had extreme ill fortune in the campaign. They divided about the "New Departure"; the author of the New Departuer, who might, possibly, have reconciled them all to it, died suddenly, by accident; it was discovered that the gentleman supposed to be nominated had not really been nominated, and the friends of McCook's competitor, the actual nominee, General Ewing, sulk in their tents in consequence, and even think his rival somewhat dishonorable; while, to cap the climax, Governor McCook, who is a good canvasser and speaker, breaks down in what is said to look like insanity. Though that is not the true capping of the climax either; Mr. Pendleton's repudiating schemes are still popular enough in Ohio to need some more stamping out, as Mr. Thomas Ewing's astounding financial scheme shows, and yet the apostle of repudiation, Mr. Pendleton, has come home to make speeches; and everybody believes he comes to be, if he can, Mr. Sherman's successor, in case the Legislature can be made Democratic. The Democracy have fought hard for Ohio, and had the good fortune to get her when last a senatorship was the prize, but they will do miracles if they can bear up against all this ill-luck.

In both Ohio and Pennsylvania, various local and temporary causes will affect this year's elections, and these will, therefore, give but uncertain sign of what may be expected next year, though we may certainly look on the position of Mr. Ewing in Ohio, and on the wrath of the old-fashioned Democrats over the New Departure, as facts of more than momentary significance. On the whole, however, these elections, supposing them to result, as we expect, in Ohio's going Republican and Pennsylvania Democratic, will leave the political prospect in nearly all the doubt in which it has been for some time lying. So, too, of the elections in Maine and California. Maine, it is not doubted, will go Republican on a light vote. California may be expected to poll a heavy vote, but it seems rather idle to talk of the Californian election as if it were a naked contest between the pure Republican idea and the pure Democratic, especially when we have the Irish reason given that the two parties have precisely the same platform. The fact seems to be that the State is likely to go Republican, because Governor Haight, with his broken pledges as to subsidized railroads, and his very variegated political career, really pleases but few Democrats, while Mr. Booth pleases all Republicans, and will get 2,000 new negro votes in a State that was carried for Grant by 514 majority. More significant than any of these elections, though of a significance not yet to be measured with exactness, is the fact that Mr. Greeley, having gone through the South, is now going through the West and Northwest, feeling the public pulse in lectures and speeches, and, beyond a doubt, doing his best to make public opinion against Grant wherever he goes. A far more formidable enemy Grant will find him in his own and other people's "sanctums" than in the convention as a candidate for the nomination—if, indeed, there can be any seriousness in the sustained rumor that puts him in the absurd position of a candidate.

"A Constant Reader" of the Nation having read what we said the other day concerning the corrupt government of Louisiana, puts to us three questions, in substance as follows: First, Is not the material prosperity of Louisiana greater to-day than in 1860 or 1866; and is it not greater in consequence of the greater attention paid by the present rulers to the development of the State's resources? Second, Has not the State been building miles on miles of levees in place of those destroyed by the war? Third, Is not the State's liability to large expenditures in repairing the damages caused by the high water of last spring, the reason of the expected tax of $2 on a hundred for the current financial year? He thinks that we are too hard on the State government when we say of it that, since the war, it has been, like the State government of North Carolina and that of South Carolina and those of other Southern States, grossly and shamelessly corrupt, unless we have better grounds for saying so than are to be found in the fact that the State tax was in 1860 21 cents on the $100; in 1865, 37½; in 1867, 52; in 1869, 75; in 1870, $1 45; and is confidently and reasonably expected to be, in 1871, more than $2. There are other grounds for thinking the present State governments of some of the Southern States a curse to the States themselves, and one of the heaviest loads the Republican party has to carry; but whether there are better grounds is a question.

It would be simply absurd to say that the material prosperity of Louisiana is greater now than it was in 1860. With the value of the slave property at that date we need not concern ourselves. We may confine our attention to the fact that the actual value of the real estate of Louisiana was in 1860 nearly twice as great as it is to-day, after five years of peace and of business activity. As for the levees, the State has since the war built and repaired miles of levees. The objection is that she has built them and repaired them at an expense of eight millions of dollars, of which sum competent persons estimate that about two and two-thirds millions have gone into the levees, and about five millions, more or less, have gone elsewhere. Perhaps Governor Warmoth could tell us. He publicly charged it against another State official last week that he had offered $50,000 for the Governor's signature to a certain bill; and the other State official says that the Governor did indeed decline the $50,000, and was very angry because he could not have $75,000 offered him, though there was not that much money "in it." As for the "liability" of the State in the matter of building levees, and its connection with the expected increase in taxation, it is as true as it is unfortunate that she is liable; and she is liable for large expenditures in rebuilding levees for building which—"fruitlessly," says the State Auditor—she has already paid thrice too much. Of this year's expected tax of $2 on the hundred, forty cents will be the amount which the last Legislature authorized a private corporation to take for the purpose of doing work in rebuilding levees—a tax which will amount to more than a million dollars. Moreover, the Legislature granted this right of rebuilding levees to the corporators for the next twenty years. Our correspondent may rest assured that the contempt for "the carpet-bagger", which, he says, he learned when in the South, will not be diminished by steady contemplation and full information of the condition of things in Louisiana. If he is a delegate to the Republican National Convention next summer, we advise him, in view of the polls, to be perfectly indifferent as to how Louisiana delegates, and those of some other Southern States, cast their votes for a nominee.

We appear to have been gallant enough in Corea, but that we have been very judicious does not appear; for it may be doubted, though we have killed some hundreds of Coreans, if we have not spoiled a diplomatic mission, then, by coming away after our victory, put ourselves in the position of the defeated party, and, finally, got on our hands an ugly and expensive job of a war in those distant waters. Five years ago next month a schooner, the General Sherman, with American papers, went to Corea for purposes of trade, some say illegal, some say legal. Nobody knows but the Coreans, who in 1867 would not answer Commander Shufeldt, in the Wachusett, and who in 1868 told Commander Sebiger, in the Shenandoah, that a certain foreign vessel did, at about the time mentioned, arrive in their waters; that the local official went on board and addressed the officers in humble language, but that both turned round and went asleep, thus insulting him; that a man on board, named Tony, a Frenchman—the French had had war with the Coreans a year before—used violent and unreasonable conduct towards them; that the people nevertheless were very kind and attentive to Tony and his friends, although warning them that it was unlawful for them to penetrate into the country; that the foreign vessel went, however, and had no sooner reached the chief city than her men seized the adjutant-general's ship, loaded the adjutant-general with chains, shattered into pieces many merchant vessels, robbing the crews, until by-and-by the whole city, aroused by these misplaced actions, turned out and fired guns, launched rafts of burning wood, let off cannon, fought with knives and swords, the foreigners fighting likewise, till at last the foreign ship blew up, and every man on board perished. Commander Sebiger had no great confidence in this narrative of facts, as it is well enough known that the crew of the General Sherman, except two, were massacred, with or without more or less reason, as the case may be; at all events massacred, and to be accounted for. But he could get no redress, and had to come away after one of his surveying boats had been fired on. This last expedition, made by Rear-Admiral Rodgers, had for its object to put Minister Low in communication with the Corean king, and the minister was to make enquiry after the Sherman's crew, and see if some good understanding could not be reached as to the treatment of wrecked seamen. Admiral Rodgers was to accompany with as many vessels as he could, in order that the embassy might be as imposing as possible. The expedition, on arriving, was boarded by Corean officials, who said they came from the king to learn its object. Mr. Low and the admiral are said to have decided that, no matter what these people stated, they must show credentials, or no communication could be had with them. This, be it remembered, although Commander Shufeldt had been glad to persuade a peasant of the country to convey a letter from him to the court. The country will look with some interest to see if Mr. Low is so good a specimen as that comes to of the kind of diplomatic agents that we send out under Senator Morton's perfect system, and also to see if the admiral's gallantry, and his sense of the impudence of the Coreans, did not keep his discretion in abeyance, and, together with the minister's want of skill and tact, get us into an unnecessary hobble. We hope the Secretary will be asked for the despatches as soon as Congress meets, if we do not get them before. Very soon after this, on the 1st of last June, came the firing on the surveying boats, and our return fire, which, it is now understood, killed some thirty Coreans.

The Rear-Admiral, however, thought that the insult to the flag was by no means wiped out, and after waiting nine days for an apology, on the morning of the tenth he landed an expedition for the purpose of chastising the natives. The land forces consisted of about 650 men, and they were accompanied on the water by the Monocacy, the Palos—which got aground and did no good—and three steam launches. Apparently, everything was planned excellently. On the 10th, five forts were taken, the squadron shelling vigorously, and the Coreans, it seems, retiring easily, and the marines occupying the forts and dismantling them as the enemy retired. This was a day of very hard work rather than hard fighting. On the 11th, the citadel was shelled from the river for an hour, and replied very briskly, but not at all effectively, its powder being wretched and its ordnance too light. Rifle-firing was also sharp between the marines and the defenders of the port, but casualties on the side of the assailants were few, and for the reason just given. Good powder and ordnance more modern would have made the citadel impregnable, such were its advantages of position and the courage of its garrison. At eleven o'clock it was carried by storm after a sharp contest of twenty minutes. The Coreans are described as fighting with determination, and they must at all events have stood up with fortitude, for 243 dead bodies were counted about the citadel, and if it is true that the garrison was not much more than a hundred, hardly a man in it could have escaped without death or wounds. The number seems incredible; but we do not see it stated that the 5,000 Coreans who operated in the open country were engaged at this point, if at all. Indeed, one account says that no one in the citadel escaped death or capture. The American loss was three killed and six wounded. The forts being destroyed and the guns—481 in all the forts—rendered useless, the vessels were ordered down the river. On the ground that the Coreans construe the withdrawal of the squadron as a confession of failure, the admiral is blamed. But it seems plain enough that the blame, if there is any, came earlier. Negotiation could hardly have been hoped for when the Corean authorities, despite the "coercing" they had just had, told the admiral, who asked them what he should do with his prisoners, that he might do what he liked with them. And for a war with Corea his force was evidently too small.

That very momentous question for France and her Assembly, "Shall the powers bestowed upon M. Thiers be both extended and prolonged so as to constitute him a regular President of the Republic for three years?"—a question closely allied with that perhaps more important one, "Has the National Assembly the right to prolong its own existence and frame a constitution for the country, or have its powers virtually expired with the double pacification it has achieved?"—is slowly approaching a solution, too slowly for the French mind, so impatient of uncertainties and suspended decisions. The committee to which M. Rivet's motion for the prolongation was referred by the Assembly has reached a vote on the subject, which is reported to be nine against to six for the motion, a decision in harmony with the views on the subject of its president, Benoist d'Azy; yet it has chosen for its reporter M. St.-Marc-Girardin, who decidedly favors the proposition, which, in the Assembly, is expected to be passed by a considerable majority, though with some modifications, and after a strenuous opposition on the part of both extreme wings. The deputies of the Left, among whom Gambetta—now a teacher of moderate and prudent statesmanship—has risen to foremost prominence, are reported to be preparing a manifesto demanding the restoration of the constitution of 1848. This restoration the Government of the 4th of September would, perhaps, have done very wisely to decree immediately on its installation, thus securing a kind of legitimate continuity to the Republic founded on universal suffrage, and merely suspended by the usurpations of Louis Napoleon; to decree it now, after so many breaks in that continuity on the part of the people, and after the revival by the late events in Paris of the most terrible memories of 1848, is much more than the Assembly can be persuaded to do—if not compelled by a new revolution. And even a new revolution is more likely to drive the now ruling majority into civil war than into submission to radical dictation.

The Assembly has, in the meanwhile, re-elected M. Grévy its president, and rejected a proposition to draw up a constitution. What was the complexion of the votes in these instances is not stated, nor easily to be guessed. The introduction of a bill providing for the dissolution of the Assembly is announced for one of these days—which can hardly emanate from any other quarter than the Extreme Left. M. Thiers's salary is proposed by the Budget Committee to be fixed at $100,000, with an additional credit for ordinary and extraordinary expenses. Whether this is meant for the "President of the Council, Chief of the Executive Power," which he now is, or for the contemplated "President of the Republic" for three years, we are not told. The Army Bill, which makes military service obligatory for every Frenchman between the ages of twenty and forty, prohibits substitutions, precludes the soldiers in the ranks from voting in political elections, and dissolves all armed organizations—including the National Guards—outside of the army and its reserves, has been favorably reported back to the Assembly by the proper committee. The army as it is finds unfortunately but too much employment in Algeria, whither reinforcements must constantly be sent. On its activity in the disastrous twelvemonth closed a few weeks ago, Generals Faidherbe, Chanzy, and MacMahon are publishing or preparing more or less official narratives, said to be of considerable interest. To judge by the little we have read about these recitals, MacMahon writes like a soldier, Chanzy like a patriot, and Faidherbe like a demagogue. Dreams of a speedy war for revenge are evidently haunting the minds of many a French general, but even Faidherbe's patron, Gambetta, is said to declare an enterprise of this kind sheer madness as long as no great ally is found. This ally the "patriotic" press already believes it sees in the Czar, who frightens Bismarck into negotiations with Beust.

The Versailles trials are progressing slowly. The "Government Commissary's" introductory exposé is lucid and rich in historically interesting dates, of which the following refer to the second period of the movements: The 4th of September, 1870, satisfied neither the members of the Internationale nor the revolutionists proper. They waited in concert, for a propitious moment to grasp power, in the meanwhile clamoring for "the Commune" and a general sortie, denouncing defeat as treason, and conspiring for attack. On October 31, they first threw their armed masses upon the Hôtel de Ville. January 22, 1871, they made their second fruitless attempt. After the capitulation of Paris, which disarmed the military, and paralyzed the Government and its friends, they perfected the organization of their forces, begun long before. February 15, a meeting of delegates of the National Guard took place at the Tivoli-Vauxhall, and appointed a commission to elaborate the provisional statutes of a central committee. February 24, the statutes were provisionally voted by the delegates, the Central Committee constituted, and resistance to any attempt at disarmament, as well as to the entry of the Germans, announced by resolution, "the National Guard recognizing no other chiefs but those of its own choice." February 27, under the pretext of saving a number of pieces of artillery from the Germans, the Nationals carried the cannon upon the heights of Montmartre, and placed them in position. February 28, the Central Committee invited the Guard not to oppose the entry of the Germans; it remained in permanence for two nights. March 4, it announced its "mission to constitute the Republican Federation of the National Guard." A few days later, a fusion of the Central Committee with the International Federation, which held its sittings in the Rue de la Corderie, took place. March 8, the Central Committee, at the Vauxhall, definitively adopted the statutes of its organization. March 11, an assembly of chiefs of battalions, at the Salle de la Redoute, adopted a resolution of resistance to any attempt at subverting the Republic or disarming the Guard. March 15, the Central Committee rendered account of its doings to the Republican Federation of the National Guard; it had then concentrated all power in its hands. March 18, the feeble attempt of the Versailles Government to seize the cannon miscarrying, the insurrection became a revolution. March 22, a counter-revolutionary demonstration was stifled in blood at the Place Vendôme. March 26, Communal elections were held at the decree of the Central Committee. March 28, the Commune of Paris was solemnly installed at the Hôtel de Ville, the Central Committee, composed chiefly of Internationals, apparently abdicating, but in fact continuing to direct the whole movement.

Last week we alluded to the speculations, "mostly of a very vague and idle character," indulged in by the press in connection with the reported meeting of the Emperors William and Francis Joseph, and their advisers, at Gastein. There being no further announcement made by the Associated Press for a number of days, the conjectures about the avowed objects and ulterior aims of the Imperial conference found a collective and, under the circumstances, rather legitimate expression in something like the following questions: Are the French right in presuming the meeting to be provoked by Russia's secretly arming in their favor? Are the scandalous proceedings of the Roumanian Chambers in the Strousberg Railroad affair, and the consequently more than ever shaken position of Prince Charles of Hohenzollern, the cause of Bismarck's friendly relations with Beust? Has Turkey really shown any inclination, as is asserted, to make common cause with Russia in solving that and other questions on the Lower Danube, and is, therefore, the Eastern question to be the main topic of the conversations between Kaiser William and Francis Joseph? Or has the German Chancellor concocted a plan against the Ultramontanes, which is to be concerted with his Austrian rival, who happens to be a Protestant? Or is only a general entente cordiale, without any special aims, to be effected between the two empires, which in their diplomatic communications, in December last, already made the necessary advances towards an oblivion of the past? Before incurring the obligation, however, of declining to answer all or any of these questions, we are surprised at the end of the week by the Cable announcement that the two Emperors have not met at Gastein at all, and that their meeting there or anywhere else is indefinitely postponed, which relieves us and our contemporaries from the necessity of further conjecturing—at least for a time. We do not say that some of these questions we are not going to hear more about. But the Khedive we feel impelled to entreat everybody to dismiss from his mind till the complete setting in of cool weather.

THE SYNDICATE.

The course heretofore pursued by the Treasury Department in its communications with the public on the subject of the new loan, as it is called, has been such as to cause universal distrust in the latest phase of these negotiations, the reported Syndicate. It is not often that the government of a respectable power is made ridiculous and contemptible in the eyes of the financial world by semi-official misrepresentation and prevarication on matters of such grave importance and such public notoriety as the placing of a national loan. But if it were possible for Mr. Boutwell to destroy entirely all faith in the credit of the United States, he would certainly have accomplished it by the countenance he has lent to the announcements, put forth in a semi-official form, half-a-dozen times during the last twelvemonth, that "the negotiations were at last completed, that the entire amount of five per cent. bonds had been subscribed for, that the funding was a success, that the loan was closed," and so forth. At one time it was the Rothschilds, at another time a combination of Frankfort bankers, and then a St. Petersburg firm, that had subscribed for a large amount. And again, a combination of English houses, and once or twice Mr. Treasurer Spinner, and again Mr. Assistant-Secretary Richardson, had succeeded in disposing of the whole. In defending Mr. Boutwell from the charge of endorsing these wilful misstatements, it is not sufficient to assert that they were not officially made by him. It was his duty, instead of quietly countenancing them as far as he could, without technical commitment, promptly to deny them, knowing, as he should have known, that nothing could be so injurious to the success of the loan as a doubt of the strict veracity of the Treasury officials. But Mr. Boutwell quietly permitted the repeated deception, until he awoke one fine morning to find that his great funding loan had been hawked abroad all over the world, like an invoice of tarnished plated ware, until no one could be induced even to look at it.

About a month ago a fresh announcement took the community by surprise: the entire balance of the loan had been placed abroad. Again, all the information received from the Treasury, though strictly non-committal, was in every way confirmatory of the report. It is even asserted that positive orders were given to discontinue the advertising of the loan in this country. But it is now quite certain that the loan was not then placed, and the negotiations appear to have made no further progress, at least were not again heard of until a few days since, when it was pompously announced that a "Syndicate" of foreign and Anglo-American banking-houses had absolutely purchased the balance. This time there was no wavering at the Treasury. The fact was boldly announced, under Mr. Boutwell's own signature, that the loan was withdrawn from the market. The names of many of the leading foreign banking-houses in London and this city were quietly noised abroad as parties to the scheme, and this time even the most incredulous were congratulating themselves that this tedious topic was finally removed from the daily despatches. But they were mistaken. First, it appeared that the "Syndicate" had only taken thirty millions unconditionally out of the $130,000,000 yet unsold. Then it appeared that some of the houses named as parties to the loan declined the honor, and rather repudiated the Syndicate than otherwise. Then it leaked out that only $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 were really taken, that the Syndicate was chiefly a figure of speech, and that perhaps the loan might still be partly for sale; and all that even now seems definite is that Jay Cooke & Co., and Fisk & Hatch of this city, together with one or two substantial, influential, and highly respectable, though not absolutely first-class London houses, have agreed to take $25,000,000 of the $130,000,000 yet to be placed, on condition that they shall have the refusal of the balance for a certain length of time, and on certain terms not as yet given to the public. This, as far as can be ascertained, is the sum-total of fact in the midst of this long account of disgraceful mystification.

It is no wonder that the public looks upon the "Syndicate" with a mixture of distrust and contempt. But neither the distrust nor the contempt is altogether justifiable. Although among the officially published foreign names there is not one that ranks as of the first class in the great world of finance, although the operations in this market are surrounded with the fuss and puffery that our modern flashy financiers think essential to success, although the list of names published here had to be eked out with those of firms who give the whole a rather poverty-stricken air, it should not be forgotten that the negotiation is now at least in the hands of business men, who will devote the experience, the energy, the influence, which made former loans successful in their hands to accomplish similar results in the present case. And indeed there seem to be no valid reasons why the negotiation should not prove a complete success, provided the published statements are truthful and correct.

One reason, in justice to Mr. Boutwell it should be remembered, why all previous attempts at funding failed, was the ridiculous and absurd provision of Congress that the Secretary should not be allowed to call in the outstanding six per cents until they stood at par in gold in the markets of the world. Now, it only needs half the knowledge of an ordinary business man to see that that provision was practically suicidal. Owners and holders of the bonds did not want to see them called in or paid off. What they wanted was to continue drawing the six per cent. interest, which they could not get with equal security from any other class of investments whatever. As soon as the bonds went to par, they were immediately subject to being called in. Everybody knew that they could not, therefore, go over par, while there was, of course, a possibility that they might go below par. Nobody, therefore, cared to buy them at par, and the holders were more anxious than anybody else that they might remain below par. The law thus left Mr. Boutwell in this position: He could not call in bonds until they went to par, and his readiness to call them in was the very thing that prevented them from going to par or above. At the same time, he could sell his new five per cent. bonds only at par; but, of course, as long as equally good six per cents were obtainable at par, no one would buy five per cents at the same price. A more ingenious contrivance for practising the laudable art of "how not to do it" was never invented in Congress or in Downing Street. If Mr. Boutwell had been half as much of an intelligent business man as he is an ingenious political wire-puller, he would have seen at a glance that under such circumstances all his efforts at funding must prove failures, and that each successive announcement of his immediate or early or actually completed success only covered him with deeper ridicule in the eyes of those who correctly appreciated his situation.

If ever there was a case in which a public officer was by law made practically dependent upon private effort, that case was Mr. Boutwell's. For the success of his funding measures, it was absolutely necessary that some one should run the risk of contracting for a large amount of the new five per cents, and take the chances of the effect upon other holders of calling in a similar amount of six per cents. If the simultaneous calling in of, say, 100 millions of six per cents had the effect of inducing the holders of other hundreds of millions of six per cents to prefer exchanging the latter for the new five per cents, which could not be called in, the negotiation was a success. If it did not have that effect, the negotiation was a failure, and the parties originally contracting for the new five per cents incurred a loss. Now, the risk of loss in that case was one which a "Syndicate" of four or five first-class European banking-houses would have settled within an hour, but that risk of loss was, nevertheless, the key to the whole situation. Mr. Boutwell, with a marvellous fatuity, adopted the very plan by which intelligent action was rendered absolutely impossible. He appointed everybody as agents of the loan, and, as "everybody" is not in a position to incur a loss of a few millions of dollars, and as those who can afford to risk such sums do not care to do it for "everybody's" benefit, the result was a stupendous failure. A few firms who sought to curry favor, a few national banks who dread the Secretary's frown or bask in his smiles, and some few individuals who believed that the credit of the United States would overcome all difficulties, did convert their six per cents into five per cents, and there the whole business has rested until the recent effort now under discussion.

No unprejudiced financial authority is at this time prepared to deny that the credit of the United States, under competent Treasury management, would be fully equal to borrowing a very large sum, say 1,000 millions of dollars, at five per cent. interest, or even less, provided that sum be devoted to cancelling the existing six per cent. bonds. But to do this at any time requires that the national finances should be managed with the most scrupulous simplicity, straightforwardness, and truth, so that the great moneyed houses and families of the world (who, the common belief to the contrary notwithstanding, owe their success almost without exception to their perfect good faith) can co-operate with the Government in such a negotiation. At the present moment, it requires this co-operation more emphatically than ever, owing to the limitations placed upon the Secretary by foolish laws. If the co-operation which the present Syndicate offers to the Treasury is not as powerful as we should desire in order to feel perfectly certain of success, the want of that power, the absence of the really great houses, is chiefly due to the unwise course pursued throughout by the Secretary himself. But it is, nevertheless, true that the existence of the present combination is the first evidence we have had that the Secretary begins to realize the true nature of his situation, that the management of the affair is at last in the hands of men of great ability and considerable influence, and that the condition of the European money market warrants the hope and the belief that the negotiation will be successful. Success in the present effort, if genuine, means a speedy refunding of the entire amount of outstanding six per cents, and a very desirable saving of at least ten millions in the annual interest. We can see no serious reason for doubting that the success will be measurably prompt and sufficiently complete to compensate for previous failures.

"WHAT ARE YOU GOING TO DO ABOUT IT?"

This, after all said and done, is the one municipal question of the hour, and the impudent autocrat of our municipality, who puts it to us instinctively, knows that it is not easy of solution. Of course, prominent in Tweed's mind is the fact that for almost two years to come the quadrilateral have secured themselves against a mild storm of popular indignation, and he doubtless thinks that in a few months the first force of all the hue-and-cry now made against them will have blown over. Whether he is right or wrong in this will depend almost entirely upon the strength of the moral element in our community. Thieves are apt to underrate the general moral sentiment of others; and we will hope that they do so in this case, though, as we have had occasion to say before, we are not so sanguine in this particular case as we could wish to be. Where is the strength of moral sense, for instance, which is going to mass, in solid and hearty opposition to Tweed and Sweeny, Mr. B. F. Manierre, Mr. Reuben Fenton, Mr. Roscoe Conkling, Mr. Thomas Murphy, Mr. Henry Smith, Mr. Marshall O. Roberts, Mr. Horace Greeley, Mr. Jackson S. Schultz, Mr. John V. Gridley, the Times, the Evening Post, and the Tribune? It would require a good deal more than is always in heated party conflitcs available for use in politics. It would require so much more than anybody expects to find, that people would listen as to thunder out of a winter sky, or to voices out of the earth, or to the sound of a general resurrection of the dead, if they were some morning to hear it said that Mr. Fenton, Mr. Conkling, Mr. Greeley, and Mr. Schultz, and Mr. Murphy had announced that they united to take the one way to give this State this fall a Republican government, and to make it a sure reliance for the Republican party, which they believe to be the party of honest government in city, State, and county at large—this one way being the easy way of sacrificing selfish motives, and of themselves honestly working for an un-Fentonized, un-Conklingized, un-Greeleyized, un-Murphyized Republican State convention, and an honest Republican legislature. We say nothing about the moral sense and character of any of the persons named above further than this—and that may be much or little; we think it much rather than little—that it is their differences, more or less personal in origin, which have been and are fatal to the well-being of the party in the State, and which bid fair to continue so in the future; fatal not only to its success, but so injurious to its character that to call the Republican party as it reveals itself when it gets to Albany the party of purity, would expose one, as an innocent, to the contempt of most of the Republicans as well as of most of the Democrats one met at the capital. Tweed himself says that he has not often been called a fool, and it is rather more likely, as he recalls certain pecuniary transactions at Albany, that it is not so much upon any legal or legislative difficulties in the way of our getting rid of him that he relies when he asks us what we are going to do about it, as it is upon his knowledge of his own moral character and how near it is to the political-moral character of the tools with which the honest community tries to work.

But below all this we come face to face with a problem which is of vital importance, and must now be solved, otherwise even success in driving from power the whole set of blackguards who plunder us will be of no lasting avail, and the work of reform will have to be done over again in each decade. The secret of the failure of the Citizens' Association is not so much the character of Mr. Nathaniel Sands, because, even if a man of the highest character had been at the head of that organization, it would have failed by reason of the absence of some guiding principle to it. The gentlemen who were the executive committee of that association would listen to nothing in the way of an organic reform, but were simply determined to "get better men in office." There was a time when a De Witt Clinton was our Mayor, and now a—Hall. Why this change? they demanded, and they asked as if the answer was a simple one relating to nominations, or "good men going to the polls." But the fact is, they had not in the least comprehended the problem. For one thing, since De Witt Clinton's time all the conditions of existence have changed. The New York merchant who waited two or three weeks for the arrival of the European packet to announce to him the state of the markets on the other side, could devote an amount of time to politics which is utterly impossible to that merchant's son, to whom the tick of the Atlantic Cable instrument is as familiar as that of his pulse, and who will go to the wall unless his mind is occupied from morning until night with the tidings it carries. Now, it is sheer nonsense to say to such a man, "Take an interest in politics, attend primaries, find men to accept office, canvass your acquaintanceship, discover who is fit for a public post, and who, at the same time, will accept small pay for much responsibility," and then watch carefully that the person whom you have aided in electing will attend to his duties. Under the pressure of some great public misfortune, one so great that it affects the welfare of almost every member of the body politic, men will leave vocations upon which depends their success in life, and become volunteer politicians, precisely as the flaneur of the "American Heaven" was converted by the Prussian rapping at the door into something of a soldier. Such efforts are necessarily spasmodic, and cannot be relied upon when constant action is required.

In addition to the difficulty which the extreme division of employments creates to political activity on the part of the so-called better-class men, we have in our city an ever-present bar to absolute good government in the shape of the ignorant Irish voting element. Granted that our well-meaning and intelligent citizens outnumber the blind who are led by the wicked, yet the wicked and the blind are with us in such numbers that the slightest flagging of political interest on the part of the well-meaning will give to the sinister interests once more the upper hand. And it is just this fever-heat of political interest which we cannot expect from our overworked merchants, bankers, and tradesmen.

The first determination of the friends of reform will probably be to make some such changes in the city charter, or give us such a new charter as will make our principal municipal officers more directly responsible and more easily pnnishable, at the same time diminishing the facilities for committing and concealing frauds. But we trust it may be well considered by the wisest heads among us whether there is not danger that this will be, in a measure, to make once more the mistake the Citizens' Association made, though not in its most egregious form, and to give us a superficial remedy the effects of which will be neither great nor durable. We, ourselves, have our doubts, considering the character of our city constituency, if the only way to prevent the present wholesome indignation from frittering itself away in imitation of the Citizens' Association's performances, is not to secure through the legislature of our State a charter for our city which shall secure to all minorities of upwards, say, of 10,000 voters one voice in the legislative department of the city. This legislative department should appoint the executive heads of the departments, which should be amenable to this legislature, and removable by it. Thus our good citizens can always secure a success commensurate with their endeavors, and if we cannot absolutely outweigh and outcount the Irish vote, we can neutralize it. Exposure would follow villany step upon step; neither secret accounts nor "extortionate" bills could pass a body thus composed. Under our present system, a minority can only acquire power by means of a demoralizing and corrupt bargain with the majority—a bargain like that of the Tammany Republicans. By this plan the minority would hold power independently of the majority; and even if the majority of our law-makers should then as now prove corrupt, so long as the minority remain pure and independent the majority could be held in check. We have frequently shown in these columns that a system dependent upon the heroic virtues will not succeed. Political economy teaches us that the satisfaction must be proportionate to the effort, and all our diatribes against the indifferentism of the citizen will fall on dull ears unless we show him some way by virtue of which his efforts will yield him some permanent relief.

SOME RECENT PROCEEDINGS IN DUXBURY.

THE sensation of awaking to one's natural condition after a temporary change of habit is apt to produce in the mind of the performer a conviction that he has rather made a fool of himself. The patient beguiled into the public consumption of laughing-gas, for instance, generally descends from the platform in a painful state; orators at dinners are, when intelligent, sad men at heart; the amateur ventriloquist at private parties must often confer solemnly with himself after he has got home. But to this complexion the public performer is very likely to come at last, and it is the cheerful duty of his friends to recount his antics. Communities occasionally experience the same sensations; having been unduly excited and elated, they return to common life with a sheepish assurance that they have overdone the thing. As the lights are put out, and the plaudits die away, the last of the audience make haste to forget their enthusiasm.

Some such process has just been finished in a certain county in an adjacent State, sacred to the Pilgrims. Without provocation, many worthy gentlemen, and some other gentlemen, have held a public meeting, have made speeches and applauded them, and are now sadly enquiring if there was any reason for the performance. The nominal cause was the dedication of a monument to Miles Standish at Duxbury, but the cool observer will be as slow to perceive the reason for such a memorial as he will be ten years hence to find the monument.

We should be sorry to say that Duxbury, having lost its former place as a fishing village, was ambitious of entering on a new life as a watering place; that, having no monuments, it had to create them; and, having no local hero worth mention, was obliged to evolve one from fancy. We should be sorry to say these things, but they might be true even if unsaid.

Miles Standish, in truth, appears to have been a sturdy soldier of fortune, who bore a very modest share in the colonizing of Plymouth. The importance of that settlement is often overrated, but certainly, whatever place the settlement may claim in a political view, the military deeds of its Captain Standish were not remarkable. He was, indeed, one of the earliest soldiers who fought with the Indians, but the history of New England is full of the names of more distinguished warriors. Every generation has had its heroes, and, judging solely from their achievements, every generation since the first has excelled its prototype.

The celebration, however, was decided upon, and it was held with due formalities. The orator of the day had little to say about Standish, for history was silent. It was noted, however, that Miles Standish was spelt "Myles"—and it might have been added that Winthrop was spelt Wynthrop, and Bradford was spelt Bradforth; curious items, but of no especial value to the unregenerate mind. The orator, however, mentioned many things to which the aforesaid Standish might have been compared, had he only known what the first term was. He was like "Cavalry Sheridan" chiefly because he was a foot-soldier, and he was the exponent of every noble idea because he had left no record of his own.

After this oration, which, although not bad, in a way, was apparently best as a specimen of making bricks without straw, General Benjamin Franklin Butler explained in many ways that Standish was very much like President Grant, and especially pointed out that, as one was re-elected, the other should be. We suggest to the General that this is an argument as good for the representation of the Essex district as any other. He never thought of that. And then Doctor George B. Loring got his innings, and discovered that Standish was a fine old New England farmer, of all things in the world, "one of the earliest of all those men who, after availing themselves of the sandy store-houses of the Indians, and seizing whatever they had, turned their attention to the cultivation of the soil." Did the Doctor think sadly of that model farmer before him who had seized a store-house in a neighboring county, and has been cultivating the district with such success?

Then Mr. Justin Winsor proceeded to demonstrate, we must say it, in twenty-seven verses, that him the gods had not made poetical; and then Rev. E. E. Hale, who is always bright, gently ridiculed the Mayflower, and said his ancestors were not immigrants by that vessel; and, finally, and here dawning sanity begins to appear, Dr. Nathaniel Shurtleff, of Boston, wrung the hearts of all the Old Colony by unkindly exploding the twin falsehoods—dear to the Old Colonist as the Twin Brethren to the dwellers by proud Eurotas—that John Howland did not marry Governor Carver's daughter, and that John Alden's bride did not ride home like Europa, for there was not a bull in the whole colony for three years after the marriage.

So the show closed, and the anxious enquirer must needs wonder at the pother. The monument is yet to be built. The site, to be sure, has been secured; but, then, five acres of Cape Cod land can hardly be considered a princely endowment. The long and short of the matter is that the hero is undeserving of the rank sought to be given him, good fighter and sturdy colonist though he was. The celebration was an absurdity; the energy was all misplaced; the emotion could not but be forced—except, indeed, when General Butler praised the Puritan virtues, and Dr. Loring's heart melted within him when he thought of Myles as a farmer.

One claim to distinction which Standish really had was cruelly overlooked by all the speakers. He was the great original "fortune hunter." As his will shows, he was the first of the noble army of dupes who have believed themselves heirs to English fortunes. He solemnly bequeathed to his son the land of which his great-grandfather was deprived. We propose, therefore, that when the monument is to be dedicated, the heirs of the Jennings estate, the Towneley heirs, the Ingraham heirs, the Holt heirs, the Smith heirs, the Burnham heirs, the heirs of the innumerable other wealthy Englishmen of this class, shall assemble and meet together in force in Duxbury, to mark their admiration of Standish the claimant. Then we shall have a celebration, and a reason for it; as it is, Duxbury must try again before becoming a vast watering-place.

THE CENTRALIZATION OF M. THIERS—GAMBETTA.

PARIS, August, 1871.

IT is sometimes easier to illustrate the condition of a country by some small fact than by long dissertations and disquisitions. The House at Versailles has been occupied for three weeks in passing a law on what are called the General Councils. The councils are departmental boards elected by universal suffrage, who have to decide upon all the interests of the department, roads, asylums, schools, buildings, etc. Their authority has always been almost nominal, as the préfet, who represents the central power, only consulted them, and was not bound by their decision. They had a session of only eight days in a year. The new law has been framed in a more liberal spirit; it allows the board to name a permanent committee, which will have some executive powers. M. Thiers, who is very despotic, and what we call a centralizator, is very adverse to the new law. He wished the préfet, who is the obedient tool of the Government, to be ex officio the president of the executive committee. The Chamber rejected this plan, and wished to allow the committee to choose its own president. Thereupon M. Thiers threatened to resign; it was impossible for him to govern a country where a few country gentlemen, merchants, and farmers could meet and name their own president, though this committee had no political functions whatever, and was only occupied with the material interests of a small district.

France is still the country where Louis XIV. could say, L'état c'est moi. Only the head of the state has changed its name. After the king it became Robespierre, then Napoleon; a year ago its name was Gambetta; to-day it is Thiers. It is impossible for anybody who has not lived in France to understand the full force of this word "préfet." The prefect is always some politician coming from Paris to a district where he knows nobody (he is on principle never sent to his own department, as he might then favor the interests of his family and friends, at the expense of the interests of that jealous monster called the state). He lives in a palace; the large army of officials is at his command; he really cares for nothing except the elections; he will be considered by the Government as a good préfet if the elections are favorable to the Government; as a bad préfet if they are not. He therefore directs all his energies, all his power, which is immense, all his activity, in one direction; whoever can serve him as an electoral agent is his friend; his patronage is larger than can be imagined. He decides upon the roads, the public works, the financial arrangements of the department; he is a little king.

Now, the king will have before him a little parliament; but it seemed to M. Thiers that the whole fabric of the state would be subverted if this parliament was allowed to choose its own president. After many struggles, many discussions and speeches, it was finally agreed that the committee should not choose the president, but that the eldest member should be president by right. We could no longer rest quietly in our beds, it seems, if the councils were to choose the ablest man, the best administrator, the most experienced and honest gentleman of the district; but all will be safe if we have the baldest, deafest, and most dilapidated councillor at the head of the council. Such, at least, is the final advice of M. Thiers; he believes in old age, being himself over eighty. Is there not something supremely ludicrous in this sort of legislation, and in such a scheme of decentralization? The Central Government is so strong in France that it would be advisable, in my opinion, to unite the departments by groups (as each department is too small to become a political unit of any importance), and to give to each of these reconstituted provinces some sort of local government, with an elected governor and a parliament. But anybody who dared to defend publicly such a plan would be condemned as a partisan of the ancien régime. The name of province seems an insult to the principles of '89 and the great Revolution, and we are, after all, governed only by words, not by ideas. The Chamber has taken a step, a timid step, in the right direction, and M. Thiers is doing all he can to counteract the liberal ideas of the majority, with the applause of a pseudo-republican party. Whoever has seen a real republic must see that our French Republicans do not know what a republic means. Only a few weeks ago, Louis Blanc, Edgar Quinet, and their friends proposed a law which practically gave to the votes of the cities a privilege over the votes of the country. The partisans of the majority are branded with the name of rurals. All the intellect of the country is supposed to be crystallized in the great towns; Paris, the Paris of the Commune, is the brain of France, and all France ought to obey it, as the limbs follow the dictation of the nervous centres.

The country people may be sluggish, backward, but it is the fault of a central government, and the central government has always been more or less Parisian; but they are hard-working, orderly, law-abiding, while the population in almost all the great cities is impatient, unruly, revolutionary, warlike. It must seem evident to a mind which takes a survey of the whole land that the only government fit for such a country in its present state is a sort of compromise between the conservative instincts of the rural population and the aspirations of the townspeople, and this compromise would be found in a constitutional monarchy, with such institutions as have made little Belgium so free and prosperous. We have all the elements for such a solution—an immense and wealthy middle-class, a national, honest, and patriotic dynasty; but at the very time when it could easily have been adopted, when the vast majority desired it, M. Thiers, in an evil hour, threw all the weight of his influence in another direction. He made himself republican when the country called for monarchy; and there is so little organization in the parties and in the press, that the country, bewildered and astonished as it was, could find no way to redress the policy of the new leader. We live under a new personal government, and, when we reflect that the consul of the day is the oldest statesman of Europe, we may well be uneasy for the future. Gambetta, owing to the moral confusion which has been created by the defection of M. Thiers, has re-entered the House. He is said to be forming for himself a party in the army; he will flatter the noblest and vilest passions of the nation, and make a Republican war-party, which has a chance of coming into power if the Conservative party loses all cohesion. A few weeks ago, he went to Spain to escape his own unpopularity; now many people begin to look upon him as the possible successor of M. Thiers. Time will soon throw its veil over the disasters of the last campaign. Gambetta will appear before the proud and wounded nation like the personification of vengeance; he will promise a revanche to the young men, to the officers, to the army; he will make, if he succeed, a military republic, more dynastic and centralized than any government of the past; and he may lead France to certain and more terrible disasters. You may be persuaded that Gambetta intends to ally the cause of the Republic with the idea of war; and in so doing, he is almost sure to enlist sympathy in a short time from many quarters. It is useless to show the dangers of such a policy. These dangers might have been averted; they may still be averted if the country is allowed to unite under a Liberal government, under a dynasty which would take good care of the honor of France, without throwing the country into new adventures and compromising the most sacred interests for the sake of personal ambition. But as long as the country awaits its fate from the hands of M. Thiers, and is not able to decide for itself, we shall be condemned to live in a sort of moral anarchy, without any definite hope, without any fixed policy, at the mercy of an accident, of a surprise—the slaves of fate.

Correspondence.

THE SOUTH AND WEST DESPONDENT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The Nation, in its issue of the 10th inst., speaking of the trade of the country, says: "The Southern Atlantic States and the Far West are alike despondent." Doubtless, for how can it be otherwise? The great staples of the West are as low in price to-day as in 1860. Flour (superfine) has been quoted within a week, in this city, at $4 45 to $4 95 per barrel. Other products of the farmer are equally depressed in price, while his expenses for labor, for machines, and other implements of production—for all articles required for the use of himself and family, together with his taxes—are enhanced some fifty to seventy-five per cent. What the farmer of the West sells brings him only the lowest gold prices of former days; while all he purchases for consumption costs him the currency prices of the present day, and the difference he loses. His case is indeed a hard one, and he may well despond. This is not only true now, but there is no reasonable prospect of any improvement in his condition. The surplus of his products must be exported, and of course must be sold at their gold value for shipment abroad. Whatever they are worth for that purpose determines the value of the whole crop, whether used at home or sent to a foreign market; and the general prices of agricultural products cannot rise permanently from what they now are, because the annual surplus must be constantly growing larger.

The planter of the South is no better off. The cost of producing his crop has immensely increased by the expanded currency prices he is compelled to pay for labor and for whatever he consumes in his family or upon his plantation, while his cotton does not bring him corresponding prices; and what is more disheartening still is the fact that, low as prices now are, they are certain to be still lower when, instead of three millions of bales, as now, the crop is increased, as it is sure to be ere long, to five millions.

Such being the situation, it is obvious there can be but one remedy, and that is, that the farmer of the West and the planter of the South must be enabled to buy and sell by the same standard of value. That can be accomplished only by the restoration of the currency to par with gold, and that can be brought about only by such a contraction as shall restore it to its natural volume. Then, and not till then, will the currency be equal in value to gold, and all American and foreign products be measured correctly by it. Then, and not till then, will those who produce exportable commodities have a fair chance to conduct their operations to advantage. Every class of producers will thus stand on the same level, and the entire trade of the country be brought to a sound condition. A. W.

AN OLD-TIME ENGLISHMAN AT COURT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your quotation, in No. 317 of your paper, from Mr. Kingsley's "At Last," in which he speaks of the naval fight of Sir Richard Grenville against great odds, reminds me of two accounts of Sir Jerome Bowes, who also seems to have had a vein of sturdiness in his character. The first is from Pepys's Diary, under the date of September 4, 1662:

"And, among other discourse, some was of Sir Jerome Bowes, embassador from Queene Elizabeth to the Emperor of Russia, who, because some of the noblemen there would go upstairs to the Emperor before him, he would not go up till the Emperor had ordered those two men to be dragged down-stairs, with their heads knocking upon every stair till they were killed. And when he was come up, they demanded his sword of him before he entered the room. He told them if they would have his sword they should have his boots too; and so caused his boots to be pulled off, and his night-gown and night-cap and slippers sent for; and made the Emperor stay till he could go in his night-dress, since he might not go as a soldier. And lastly, when the Emperor, in contempt, to show his command of his subjects, did command one to leap from the window down, and broke his neck in the sight of our embassador, he replied that his mistress did set more by, and did make better use of, the necks of her subjects; but said that to show what her subjects would do for her, he would and did fling down his gauntlet before the Emperor, and challenged all the nobility there to take it up in defence of the Emperor against his Queene, for which, at this very day, the name of Sir Jerome Bowes is famous and honored there."

The other extract is from Dr. Collins's "Present State of Russia, in a Letter to a Friend at London; written by an Eminent Person residing at the Great Tsar's Court of Mosco for the space of Nine Years. London. 1671."

"This Juan Vasilowidg nailed a French ambassador's hat to his head. Sir Jerom Boze, a while after, came as ambassador, and put on his hat, and cocked it before him; at which he sternly demanded how he durst do so, having heard how he chastised the French ambassador. Sir Jerom answered, he represented a cowardly King of France, but I am the ambassador of the invincible Queen of England, who does not veil her bonnet nor bare her head to any prince living; and if any of her ministers shall receive any affront abroad, she is able to revenge her own quarrel. Look you there (quoth Juan Vasilowidg to his boyars), there is a brave fellow, indeed, that dares do and say this much of his mistress; which whoreson of you all dare do so much for me, your master? This made them envy Sir Jerom, and persuade the Emperor to give him a wild horse to tame, which he did, managing him with such rigor that the horse grew so tired and tamed that he fell down dead under him. This being done, he asked his majesty if he had any more wild horses to tame. The Emperor afterwards much honored him, for he loved such a daring fellow as he was, and a mad blade to boot."

Sir Jerome seems to have had in him something of that "power of initiation" with which the Imperial Crown Prince of Germany is reported to have been struck during his present visit to England. They still hold it for a country where, on occasion, two and two shall make five.

T. P.

New York, August 20, 1871.

A NOTE FROM GENERAL GARFIELD.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The Nation of the 10th instant calls my attention, for the first time, to an unfortunate typographical error in an appendix to my oration on the life and character of General Thomas, by which Captain (now Lieut.-Colonel) A. G. Brackett is placed among those who became generals in the rebel army. I deeply regret this error, because it wrongs a worthy officer of our army who, as I learn, was three times breveted for gallantry during the war; and because I should be sorry to have the readers of the Nation suppose I had done my work so carelessly as this blunder might indicate.

In preparing the oration, I sent a copy of the roster of the 2d Cavalry for 1860 to the Adjutant-General at Washington, who, at my request, added the dates at which any of its officers resigned to go into the rebel service, and also marked the names of those who became rebel generals. That list was printed as Appendix A, but the proof-sheets were not sent to me. That the star affixed to Capt. Brackett's name was the printer's blunder may be seen from the fact that the roster professes to give the date of resignation of "those who went into the rebel service," and no date is placed opposite the name of Captain Brackett.

As I am not personally acquainted with Colonel B., I take this method of explaining the error.—Very respectfully yours,

James A. Garfield.

Notes.

Mr. Joel Munsell, of Albany, one of those fanatical publishers who deliberately choose a line of works whose sale is in inverse proportion to their merit, announces to his select audience the following enterprises: "The Indian Tribes of Hudson's River: their Origin, Manners, and Customs, Traditions, Tribal and Sub-tribal Organizations, Political Relations, Wars and Final Displacement," by E. M. Ruttenber, author of a history of Newburgh; "History of the Towns of Bristol and Bremen in the State of Maine, including the Ancient English Settlement of Pemaquid," by Prof. John Johnston; and "A Complete History of the Origin and Progress of the Flag of the United States of America," by Capt. George Henry Preble, U.S.N. The first two works will be published by subscription; the last may fairly count on a more popular reception.——"English Literature considered as a Key to English History," by Dr. Henry Coppée, is among the announcements of Messrs. Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger.—Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. have in press a number of novels, including "John Thompson, Blockhead," by Louisa Parr, author of "Dorothy Fox"; and "Seed-Time and Harvest; or, During my Apprenticeship," by Fritz Reuter; and they will also publish "The Teeth, and How to Save Them," by Dr. L. P. Meredith; and "The Prevention of Decay in Teeth," by Dr. Robert Arthur.—Messrs. Murphy & Co., Baltimore, have in press a "Popular Life of Gen. Robert E. Lee," by Emily V. Mason, and a "Life of Gen. Lee for Children"; also, to be published by subscription, "A Memoir of Roger Brooke Taney, LL.D." the late Chief-Justice, by Samuel Tyler, LL.D.——Messrs. Lee & Shepard's fall announcements embrace a large number of juvenile works and works of fiction—the best of the former being "Behind the Looking-glass, and What Alice saw There," by the author of "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland"; also the following: the fourth volume of the "Complete Works of Charles Sumner"; "History of the National Peace Jubilee," by P. S. Gilmore (to be published by subscription); "The Divine Man," by Dr. D. L. Townsend; "The Whaleman's Adventures in the Sandwich Islands and on the Pacific Coast," by W. H. Thomes; and a "Handbook of Railroad Construction," by Geo. L. Vose.——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton's fall list we have mainly announced already. It will include, also, "Pictures of Travel," in Sweden, among the Hartz Mountains, and in Switzerland, by Hans Christian Andersen; De Maistre's "A Journey around my Room;" "Little Folk-Songs," by Alexina B. White; "Life of the Rev. John McVickar, S.T.D." by W. A. McVickar, D.D.; and "Specimens of Macaronic Verse," by James Appleton Morgan.

—The Irish People, a weekly journal of literature, politics, and news, publishes in its last issue the following passage—whether as literature or politics is best known to itself. It is no news to some of us—while others of us will be good-natured enough to think it incredible—that much of the instruction which our Irish fellow-citizens get from their leaders is as wholesome and as conducive to good citizenship, or to anything but the ruin of a republican form of government, as this:

"Should the Orangemen ever parade in New York, let the citizens who feel aggrieved at the violation of our laws and institutions take whatever measures they choose into their hands to uphold the laws, if they care anything about their country. As for the Irish element, whose lives are aimed at by Orangemen, let them congregate on the tops of houses and at windows, provided with a few dozen of good hand-grenades, say a couple of hundred at different points, and all the State militia that ever gathered together will hasten homeward as fast as their feet can carry them. Remember that twenty thousand militia marching through New York streets are not equal to one hundred men situated as described. This to be had recourse to only in the event of the Orangemen being surrounded by police and military so deeply that they cannot be reached, as on last 12th of July. After that we shall have done with Orangeism in this city."

Another article in the same paper seeks to find a reason for its alleged fact that "the Irish are despised" in this country—"hated and despised by every class and national denomination of American citizens," and it asks why this should be so, while the German-Americans, the French-Americans, the Spanish, Norwegian, Dutch, Swedish, and Italian-Americans (some of whom are Catholic, others Protestant, in religion; some Democratic, others Republican in politics; some of our own blood, some of other races) are all alike held in respect and well liked. It finds a reason in the fact that Spain, Germany, France, Norway, and the rest are all, except Ireland, independent nations, while the Irish bear the yoke of the English. Taking the fact to be as alleged by the Irish People, the editor of that paper need not have gone as far as he did for an answer to his question. A better reason than any he will find outside of his own columns he may find in them. His head is a queer one if it lets him fancy that any community, with respect for law, and for liberty in law, and by means of law, and by no other means than law, can look with anything but anger on people who give and people who take the advice he has just been giving his readers.

—Here is a sentiment which we commend to the approval of the friends of a literature purely American as a contribution towards the object of their desire. It is from an address by the Hon. J. R. Chandler of Pennsylvania. "We say not that this is wrong," Mr. Chandler says; "men can have little enjoyment when they have an unstable political creed." Mr. Chandler's address, however, was not a bad one, and in several respects interesting. It was delivered before the National Congress on Penitentiary and Reformatory Discipline, and its subject was the question of a Prison Newspaper. Of all things in the way of reading matter, Mr. Chandler says, a newspaper full of news is what the convict in confinement most urgently solicits of his keeper, and is most thankful to his visitor for bringing him. And no wonder, shut in as he is by the strictest rules in the most monotonous routine, that he should crave the newspaper —the full record of the free and various life of outside liberty which is his longing, and which he can appreciate to the full even when the literature of the imagination fails to stimulate him. Yet what kind of a paper to give him, says Mr. Chandler, is a difficult question. He states that it is the general rule in our prisons to discountenance the common daily newspaper, for the reason that its legal reports of criminal cases and its statements as to crimes committed have a tendency to blunt delicacy and encourage indecency and crime. That is to say, it has been found necessary to exclude those weekly papers which devote themselves altogether to the doings of the police and the details of crime; and these contain little more than is to be found in most of the so-called well-conducted newspapers. The daily newspaper, of course, dilutes the mass of evil which it feels compelled to publish by a great many items of news of harmless import, and by political and other discussions. We are inclined, however, to think with Mr. Chandler that the dilution thus effected is not sufficient to make the average newspaper fit for our jails, so long as these are to be at all used as reformatory institutions. It is a pity to have to say so; but we fear it would not be saying the truth to say anything else; unless, indeed, one were to go further and say that very many of our papers habitually make no scruple of offering us matter unfitted for the reading of anybody in jail or out. The "religious press," also, Mr. Chandler condemns, as apt to be "irritating and offensive" to those who have no interest in the discussion of denominational differences in a purely partisan spirit; and the religious papers are not very apt, he thinks, to instruct the convict in those principles which lie at the foundation of all morals, and in which he needs instruction. A special paper of a kind not at present in existence is necessary, Mr. Chandler thinks, to supply the prisoner's need, and his idea of the right journal to be offered them seems to us essentially good. Let it be to some extent didactic; but let it have for a main feature a full and accurate, but in some degree expurgated, record of news, so that the convict may keep abreast as nearly as possible of the movement of the outside world; and that it may no longer be true, as our author says it is now, that "in point of fact Rip Van Winkles are emerging from our convict prisons every day of the year," and doubtless with a sense of isolation productive of crime as well as of suffering.

—Forthcoming theological works from the English press include, among others, "A Dictionary of Christian Antiquities and Biography, from the Times of the Apostles to the Age of Charlemagne," in two volumes, edited by Dr. Wm. Smith; "The Gallican Church: Sketches of Church History in France," by W. Henley Jervis; "St. Chrysostom, his Life and Times," by Rev. W. R. W. Stephens; the fourth volume of James C. Robertson's "History of the Christian Church"; "The Popes of Rome and the Popes of the Oriental Orthodox Church," by Rev. Cæsar Tondini; "Old Testament Synonyms, their Bearing on Christian Faith and Practice," by Rev. R. B. Girdleston; "Three Lectures on Buddhism," by Rev. Ernest J. Eitel; and an "Essay on Cathedrals," edited by J. S. Howson, D.D. With a new edition of Sir J. G. Wilkinson's "Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians," we are to have "Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians," by E. J. Lane; "Rude Stone Monuments in All Countries: their Age and Uses," by James Fergusson; and a popular edition of Darwin's "Origin of Species." Among works of travel: "Eastern Experiences," by Lewin B. Bowring, with maps and diagrams; "Western India before and during the Mutiny," by Gen. Sir G. Le Grand Jacob; "At Home with the Patagonians," by George C. Musters, R.N.; "A Boy's Voyage around the World," edited by Samuel Smiles. Mr. Smiles has a new work of his own in preparation, entitled "Character." We note besides on Mr. Murray's list: "Biographical Essays, contributed to the Quarterly Review," by Rev. Whitwell Elwin, the latest and best, though severest, biographer of Pope; "The Correspondence of the late Earl of Elgin," edited by Theodore Walrond——on Macmillan's: "Historical Essays," by Edward A. Freeman; and a collected edition of Canon Kingsley's poems——on Longmans': "The Foreign Policy of England from 1570 to 1870," an historical essay by Earl Russell.

—Continuing our enumeration of works relating to the Franco-Prussian war, we begin with these three English publications: "Pictures from Paris in War and Siege," by an American lady; "Plan of the Battle of Sedan," accompanied by a short me[illegible] with maps and views, by Capt. Fitz-George; and "The War for the Rhine Frontier," translated from the German of Col. Rüstow, by J. L. Needham, with maps and plans. The famous Alsatian Colonel Stoffel has published in a volume his plain-spoken Military Reports from Berlin, with a preface, in the form of a letter to a friend, that adds to the unpalatableness of his vera pro gratis, and has cost him a month's arrest. Commenting alike on the folly of those who think the discipline of the French army already restored, and those who think it can yet be restored by severer punishment of infraction of order, by the good example of officers, by camps of instruction, etc., he says:

"They do not perceive that the discipline in the army is only the consequence of the discipline in the family and in society. Why is the discipline so strict and certain in the Prussian army? Simply because the young men enter the military service already disciplined, i.e., constrained from their childhood to general obedience, to respect for authority, to fidelity to their engagements. It follows that their officers have almost nothing to do in the way of maintaining discipline, and therefore is explained why there are so few punishments in the Prussian army. . . . There will be no real discipline in the army without a thorough revolution in the training and education of the French youth."

A German translation has been published in Berlin of the pamphlet of Dr. E. W. Opzoomer, Law Professor at the University of Utrecht, with the title: "Das Unrecht Frankreichs im Kriege von 1870.—Die Bonapartes und das Recht Deutschlands auch nach Sedan." It will be found well worth reading, especially in connection with Thiers's speech on the Bishops' petition in behalf of the Pope. Of the "balance of power" which that statesman still childishly clings to, Professor Opzoomer remarks: "The equilibrium (Gleichgewicht) of Europe, and the preponderance (Uebergewicht) of France, are different words, but an inseparable idea." And this sentence the present Executive of France would do well to ponder:

"For the third time begins the tragi-comedy of the Republic. Will it follow the old circle? Will every moderate and peace-loving government again be reviled and despised, and will France experience nothing else but the everlasting interchange of monarchy and republic, of anarchy and sabre-rule? If this event come to pass (and there is every appearance of it), then France will travel the road which Spain has travelled; for my part, I believe she is already taking giant strides upon it. Unless a great new-birth occurs (and whence are to come the life-forces for its accomplishment?) then is France already the people of the past, while England clings to the present, and to North America and Germany belongs the future."

—The lighter-minded and less responsible among our readers we do not expect to excuse us for mentioning, yet once more, the Battle of Dorking literature; and certainly the Cuban rebellion itself is hardly a more wearisome subject. Duty constrains us, however, and the careless reader may amuse himself with the thought of his British brethren in a spasm of terror while we tell the more sedate that the last contribution to the literature in question has for a title, "What Happened after the Battle of Dorking. Being an Account of the Victory at Tunbridge Wells." It is a self-complacent, stupid little book, and presents for inspection a fairly good specimen of the loyal Briton who holds a commission in the militia. After the great German victory, the Queen, it appears, wished "to stick to Windsor Castle and head her own armies," but she was persuaded to go to Balmoral and remain in security, while Parliament went to Oxford—"in those days still under command of the grand old Church of England"—and, turning out the ministry, formed a new one on the basis of a coalition. Meantime, three volunteer armies flocked together, one at Henley-on-Thames, one at Salisbury, and one at Bedford. These were armed with rifles and "old Brown Bess"; and as "the purchase system had filled England with good officers," the hardy yeomen, the stalwart miners, the great muscular navvies, the healthy agricultural laborers, and other well-known classes of the community, each with its appropriate adjective, were all amenable to discipline, and were soon good troops. The enemy had won the battle of Dorking and occupied London, but he had not won without losses; he had only about 200,000 men; and, what was more, he had not complete command of the sea, for the English fleet had been hastily augmented, and had begun to use the sort of torpedoes which had at first been so effective on the side of the allied enemy. The latter had obtained from his spies full information about the county of Kent—"for we English have always been much too open-hearted to take precautions against foreigners obtaining what information they liked about us"—and was operating in that county with a view to obtaining possession of the fortifications at Chatham. But perhaps there are more profitable employments than repeating the details of the strategy by means of which the five British armies are concentrated on the German at Tunbridge Wells, are victorious in a great battle there, and compel the enemy's capitulation; suffice it to say that such was the result. But, says our author, "instead of demanding an indemnity for our expenses, or the return of Alsace and Lorraine to France, we simply let things return to the condition in which they were before the invasion." He does not, however, make this upshot of the war the result of the simple good faith and uncalculating good-nature of "J. B."—as Lowell and others disrespectfully designate our relative—which is what most of the Dorking and "Dame Europa" people would have done. "In fact," says he, "we had been in such a desperate state of alarm at the beginning of the invasion that we were only too glad to get rid of the Germans on any terms," and let them go not only peaceably but "stuffed full of beef and pudding and beer." The viands and beverages of Old England, by the way, play as conspicuous a part in much of this literature as in the old days when Hogarth's "Gate of Calais" was a nationally popular picture. There is sandwich and Bass and beef in plenty and profusion; and something of the same tendency to put a half-alarmed trust in himself because of his victuals is to be observed in our volunteer that M. Jean Crapaud was exhibiting a year ago in regard to his mitrailleuses. On the whole, it is decidedly to be hoped that we have seen the last of works of this kind, which certainly are little compatible with English dignity and show little good sense. Quite as well would it be to take a leaf even out of Sir Jerome Bowes's book, as quoted for us in another column. Nevertheless, perhaps it is well enough not to forget, either, that even in a country where two and two can be made to count five on occasion, it may be found none the less impossible to make two and two count seven or more. No one denies English force and power of will; but still, as the Scripture says, "knowledge is good to direct," and English training and discipline are doubtless in a bad way.

—The transfer of the telegraph in England from the hands of private owners to the hands of the Government was made too recently for an exact judgment to be now formed as to the relative efficiency and cheapness of the old and new systems of operating the lines. Mr. Scudamore, however, of the Postmaster-General's Office, has made his first report, and there is every reason to expect that if it is not now, the new system very shortly will be, greatly superior to the old, not only in point of cheapness and as regards the area of country covered by the network of lines and offices, as it is already, but also in the quickness and carefulness with which messages are sent and delivered. Evidently the English are repeating the experience of the Belgians, as we may no long time from now be repeating theirs. Almost coincident with the publication of Mr. Scudamore's report, the other day, came the story that one of the telegraph messengers, who had just died, had died from excessive overwork, and the assertion was made that the boys were often compelled to work eighteen, twenty-four, and even thirty-five hours on a stretch, and that it was not the exception but the rule to get out of them all the work possible. At the time of the transfer of ownership in the telegraph lines, there was naturally more or less soreness on the part of some of the private owners, which, of course, found more or less expression in the newspapers. Indeed, some of it found expression in the columns of our own press, for when our telegraph companies were resisting Congressman Washburn's attempt to induce the Government to make our telegraphic system a department of the postal service, they of course found advocates and opponents among the American newspapers, and in the London correspondence of one of our New York papers there was, we recollect, much incredulous scepticism as to the feasibility of the new enterprise in England. The death of young Whittaker, above-mentioned, has called out more of the same kind of writing in England, and once again our New York contemporary, too, is severe and sceptical in its English correspondence, and rates Mr. Scudamore, telling him that if he must kill "post-office niggers" in order to give the public their telegrams more cheaply than the old companies did —and here it is insinuated that in spite of what he says he knows very well that he can't do and hasn't done any such thing, and that he had better lay his accounts before the public—why, then he should stop his boasting and confess that the new plan is a failure. But now comes news that young Whittaker, being ambitious, and being also consumptive, as it turned out, begged for leave to do overwork, and, having overestimated his physical powers, he attempted more than he could do, and succumbed. As the first story has made some progress in going the rounds of the press, and as Mr. Washburn's reform is to come up again, this second story, too, may as well get circulation: And all correspondents everywhere should lay to heart the thought that it is better not to be swift in imputing murder, or even falsehood, or bad motives, to respectable people; because if that habit is formed, it increases the natural difficulty which man feels in retracting such imputations as are unfounded. And we have observed in the case of some correspondents that it so much increases this difficulty as to make it insuperable, so that when they have once told falsehoods about a person they never take them back on proof of their falsity, but keep perfectly still about it. And by-and-by, and even quicker than they otherwise would, they tell another about him.

A BORDER TOWN.*

MANY places more important than Rye will remain obscure for the want of those subjects for history which give attraction and variety to the early annals of that suburb of the great city. Always a border town, in a wider sense than the usual one, two nations contended for its ownership in the days of Dutch rule over New Amsterdam, two colonies alternately claimed and yielded control over it for half a century later, and in the Revolution it was the centre of the debatable land between the warring powers. For such a story the vates sacer arises in the Rev. Charles W. Baird, who has drawn out of the vicissitudes of his town a narrative written with faithful research among ample materials, and with more spirit than a mere chronicler of town-clerk's records could hope to attain.

The ancient towns of Rye and Hastings, standing ten miles apart in the mother-country, gave their designation and perhaps sent some of their first colonists to the settlements that were made under the latter name on or near Peningo Neck, in the year 1660. But the greater part of the adventurers came from New England, bringing all the Puritan virtues, and among them the Lord's people's resolution to encroach on the territory beyond them, crowding out the Dutch, whom they affected to treat as mere intruders. The name of Rye is traced to a small hamlet on the coast of Normandy, to which William the Conqueror once retreated before his barons; and thence back rather doubtfully to the Latin ripa, the bank of a stream, which does not mean sea-shore. Manussing, the name still borne by the island on which the first houses of the new colony were built, is more clearly derived from the word for an island common to all the Indian tribes of the neighborhood, Munnoh, which may be still traced in its diminutives all along the Sound. The town continued to grow, as it was planted, by offshoots from the English stock, with the occasional grafting of a German or French branch. It may surprise many readers, impressed with the idea of a marked Huguenot strain in the blood of Westchester County, to learn that, out of seventy settlers recorded before 1700, only two bear French names; and, among more than two hundred families that established themselves at Rye in the next century, only eleven came from France. True, the influence of the refugees from Louis's religious tyranny was out of all proportion to their strength in numbers. They seem to have been among the wealthiest and most respected members of the community, as well as the most fruitful. One name of a Huguenot family transplanted to Rye grew famous in the history of the nation. Another, that of L'Estrange, modified into Strang, belonged to a person of wealth and good repute, to judge from the fact that he was, in 1704, the keeper of the then famous tavern of the place. Innkeepers two centuries ago were chosen in Connecticut by the towns, and only persons of good character and estate were eligible.

The earliest recorded notices of Rye relate to disputes among its inhabitants about lands, which continued for several years, until decided by the General Court of Connecticut. About the same time the settlement was transferred from Manussing Island to its present site on the mainland, a single planter objecting to the desertion, and attempting to restrain his associates by petition to the General Court. Their quaint judgment was: "They cannot see that the sayd Galping is oppressed by their remoue as is alledged; but do aduise the sayd Galping to comply w^th^ his neighboures, and remove w^th^ them. Yet if he remaynes his dwelling where he is, he is aduised to take care of damnifying his neighboures." Galpin probably confined himself to verbal damnifying, for he is afterwards mentioned among the inhabitants of Rye. The growth of the town was steady, but slow. Old Rye, in 1591, had ordered a man "to depart the town for executing the profession of a husbandman, that place not being fit for such an artificer." But such "artificers," of course, composed the greater part of modern Rye's inhabitants, with the addition of millwrights, rope-makers, and mariners, whose pursuits were favored by its position between river and sea. Doctors there were none for sixty years, "but quacks eno'," and no lawyers for over a hundred; but their absence does not seem to have ensured remarkable healthfulness or neighborly harmony. The number of persons increased from twenty-five in 1665 to only sixty in 1669.

The settlers were less disturbed than most of their New England neighbors by alarms from the surrounding Indians, who were peaceable by nature and friendly, owing to the fair treatment they received. Yet the agitations and the sufferings of three wars visited Rye during its first half-century. The Dutch, upon their sudden recapture of New Amsterdam in 1673, demanded the submission of the settlement. Four of the inhabitants—there were then thirty-seven—visited Governor Colve and gave in their adhesion, and two of them were appointed magistrates of the town under his rule. The people of Rye, remaining firm, were threatened with hostilities. Alarmed by their nearness to the invaders, and by the appearance of an armed vessel in the Sound, and fearful of ruin, they implored help from Boston, and for a year were in great dread of assault; but the danger passed away upon the surrender of New Amsterdam by treaty in June following its capture. Two years later, the war organized by Philip of Mount Hope, with skill little expected from a savage, through a league of all the Massachusetts and Rhode Island tribes in a last desperate struggle for the extermination of the whites, brought its share of anxiety and sorrow upon the colony. Rye sent its quota of militia, fortified the town, and raised heavy taxes, and continued to feel the exhausting effects of this savage war long after its close. Again, in 1689, the attack upon New York by the French from Canada aroused the activity of the Eastern colonies, and a number of volunteers from Rye marched with the expedition sent from Connecticut to repel that invasion.

* "History of Rye. By Charles W. Baird." New York: Anson D. F. Randolph. 1871. 8vo, 570 pp.

But these troubles were slight compared with the misery brought home to the inhabitants after nearly a century of quiet by the War of Independence. The people of the town were prompt with patriotic resolutions upon the closing of the port of Boston in 1774, and the year after a delegate from Rye was present at the second Continental Congress. But opinion throughout the region was greatly divided, and party zeal used sharper weapons than contemptuous words and seditious writings. The tories banded in arms for nightly injury to property, and, as the contest advanced, became active as purveyors and scouts for the enemy, and in destroying the public means of defence, and robbing and outraging their patriotic townsmen. When, in September, 1776, the county became the immediate scene of military operations, a period of general danger and suffering began. While the American army lay at Kingsbridge, the farms were burned by the foragers; after the battle of White Plains the flames of burning houses and barns reddened the sky for many a night. Yet the removal of the army in 1777 left the inhabitants in still worse case, entirely exposed to the enemy's incursions, and the region so defenceless and infested with villains as to be threatened with depopulation. Had Washington's idea been carried out, that on grounds of military expediency the whole southern part of Westchester County ought to be desolated, hardly more distress and misery would have followed than were inflicted throughout the Revolution upon that neutral ground. Here, more than anywhere else, war was intensified into the fury of civil strife. The Queen's Rangers, recruited from Royalist Americans, were hated as domestic enemies, and the ravages of the Cowboys and Skinners, native-born wretches, who took up war as a trade of pillage and cruelty, were even more to be dreaded. The author's vivid details and new instances of these sufferings are confirmed by the striking account he borrows from President Dwight's "Travels" of the manner and appearance of the miserable people of Westchester.

Peningo Point was a favorite resort of the aborigines from its convenience for fishing, and Manussing Island was the site of one of their villages. Their visits, however, have long been matter of tradition, and the skeletons and arrowheads still frequently found remain the only traces of their existence. Of the few who survived in 1724, some had sunk into the condition of slaves. After their emancipation under the various acts of New York, the African race remained in numbers at Rye as laborers, but have been supplanted by European immigrants, and are now reduced to a mere handful. The author confesses that little can be said to the credit of Rye in olden times as to the vital interest of education. Early in the present century, President Dwight found reason to say of Westchester County, "Neither learning nor religion has, within my knowledge, flourished to any great extent among the inhabitants. . . . The people at large are extremely stinted in their information." Probably the author is not unjust in attributing this state of things at Rye in great part to the loss, by its annexation to New York, of the benefit of the Connecticut school system, since even in 1760 the schools of the larger province are described by its historian, Smith, as being "of the lowest order." Rye did, however, enjoy a Sunday-school, twenty years before the birth of Robert Raikes, under the auspices of the English Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts.

The most interesting circumstance in the history of Rye is the boundary controversy, which kept its inhabitants for two generations in uncertainty, first as to which of two sovereigns rightfully claimed their allegiance, and next as to which of two English provinces owned jurisdiction over them. The dispute is very clearly and fully narrated by Mr. Baird. At the time of the settlement the Dutch distinctly claimed sovereignty over all the territory extending to the Connecticut River, while the English more grandly and vaguely asserted their right westward to the Pacific. The first movement for adjustment came from Stuyvesant in 1650, before Rye existed. An agreement was made on conference at Hartford, settling a boundary that should nowhere come within ten miles east of the Hudson River, which was honestly meant by the Dutch, and faithlessly broken by the English. Another conference, thirteen years later, produced a reasonable proposition from Stuyvesant and an encroaching one from Connecticut, and the end of Dutch rule soon after changed the actors without closing the strife. Charles the Second, in 1662, granted by charter to Connecticut much that he did not own, including the Dutch territory to the Hudson, and the year after bestowed on his brother, the Duke of York, all the land from the west side of the Connecticut to Delaware Bay. Delegates from the colony speedily met commissioners from the duke, and together they easily and inconsiderately agreed upon a boundary. It was to run from the mouth of the Mamaroneck River north-northwest to the southern line of Massachusetts, and thus, with a charming recklessness of geography, the duke's agents yielded to Connecticut a western limit which would cross the Hudson near West Point, and cut a "monstrous cantle" out of New York on the other side that river! Connecticut, if ignorant at first of her advantage from the careless wording of a hasty treaty, was not innocent of improving it, and protected the Rye people in an attempt to plant and settle along the Hudson. Graver consideration, however, resulted in a new agreement, drawing the boundary between the provinces nearly in its present course, about twenty miles east of the Hudson; yielding, however, to Connecticut five towns on or near the Sound, long before settled by her at a much less distance from New York, fixing the starting point of the line at the mouth of Byram River, and throwing Rye within New York territory. In exchange for the towns, New York was to gain a strip north of them, eastward of the twenty-mile line, two miles in width by over fifty in length, afterwards known as "the oblong." Rye refused to submit to the new dominion, and seceded, declaring allegiance to Connecticut, not without her secret countenance. A correspondence ensued, firm on the part of New York, shuffling on that of Connecticut. Force was even threatened, and the travesty of an invasion from Stamford once attempted. It was only after four years of revolt, and upon the decision of the King in Council given in 1700, that Rye submitted, and became practically a part of New York.

This settled the boundary question so far as Rye was affected. But for fifty-three miles of its course northward it remained unsettled between the provinces, and continues to this day unsettled between the States. The agreement fixed a straight line northward to Massachusetts. The line as afterwards surveyed and marked by monuments can be plainly traced, but owing to the imperfections of the ancient surveys it inclines a little eastward. Connecticut demands a true straight line north. New York abides by the course as surveyed, marked under that agreement, and long practically acquiesced in. By adopting a straight line New York would lose a tract of 2,800 acres, containing two or three hundred inhabitants who have always been New Yorkers. They certainly can feel none of that passionate desire, which Mr. Baird says moved the revolting people of Rye, to belong to "the land of steady habits"—unless it is from admiration of her steady habit of claiming more than her right in this controversy. From its origin to the present time, whether as province, colony, or State, Connecticut has shown in the dispute a grasping and chicaning spirit.

The want of space forbids our dwelling in detail upon the merits of this history, which is very complete of its kind. It is full of lively sketches and quaint stories of the ways and manners of a primitive people in an old frontier town. More than half of it is devoted to a history of the churches and a genealogical account of the families of Rye; and for research and fulness it is a model of industry.

THE COOLIE.*

THE author of "Ginx's Baby" is fairly entitled to all the readers whom that amusing and effective satire may attract to the present work. He has brought to it the same philanthropy, displayed in another sphere of human suffering, and the same humor, restrained and adapted to a literal representation of facts. He still knows how to be entertaining, and this time he adds considerably to our knowledge, as well as quickens by turns our compassion and our indignation. This little volume will be found, indeed, a compendium of the best and of all needful information touching the system of indentured labor (chiefly Coolie, i.e. Indian) in British Guiana. The author was sent to that country in June, 1870, as counsel of the Aborigines Protection and Anti-Slavery Societies, in an enquiry ordered by Lord Granville in consequence of a letter addressed to him the previous year by a Mr. Des Vœux, formerly a stipendiary magistrate in the colony. This letter, which is given in full in the appendix, exposed with great particularity the defects of the apprenticeship system, more especially as seen in its legal phases; and it served as the text of the investigations pursued by the Commission, whom our author attended in the capacity above mentioned. From their report he makes copious extracts; but, while he agrees with it in the main, he is ready at all points to pass an intelligent criticism upon it, and his failure to agree will generally seem highly reasonable to the reader.

* "The Coolie: His Rights and Wrongs. By the Author of 'Ginx's Baby.'" Author's Edition. New York: George Routledge & Sons. 1871. 12mo, pp. 371.

Mr. Jenkins divides his work into two nearly equal parts. The first is chiefly a narrative of travel to the colony and excursions in it, with some general views of the order of society and government there, the modes of conducting the great sugar estates, and the procedure of the commission. Those who choose to go deeper into the subject, or, in other words, to learn more of the Commissioners' Report, as cited directly or appearing in the commentary of Mr. Jenkins, should read Part II., and by all means the appendix. Those who care only for what is picturesque and curious may stop with the fourteenth chapter, which concludes the papers originally contributed to Good Words, and here employed, with many additions and alterations, as an agreeable introduction to the solid discussion which follows. It is in this portion that we meet with the Chinese, more intelligent than either of his fellow-toilers in the field or in the sugar-house, only inferior to the negro as an engineer, with better notions of living than the Indian, though he saves less because his food is more varied, and because he smokes opium and gambles to excess; quitting the field when he can for a retail shop, or renting a piece of ground near town to cultivate for himself—his ambition to keep a pig, as the Coolie's to keep a cow. Him we see naked, over the boiling juice of the sugar, "deftly sweeping away the scum with large flat blades of wood"; or "under a shed amusing himself with the ladies of his family, not disconcerted by the manager's gentle hint—

"'Ah! no gone to work to-day, Ching-ching?'

"'No. No think work.'"

Or, well-dressed and well-fed, charging the ovens at the charcoal-burning settlement—his paradise in Guiana; or, finally, in the streets of Georgetown, in blue blouse and pigtail, with a "half-cunning, half-idiotic" countenance, "busily driving bargains from store to store" in furtherance of his country shopkeeping—a customer whom "it takes a Scotchman to match at shrewd barter."

Beside him we meet the Coolie, physically the handsomest of the three races, though not the strongest, proud of his Indian origin, looking down upon the negro as a less civilized being; still, though he has lost caste by leaving India, maintaining it in some degree, and rarely marrying with a woman of another race; in his quarrels trusting to his hackia stick rather than to the knives and pointed weapons of the Chinese. Him we see most frequently of all, now wheeling "megass" [the crushed cane] to the drying-sheds; now in the ditches, where, "standing firmly on his feet, every muscle in tension, he drives his scoop into the clay by the action of his arms and shoulders, lightly throwing it twenty feet or so out of the trench"; in the city's streets, "stepping along with light and vigorous swing, sometimes proudly sporting a shirt, or a white calico robe, or even a coat and trowsers," but generally clad only in "his little loin-cloth, or babba, leaving unswathed his polished limbs"; happy if he "have rice, a little curry, some oil to anoint himself withal—cover his wife with silver ornaments, and dress her in a gala dress—invest his own person, when off work, with a clean white babba and a gray cap or muslin turban, or, better still, a bright scarlet uniform of some *ex*tinguished regiment," and happy if he have a cow (though it should have cost him eighty or a hundred dollars), when his wife may be seen "diligently picking out the ticks from the animal's hair with one hand, while she softly smooths the skin with the other."

Lastly, the Negro; for the Portuguese, the first immigrants, from Madeira chiefly, long ago withdrew from the fields, and now almost monopolize the small shopkeeping of the colony, with a store at every street-corner. The Negro is the strongest of all the laborers, being perfectly acclimatized; works longer at a time, but for fewer days, earning twice as much as any other agricultural laborer in the same time; despises the Coolie for his very weakness, and proves a hard driver to him when so appointed over him. Independent, and preferring not to reside on the estate, we come to know him, while working there, as the expert cutter of canes and trenches, the most skilful sub-engineer, and, off the plantation, as the policeman, artisan, sailor, boatman, or stevedore par excellence. Yet it cannot be denied that he is the laziest inhabitant of Guiana. "Plaintains and bread-fruit grow at the back of his village with little trouble." He and his fellows "love to fish in the morning, and lie with full stomachs watching the slow wings of Time." Their houses, which they will not rescue from inundation without being paid for it, are "small wooden rattle-trap sheds in a dirty yard or rank, half-cultivated garden, undrained—a perfect morass in the rainy weather;" and one sees "the men and women sunning themselves on any dry spot, the naked youngsters rolling in their native mud; and, most curious mark of all, a white-frilled or embroidered petticoat and a muslin dress bleaching on some scraggy aloe for next Sunday's chapel." The pleasantest picture we have of this race is "in the school of Better Hope"—fit name, indeed—where the author found "a neat-looking colored mistress engaged with about fifteen children of various shades and sizes. She told me that when they would attend they did very well. Their copybooks bore comparison with those of many a home school, though I fear they did not take away much from such elaborate maxims as I found one little fellow writing: 'A censorious disposition is a disadvantage to its owner'—a hint, perhaps, that when he grew up he was not to be sinfully unreasonable in criticising the hospital supplies."

The Commission was looked upon with no friendly eyes, and the counsel of the Aborigines Protection and Anti-Slavery Societies in particular seemed a scandalous intruder, so much so that, as he says, "I had great difficulty in obtaining any person to act as a clerk, or in any way to assist me. At length I was fortunate in finding an Englishman, newly arrived, and, perhaps, unduly careless of consequences; for he was repeatedly warned by managers and others that he was ruining his prospects in British Guiana." The Commission, however, turned neither to the right nor to the left; examined Mr. Des Vœux, and examined the planters and their agents, and their indentured servants; and kept up the honorable tradition of English commissions generally in their proceedings and in their conclusions. These last we shall endeavor to sum up concisely.

The Coolie immigration to Guiana is under British control at both ends—or, rather, it begins and ends within the British dominions (we purposely omit from account the Chinese immigration). To an American it would have seemed easy and natural for the Imperial Parliament to regulate, by a comprehensive statute, the selection, enlistment, transportation, and labor contracts of Her Majesty's subjects in British India seeking to better their condition by removal to South America. But in truth the home Government has interfered chiefly to modify or to veto the legislation of the party most interested in the Coolie traffic—the sugar-planters of Guiana, who completely control the colony, and for whom it may be said to exist. The reluctance of the British mind to work according to principles is, perhaps, rather than indifference, ignorance, or inhumanity, at the bottom of the maladministration so clearly revealed by the Commission. There is, to begin with, no co-operation or even regular communication between the superintendents of emigration and immigration in India and Guiana respectively. In the former country, the recruiting agents of the planters are practically unrestrained as to their choice of emigrants and the representations by which they induce the Coolies to leave their homes. The medical inspection is lax and perfunctory to the last degree, and great numbers are passed who cannot survive the voyage, or, if they do, fall an early prey to the new climate and unwonted exactions. Cases of downright kidnapping have been alleged, though they are probably rare; but the difference is chiefly in the name of the transaction when the artisan is led to suppose that he will have a chance to continue the pursuit of his craft in Guiana, when the penal constraint and punishments for non-fulfilment of contract are carefully concealed from all the emigrants, and when the contract exhibited and signed in India is not considered binding in Guiana.

The feelings with which these poor wretches, the sick and the well, after a passage perhaps not needlessly uncomfortable—certainly not to be compared with the African "middle passage," though supervision of the emigrant ships is not what it should be—the feelings with which the Coolies disembark to a five years' servitude in a sickly and unlovely land, with no choice but field work, and that of a kind wholly new, and under an indenture which provides undreamt-of penalties, enforced by courts speaking an unknown tongue, by magistrates intimately allied by sympathy and necessity with their employers—may be imagined, but not described. Never was a system of apprenticeship better devised to prevent the laborer from becoming naturalized and a permanent citizen, and to make his only consolation, amid his hardships, the promised return to his native country at the expiration of his service. This consolation, if not denied him by death, is often rendered vain by the temptation to reindenture—not, as in Trinidad, by terms of twelve months each, but for another five years, on receipt of a bounty. Space fails us to picture the luckless Coolie under the law—treated like a criminal for a breach of a civil contract; or, if fined, impoverished, while the offence of his employer is punished by only an equal fine; unable to employ counsel, and with none allotted to him. The following extract will speak for itself (p. 267):

"The average of sentences of imprisonments, without a fine, in the county of Demerara, was 28·8 days. For over 3,000 convictions, the average for men is 39 days; for women, 25·7 days. The average of imprisonments, in default of payment of a fine, is—men, 23·4; women, 20. Of imprisonments, in default of payment of fine, there were 5,218, against 3,077 without that option. The fines imposed as an alternative, which the immigrants could not pay, averaged for males $6 47, and females $7 71. The whole number of convictions in the county during five years was 10,555. The Commissioners conclude that the number who go to jail is over eighty per cent., and the number who pay fines under twenty per cent., of the total number convicted."

The Anglo-Saxon judge and the Anglo-Saxon law, it is clear, are hardly to be praised in Demerara. On the subject of wages, of housing, of treatment in hospitals, a chapter of comment would not suffice. An ordinary estate is thus epitomized by our author (p. 780):

"Take a large factory in Manchester or Birmingham or Belfast, build a wall round it, shut its workpeople from all intercourse, save at rare intervals, with the outside world; keep them in absolute heathen ignorance, and get all the work you can out of them; treat them not unkindly, leave their social habits and relations to themselves, as matters not concerning you, who make the money from their labor, and you would have constituted a little community resembling, in no small degree, a sugar-estate village in British Guiana."

This is not slavery—it is, in fact, very far removed from it; but is it a system which a civilized and Christian nation can regard with complacency—without alarm, even? All through this book there are references to the possibility of extensive risings, and the antipathies and mutual distrust of the three servile races are confidently counted upon as guarantees of the safety of the ruling class. A more selfish oligarchy than the planters has probably seldom existed; and if it lacks the cruelty that distinguished our own in the days of slavery, it is unredeemed even by a fanatical political generalization or theory, while it has a sordid side which was not characteristic of the American slaveholder. What the author quotes in regard to Georgetown is applicable in a moral sense to the whole colony: "The motto of this place seems to be, Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." One looks in vain for any movement to educate the people, to fuse the incongruous elements by instruction in a common tongue, to purify their morals, to admit to a share in the government those who have no part or lot in the production of sugar, to broaden the base of the social edifice. The one thought of the planters is to expand their works and increase the supply of immigrants, and—"after us the deluge." That such a spectacle has no longer any lessons for Americans we would not affirm. The author has seen fit to dedicate specially to us this American edition, on the ground that "it is well that Americans and Englishmen should feel a common interest in all great questions of social polity or of philanthropic principle. We can no more disregard each other's movements, each other's successes, or each other's blunders than we can the motions of the earth or the laws of gravitation." The truth of this will, perhaps, be more apparent to us, and the value of this deserving little work be greater, when the Chinese question in this country shall have assumed a more national shape than it has yet done.

THE COMING RACE.*

ANY ONE who wishes once more to assure himself that the philosopher Pangloss was not so far wrong when he informed Candide that this is the best of all possible worlds, will get some satisfaction from this book. It is like all the rest of its kind in the particular which in all of them, no matter how novel or startling they may be in details, is most salient; they all show that the making over again of the world as we know it is a business a good deal too large for any mortal—at least for any mortal who has yet written a book containing a scheme for a new universe. It is like most of its kind in being, on the whole, tedious; and it is unlike the best of its kind in containing, amid its impossibilities, very little that is keen or fresh in satirical remark upon the works and ways of men as we know them; very little of the imaginative graces which have made some utopias and arcadias poetically beautiful; and none whatever of the humbler grace and truth of the humbler sort of imagined paradises which please the reader in such rather earthy earthly paradises as we find peopled by the Crusoes, and Peter Wilkinses, and Philip Quarlls of homely romance. A little satire; a little bitterness—undangerous, untonic, but bitter enough too; a little fancy and imagination the reader will find in "The Coming Race;" and it will give a sort of amusement for an idle hour; but its readers need look for no Swift and no Sidney in its author. They will make the acquaintance of a not very powerful mind, educated fully up to its abilities, if not a little beyond them, and writing that sort of matter with that sort of finish which makes one thank the printer and the bookbinder for not failing to add the exquisite typography and paper, the wide margin, and the general "elegant exterior."

The author says that he is by birth an American. His ancestors settled in this country in the time of Charles II., and his grandfather distinguished himself in the Revolutionary War. His family, therefore, "enjoyed a somewhat high social position in right of birth; and, being also opulent, they were considered disqualified for public service." When he was sixteen, the author was sent abroad to complete his literary education, and, in his absence, his father died, so that while still young, and as yet uncommitted to any profession or trade, he found himself wealthy and at leisure. Wandering for a time, he at last returned to this country, and made a visit to a friend who was employed as the engineer of a certain mine. At this place begin the adventures narrated in the volume. The engineer, persuaded that his mine contained far greater treasures than had yet been revealed, one day is exploring, and comes to a tremendous chasm, whose aspect, and what he hears proceeding from its depths, so frighten him that he returns pale to the upper air. He determines, however, to explore it, and he and our author, taking ropes and other means of descent, prepare to go down into the abyss. This is not effected safely by the engineer, who is dashed to pieces; but our author arrives safely at the bottom. He finds himself in a road lighted with numerous lamps, and he walks on, not without terror. The subterranean country opens around him, and he sees a landscape containing trees, some like vast ferns, others like sugar-cane, others fungous-like; streams and waters, some shining like naphtha, and others seeming to be as our streams, but confined between artificial banks, showing the work of man; dwellings in the distance, and the forms of what appear to be human beings. All is lighted by innumerable lamps, and by the shining of the naphtha pools and founts, and the air is soft, like an Italian summer. Passing onwards, the traveller comes soon to what is apparently a public building, which, at first glance, would seem to be of the earliest Egyptian order of architecture, but which the next glance shows to be more ornate, graceful, and fantastical than Egyptian architecture allows. Out of the portal, a moment later, comes one of the dwellers in this strange land, and, perhaps, his apparition is as good, effective, and truthful as anything in the volume.

"And now there came out of this building a form—human—was it human? It stood on the broad way and looked around, beheld me and approached. It came within a few yards of me, and at the sight and presence of it an indescribable awe and tremor seized me, rooting my feet to the ground. It reminded me of symbolical images of Genius or Demon that are seen on Etruscan vases or limned on the walls of Eastern sepulchres—images that borrow the outlines of man, and are yet of another race. It was tall, not gigantic, but tall as the tallest men below the height of giants.

"Its chief covering seemed to me to be composed of large wings folded over its breast and reaching to its knees; the rest of its attire was composed of an under-tunic and leggings of some thin fibrous material. It wore on its head a kind of tiara that shone with jewels, and carried in its right hand a slender staff of bright metal like polished steel. But the face! it was that which inspired my awe and my terror. It was the face of man, but yet of a type of man distinct from our known extant races. The nearest approach to it in outline and expression is the face of the sculptured sphinx—so regular in its calm, intellectual, mysterious beauty. Its color was peculiar, more like that of the red man than any other variety of our species, and yet different from it—a richer and a softer hue, with large black eyes, deep and brilliant, and brows arched as a semicircle. The face was beardless; but a nameless something in the aspect, tranquil though the expression, and beauteous though the features, roused that instinct of danger which the sight of a tiger or serpent arouses. I felt that this manlike image was endowed with forces inimical to man. As it drew near, a cold shudder came over me. I fell on my knees and covered my face with my hands."

* "The Coming Race; or, The New Utopia." New York: Scribner, Welford & Co.; F. B. Felt & Co. 1871.

Accosting our author after he has been recovered from his swoon of amazement, alarm, and involuntary homage, this majestic personage, who turns out to be an An—which is a male of the race of the Vril-ya, the female Vril-ya being Gy-ei, which is the plural form of Gy—leads him to a beautiful mansion, wherein are his family, consisting of numerous Ans and Gy-ei, who courteously welcome the new-found Tish, or barbarian, with the word of welcome, S.Si, and give him food. The Tish observes that the Gy-ei are taller and look physically and mentally stronger than the Ans, and this he afterwards discovers to be universally true among his new acquaintances.

He goes on living with them, and learning about them; and, of course, their ways of life, their religion, and their manner of holding, professing, and practising it, their politics, their science and literature, all their manner of thought and living are so described as to admonish and rebuke our human lives. In particular, satire is directed against the American principles in politics, the Darwinian theory, and the woman's-rights women—this latter attack being of a mixed character of directness and indirectness, and too subtly managed to have its full effect on those against whom it is made, or, for the matter of that, on anybody else. Here is a specimen of our author's degree of sharpness. It must be premised that a Koom-Posh—"hollow bosh"—is a democracy, while a Glek-Nas—"strife rot"—is a democracy at its natural end, in perpetual commotion and anarchy, namely. The conversation has just previously related to the Vril-ya's custom of sending out colonies whenever the inhabitants of the parent state exceed a certain number:

"'Of course, we cannot settle in lands already occupied by the Vril-ya; and if we take the cultivated lands of the other races of Ana, we must utterly destroy the previous inhabitants. Sometimes, as it is, we take waste spots, and find that a troublesome, quarrelsome race of Ana, especially if under the administration of Koom-Posh or Glek-Nas, resents our vicinity, and picks a quarrel with us; then, of course, as menacing our welfare, we destroy it: there is no coming to terms of peace with a race so idiotic that it is always changing the form of government which represents it. Koom-Posh,' said the child, emphatically, 'is bad enough, still it has brains, though at the back of its head, and is not without a heart; but in Glek-Nas the brain and heart of the creatures disappear, and they become all jaws, claws, and belly.'

"'You express yourself strongly. Allow me to inform you that I myself, and I am proud to say it, am the citizen of a Koom-Posh.'

"'I no longer,' answered Taë, 'wonder to see you here so far from your home. What was the condition of your native community before it became a Koom-Posh?'

"'A settlement of emigrants—like those settlements which your tribe sends forth—but so far unlike your settlements that it was dependent on the state from which it came. It shook off that yoke, and, crowned with eternal glory, became a Koom-Posh.'

"'Eternal glory! how long has the Koom-Posh lasted?'

"'About one hundred years.'

"'The length of an An's life—a very young community. In much less than another hundred years your Koom-Posh will be a Glek-Nas.'

"'Nay, the oldest states in the world I come from have such faith in its duration that they are all gradually shaping their institutions so as to melt into ours, and their most thoughtful politicians say that, whether they like it or not, the inevitable tendency of these old states is towards Koom-Posherie.'

"'The old states?'

"'Yes—the old states.'

"'With populations very small in proportion to the area of productive land?'

"'On the contrary, with populations very large in proportion to that area.'

"'I see! old states indeed!—so old as to become drivelling if they don't pack off that surplus population as we do ours—very old states!—very, very old! Pray, Tish, do you think it wise for very old men to try to turn head-over-heels as very young children do? And if you ask them why they attempted such antics, should you not laugh if they answered that by imitating very young children they could become very young children themselves? Ancient history abounds with instances of this sort a great many thousand years ago—and in every instance a very old state that played at Koom-Posh soon tumbled into Glek-Nas. Then, in horror of its own self, it cried out for a master, as an old man in his dotage cries out for a nurse; and after a succession of masters or nurses, more or less long, that very old state died out of history. A very old state attempting Koom-Posherie is like a very old man who pulls down the house to which he has been accustomed, but he has so exhausted his vigor in pulling down, that all he can do in the way of rebuilding is to run up a crazy hut, in which himself and his successors whine out, 'How the wind blows! How the walls shake!'

"'My dear Taë, I make all excuse for your unenlightened prejudices, which every schoolboy educated in a Koom-Posh could easily controvert, though he might not be so precociously learned in ancient history as you appear to be.'"

This, it will be seen, is not too scathing. Indeed, "the satirical rogue" appears to say "that old men have gray beards," which is not a charge the aged wise will be apt to resent. The passage is hardly a fair specimen of the whole of the book, for the crudity and bitterness are not elsewhere present in such quantity, and, in fact, are mostly not present at all. The power, however, is about the same everywhere, and everywhere there is the essential vice of this kind of writing; there is little or no coherence of parts; it is the atheist and the pumpkin of the old story over again; the new arrangement is all well enough till Atheisticus has it brought home to him that had the pumpkin been hung on the high bough where he and Alfonzo the Wise would have placed it had they been consulted, his brains would have long ago been knocked out in obedience to the law of gravitation and the nature of pumpkins. It is a little at a time, and, as some have said, by beginning with certain parts of our own natures, that the world must be made over; and slowly at that. "The kingdom of heaven is within you." For the rest, a book of this kind, no wiser than this, should have been smarter.

THE EARTH.*

M. Elisée Reclus is a French traveller and writer of ability, whose inspiration for the study of physical geography he may, likely enough, have derived from the founder of the science, Professor Carl Ritter, whose instruction he received at the University of Berlin. At all events, immediately after leaving the university, in 1851, he began his travels, and in the following six years visited, as a careful observer of men and nature, the various countries of North and South America. Readers of the Revue des Deux Mondes during 1859-61, may recall several articles, embodying some of the results of his geographical studies and travels, contributed by him after his return to France. He published, also, two or three books of minor importance, being, as it might seem, in training for this larger work, "The Earth."

This is a book of 666 pages, with 230 illustrations and 24 full-page maps, printed in colors. We are speaking of the English translation, which is, apparently, a simple reproduction of the French work, without notes or comments. The title gives an idea of the comprehensive character of the book, and a glance at the table of contents shows how, in systematic order, the earth is considered: first, as a planet in space, with theories of its origin; second, its continents, more especially their slopes, proportions, and diversified surfaces; third, the circulation of water, with glacial, river, and oceanic action; and, fourth, subterranean forces, producing volcanoes, earthquakes, and other disturbances of the crust. The author is impressed with the order and harmony which may be traced in the apparent disorder of nature. His purpose may be gathered from the following quotation:

"But the purely external symmetry presented by continental configurations is a trifling matter compared with the profound harmony resulting from the alternation of wind, currents, climate, and all the geological phenomena; it is not in the various portions of the globe, but in their working action, that we must seek for the real beauty of the earth. Planetary vitality is composed of perpetual contrasts in a perpetual harmony, and these very contrasts are incessantly being modified. Continents, seas, and atmosphere—and, in a more special way, every mountain, every peninsula, every river, every marine current, every wind that blows—may be considered as the organs of the globe on which we live; it is, therefore, by watching these organs at work, and by studying deeply and thoroughly their action and reaction, that we can best arrive at an acquaintance with the physiology of the planetary body. Physical geography is nothing else but the study of all these terrestrial harmonies."

This unscientific use of the word "vitality" must be noted, and the word taken only in its figurative sense. Throughout the book it is applied to phenomena quite distinct from those of life.

In tracing out these "terrestrial harmonies," the author makes necessarily broad generalizations, and supports them by the most striking examples, selected from the vast array of accumulated facts. To the general reader the details of scientific facts are dry, and the process of investigation which the student must pursue is exceedingly tedious. M. Reclus recognizes this, and presents here the finished product and the grand results; and, that we may be induced to read it all, he wisely omits the uninteresting commonplace, which we are sure to skip. He has a Frenchman's perception of the salient points, and an eye for grouping, and thus invests his subject with much more than the technical interest. But to the clear and graphic style which makes French scientific writers so attractive, he adds the thoroughness and accuracy of the Germans. Of course, the whole value of such a book depends upon its accuracy, and it may be said that M. Reclus has exercised a commendable care to state as true only well-ascertained facts. The constant reference to such authorities as Humboldt, Ritter, Schlagintweit, Guyot, Lyell, and Tyndall is evidence whence the facts outside of his personal observation have been drawn. We are, however, surprised to find that he has omitted to present that view of the relation between the continents and their adjacent oceans so strikingly brought out in Dana's "Geology"; as, for instance, that "the relation of the oceans to the mountain borders is so exact that the rule-of-three statement cannot be far from the truth; and, as applied to North America, as the size of the Appalachians to the size of the Atlantic, so is the size of the Rocky chain to the size of the Pacific," etc., etc. It is not strange that he should state (p. 244) that there are no glaciers upon the Sierra Nevada south of Mt. Ranier, in lat. 46°, since those upon Mt. Shasta, some 350 miles to the south, were not discovered by Mr. King until last summer. M. Reclus favors the "iceberg theory" (p. 251) in accounting for the "drift" over the interior of this continent, though the "glacial theory" is the one most commonly accepted. There are some trifling inaccuracies, as when the author speaks of the mineral springs at Saratoga as being salt, evidently having in mind the salt-wells of Syracuse. Also, if he means to say (p. 485) that coal-seams were once peat-beds, he expresses an opinion held by very few geologists. And, further, it may be the fault of the translator to call (p. 657) the coral animal an "insect." Such minor defects are, however, so few as not to affect the general accuracy of the book.

* "The Earth: A Descriptive History of the Phenomena of the Life of the Globe. By Elisée Reclus. Translated by the late B. B. Woodward, M.A., and edited by Henry Woodward, British Museum." New York: G. P. Putnam & Sons.

We wish we had space to enforce some of the lessons taught by M. Reclus, as when he speaks of the consequences of destroying the mountain forests:

"During the course of centuries, the trees have been cut down by greedy speculators and by senseless farmers who wished to add some little strips of land to the fields in the valleys and to the pastures on the summits; but when they destroyed the forest, they also destroyed the very ground it stood on. . . . . The devastating action of the streams in the French Alps is a very curious phenomenon in an historical point of view; for it explains why so many of the districts of Syria, Greece, Asia Minor, Africa, and Spain have been forsaken by their inhabitants. The men have disappeared along with the trees; the axe of the woodman, no less than the sword of the conqueror, has put an end to or transported entire populations."

This book is essentially popular in character—that is, it is readable with pleasure by persons of ordinary intelligence; and we are glad that we can speak well of it as a genuine attempt to popularize sound knowledge. It must not be confounded with the class of worthless popular books on science which are superficial and inaccurate, and do positive harm. The illustrations are very well executed, and add materially to the value of the book.

Rambles in Mount Desert: With Sketches of Travel on the New England Coast, from Isles of Shoals to Grand Menan. By B. F. De Costa. (New York: A. D. F. Randolph & Co.)—In these days, the city critic is disposed to amiability by the mere name of "Mount Desert." Upon the cool coasts of Maine, he fancies, a better holiday could be spent than in the average American watering-place, with its discomfort, exposure, and vulgarity. Mr. De Costa's book does not impair this impression. It is written in a style that is generally as cool and quiet as the "Echo Notch" landscape which is photographed as a frontispiece to the book; a style sometimes verging, indeed, upon weakness—as when a sentence is devoted to saying, "An ordinary cliff is a fine thing" (p. 249)—yet a style of pleasant rusticity, and in keeping with the theme. Mount Desert is an island of a hundred square miles, lying not too far from the coast of Maine to be connected with it by a bridge; and it is one of the earlier points of European settlement in America. The French were there for a few months as early as 1613; and the island, like many other parts of the New England coast, is rather rich in local traditions and bits of antique history, all of which Mr. De Costa has gathered up, not without intelligent investigation of his own. He recounts them with that slightly emphasized interest which seems so essential to the true flavor of local chronicles. Nothing in Washington Irving's "Tales of a Traveller" is more enjoyable than the great importance, in the minds of the worthy burghers who related them, of the various legends which they are so fond of telling; and in these sketches of Mount Desert we find something of the same local enthusiasm, or moist light—a quite unconscious effluence of the author's enthusiasm. The book is intended as a sort of compromise between a guide-book and a personal narration of travel; and it will be found a good handbook for persons who may resort to the coasts of Maine for their summering.

* Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books on the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Comfort (Prof. G. F.), Manual of German Conversation	(Harper & Bros.)
Corneille (P.), Le Cid, 2d ed., swd	(Holt & Williams)
Craik (Georgiana M.), The Cousin from India: a Girls' Book	(Harper & Bros.)
Dumas (A.), Edmond Dantes, swd	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	$0 75
Fetridge (W. P.), Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers in Europe	(Harper & Bros.)
Four Years at Yale	(C. C. Chatfield & Co.)	2 50
Gardiner (Rev. F.), Harmony of the Four Gospels in English	(Warren F. Draper)	2 50
Harmony of the Four Gospels in Greek	" "	2 50
George (H.), Our Land and Land Policy, swd	(San Francisco)
Giberne (Agnes), The Day-Star	(Pott & Amery)	1 25
Gould (Maj. J. M.), History of the First—Tenth—Twenty-ninth Maine Regiment	(Stephen Berry)	5 00
Hawthorne (N.), House of the Seven Gables, and the Snow Image	(J. R. Osgood & Co.)	2 00
Hutchinson (C. C.), Resources of Kansas, swd	(Topeka)
Illustrirte Kriegs-Chronik, Parts 20, 21, swd	(B. Westermann & Co.)
John Jerningham's Journal	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)	75
Johonnot (J.) and Hewes (S. E.), School-House	(J. W. Schermerhorn & Co.)	2 00
Lee (A. T.), Army Ballads and Other Poems
Lever (C.), Horace Templeton, swd	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	75
Life and Times of Henry, Lord Brougham, Vol. II	(Harper & Bros.)
Mackenzie (R. S.), Life of Sir Walter Scott	(J. R. Osgood & Co.)	2 00
Mediation: The Function of Thought	(Warren F. Draper)	1 25
Potter (H. L. D.), Manual of Reading	(Harper & Bros.)
Proctor (R. A.), Light Science for Leisure Hours	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Pynchon (Prof. T. R.), The Chemical Forces	(Taintor Bros.)
Racine (J.), Athalie, 2d ed., swd	(Holt & Williams)
Reade (C.), A Terrible Temptation	(Harper & Bros.
The Coming Race; or, The New Eutopia	(Francis B. Felt & Co.)
Wilson (Bishop), Expository Lectures on Colossians	(Prot. Episc. Soc.)	1 00

AGENTS WANTED TO SELL

EVERY HORSE-OWNER'S CYCLOPÆDIA.

This is the most complete work on the Horse ever published. It is by the best English and American authority, and illustrated with nearly 100 fine engravings representing every disease the horse is subject to, and portraits of the most celebrated horses.

Agents are meeting with unprecedented success, selling from five to ten copies a day. We allow Agents liberal discounts. Any good man can make $30 a week without trouble.

SOLD ONLY BY SUBSCRIPTION.

Send for Circular of Terms, etc., to

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,
PHILADELPHIA.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE PUPIL OF THE LEGION OF HONOR.

By LOUIS ENAULT.

Translated from the French by Mrs. Chas. P. Tuft.

8vo, paper, $1; cloth, $1 50.

A most delightful story; pure in tone, elevated in sentiment, and of the greatest interest, it will undoubtedly prove one of the literary successes of the season.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

FRENCH AND GERMAN

SCHOOL BOOKS.

HOLT & WILLIAMS,

PUBLISHERS,

No. 25 Bond Street, New York.

☞ A descriptive catalogue will be sent gratis to any one referring to this advertisement.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY, CAMBRIDGE, MASS.,

COMPRISES THE FOLLOWING DEPARTMENTS:

HARVARD COLLEGE.
THE UNIVERSITY LECTURES.
THE DIVINITY SCHOOL.
THE LAW SCHOOL.
THE LAWRENCE SCIENTIFIC SCHOOL.
THE SCHOOL OF MINING AND PRACTICAL GEOLOGY.
THE EPISCOPAL THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.
THE MEDICAL SCHOOL.
THE DENTAL SCHOOL.
THE BOTANIC GARDEN.
THE ASTRONOMICAL OBSERVATORY.
THE MUSEUM OF COMPARATIVE ZOÖLOGY.
THE PEABODY MUSEUM OF ARCHÆOLOGY.
THE BUSSEY INSTITUTION (a School of Agriculture and Horticulture).

The Academic Year begins in all departments on the THURSDAY FOLLOWING THE LAST WEDNESDAY IN SEPTEMBER, and ends on the last Wednesday in June.

The Second Examination for admission to Harvard College will be held on September 28, 29, and 30, beginning at 8 A.M. on September 28.

The Examinations for admission to the Engineering Department of the Lawrence Scientific School, the Mining School, and the Bussey Institution will be held on September 28, beginning at 9 A.M.

SCIENTIFIC DEPARTMENTS.

INSTRUCTORS.

LOUIS AGASSIZ, LL.D., Professor of Zoölogy and Geology.
BENJAMIN PEIRCE, LL.D., " Astronomy and Mathematics.
ASA GRAY, LL.D., " Natural History.
THOMAS MOTLEY, Instructor in Farming.
JEFFRIES WYMAN, M.D., Professor of Anatomy.
HENRY L. EUSTIS, A.M., " Engineering.
JOSIAH D. WHITNEY, LL.D., " Geology.
HERMANN A. HAGEN, M.D. " Entomology.
WOLCOTT GIBBS, M.D., " the Application of Science to the Useful Arts.
FRANCIS PARKMAN, A.M., " Horticulture.
DANIEL D. SLADE, M.D., " Applied Zoölogy.
JOSEPH WINLOCK, A.M., " Astronomy and Geodesy.
JOSIAH P. COOKE, A.M., " Chemistry and Mineralogy.
JAMES M. PEIRCE, A.M., " Mathematics.
FRANCIS H. STORER, A.M., Professor of Agricultural Chemistry.
CHARLES FRED. HOFFMANN, " Topographical Engineering.
RAPHAEL PUMPELLY, " Mining.
WILLIAM H. PETTEE, A.M., Instructor in Mining.
NATHANIEL S. SHALER, S.B., Professor of Palæontology.
FRANCIS G. SANBORN, Instructor in Entomology.
JOHN TROWBRIDGE, S.B., Assistant Professor of Physics.
GEORGE A. HILL, A.B., Assistant Professor of Physics.
PIERRE J. BORIS, Instructor in French.
WILLIAM G. FARLOW, M.D., Assistant in Botany.
CHARLES L. JACKSON, A.M., Assistant Professor of Chemistry.
JOSIAH C. BARTLETT, A.B., Instructor in Mathematics.
HENRY B. HILL, A.B., Assistant in Chemistry.
GEORGE THEODORE DIPPOLD, Instructor in German.
CHARLES E. MUNROE, Assistant in Chemistry.

LAWRENCE SCIENTIFIC SCHOOL.—This school has been reorganized, and now offers:

1. A four-years' course of study in Civil and Topographical Engineering, as follows: First Year—Spherical Trigonometry, Analytical Geometry, Descriptive Geometry, Chemistry, Surveying and Plotting, Road-making, Free-hand and Water-color Drawing, French. Second Year—Differential and Integral Calculus, Mechanics, Physics, Mathematical and Physical Geography, Elementary Geology, Crystallography, Mineralogy, and the use of the Blowpipe, Mechanical Drawing, French, German. Third Year—Applied Mechanics, Practical Astronomy and Geodesy, Hypsometry, Topographical Surveying and Drawing, Structural and Dynamical Geology, Photography, German. Fourth Year—Building materials, and their applications in railroads, canals, bridges, etc.; Applications of Descriptive Geometry to masonry and stone-cutting; Hydraulics; Heat and its applications; Discussions of existing structures, and working out of projects.

Candidates for admission to this course on Engineering (unless they are graduates of colleges) will be examined in Arithmetic, Algebra, Geometry, and Trigonometry, and will also be required to show that they are reasonably proficient in English Grammar and Geography.

2. A one year's course of study in the elements of Natural History, Chemistry, and Physics, as follows; Physical Geography, Structural Geology, and Meteorology; General Chemistry and Qualitative Analysis; Physics; Botany; Zoölogy; Entomology.

This course is especially intended for teachers, or persons who intend to become teachers. The instruction will be mainly given in the laboratories and museums of the University; it will be of the most practical character, every student being taught to make experiments and study specimens himself.

3. Thorough instruction for advanced students in any of the following subjects: Physics (Heat and Light), Chemistry, Zoölogy, Geology, Botany, and Mathematics.

Professor Gibbs will receive special students in Heat and Light at the Rumford laboratory. Professor Cooke will receive special students in Chemistry at the laboratories in Boylston Hall. Professors Agassiz, Hagen, and Shaler will receive special students in Zoölogy and Geology at the Museum of Comparative Zoölogy. Professor Gray and Assistant Farlow will receive special students in Botany at the Botanic Garden and Herbarium. Professor Benjamin Peirce and James M. Peirce will receive special students in Mathematics.

The opportunities for advanced students in all branches of Natural History and in Physics, Chemistry, Astronomy, and Mathematics will be much greater next year than ever before. The Museum of Comparative Zoölogy has been more than doubled in size during the current year; a laboratory, lecture-room, and greenhouse have been added to the equipment of the Botanical Department; a laboratory of Physics is to be created during the Summer in Harvard Hall; the chemical laboratories are to be greatly enlarged and improved; the interior of the Scientific School Building is to be completely reconstructed; and a distinct physical laboratory and cabinet are to be assigned to the Rumford Professor. At the same time, the scope and volume of the instruction will be greatly enlarged.

MINING SCHOOL.—The full course, prescribed for candidates for the degree of Mining Engineer, occupies four years, the first three of which are identical, as regards the subjects of instruction and the order thereof, with the first three years of the Engineering Course above specified. The terms of admission are the same as those of the Engineering Course. The fourth year of the course is as follows: Economical Geology and the Phenomena of Veins: Mining Machinery and the Exploitation of Mines; General and Practical Metallurgy; Assaying; Working-up, Plotting, and Writing out notes of summer excursions.

BUSSEY INSTITUTION.—The School of Agriculture and Horticulture, established in execution of the Trusts created by the Will of Benjamin Bussey, will give thorough instruction in Agriculture, Useful and Ornamental Gardening, and Stock-raising.

The regular course of the study will fill three years. First Year—Physical Geography, Structural Geology, and Meteorology; General Chemistry and Qualitative Analysis; the elements of Physics; Levelling and Road-making; the Elements of Botany, Zoölogy, and Entomology; French; German. The instruction of the first year's course will be given at Cambridge, and students of the first year must live in or near Cambridge. The instruction of the second and third years' courses will be given at the Bussey Institution, and students of those courses must live within easy reach of the Institution, which is situated near the village of Jamaica Plain, about five miles southwest of Boston, and close to the Forest Hill Station on the Boston and Providence Railroad. The subjects to be taught at the Bussey Institution during the year 1871-72, being subjects of the second year's course, are as follows: Theory and Practice of Farming, Horticulture; Agricultural Chemistry, Applied Zoölogy, Entomology, Quantitative Analysis. The third year's course will be hereafter arranged, and will be given for the first time in 1872-73.

The teachings of the School will be amply illustrated by the rich scientific selections of the University, and by a Botanic Garden, a large and profitable farm, greenhouses, propagating-houses, and field experiments.

FEES AND EXPENSES.—The tuition fee for the Academic year in any of the above departments or courses is $150; for half or any smaller fraction of a year, $75; for any fraction of a year greater than one-half, the fee of the whole year is charged. In the Bussey Institution there are also separate fees for certain distinct courses of lectures; and in that Institution tuition fees will be freely remitted to poor and meritorious students.

The other expenses of a student for an academic year may be estimated as follows: Room, $30 to $100; Board for 38 weeks, $152 to $304; Books, $20 to $25; Fuel and Lights, $15 to $35; Washing, $19 to $38.

For University Catalogues, descriptive circulars, examination papers, or information about any department of the University, address J. W. HARRIS, Sec.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, AUGUST 31, 1871.

The Week.

THERE is to be a meeting, and we have no doubt it will be a great meeting, on Monday next, to express indignation over the condition of the City government. It is to be regretted that it takes place before the hot weather is quite over, but it must take place soon if it is to have any influence on the State election. The Republicans are very confident of their ability to "secure the Legislature" under the influence of the exposures of the Times; but securing the Legislature must mean more than getting a nominal Republican majority. It must be a majority that cannot be breached by money, which there is no doubt the Ring will use as money has never been used in political struggles before. It is not, therefore, every man who approves of reconstruction, "endorses Grant," and believes in the equality of men, whom it will do to send to Albany, to deal with the villanies of the City Hall. We must not have any more whining and imprecation over the treachery of Republicans, as over Winans in the employ of the Erie Ring. The majority, too, must be sufficiently large to override the Governor's veto, for it is hardly possible that Hoffman will betray his patrons in their extremity. If such majority can be secured, the whole City government should be promptly legislated out of office. Then, if an honest District Attorney could be secured, there would be a chance of bringing Hall and his associates to justice. Otherwise we fear there is none, except through a vigilance committee, and although no one supposes the formation of a vigilance committee in New York would mean anything short of civil war, nevertheless we believe a good many sober and sensible men begin to recognize the possibility of its becoming expedient to exercise against the Ring the right of revolution, trying to inflict on its leading members the only penalty which has any terrors for them. We presume it is strictly correct to say that the one consequence of thieving which Hall, Tweed, and Connolly would now dread is a violent death. Public scorn, or even the penitentiary, has little terrors for them. This may sound like wild talk to some of our readers in the country, but we do not think it will to most New York observers. We do not know how the affair may end, but we do know that if Barnard, Hall, Tweed, and Connolly close their careers in peace, and ease, and affluence, it will be a terrible blow to political and private morality. They ought to be hunted down for the same reason which led some of the soberest French Liberals to refuse to compromise on any terms with Louis Napoleon. They said the fabric of French society could not support the spectacle of such a man's peaceful death on the throne.

The most cheering sign of the times by far, and, indeed, the one incident which has yet occurred which leads us to hope for reform—from the action of rich Americans we hope little or nothing—is the revolt of the German Democrats against Tammany. This has been looked for with great anxiety for some time, and has come at last. The leading German paper, the Staats-Zeitung, which the Republicans ought long ago to have bought, if it cost $3,000,000, instead of "reorganizing the party in this city," and tinkering the custom-house; which has an enormous circulation and great influence, and has been a firm supporter of Tammany, has declared war against Hall and Connolly & Co., and its action has been followed up by the adoption of resolutions by the German Democratic Committee at their last monthly meeting, on Monday night, inveighing against the financial management of the Ring, calling for an immediate publication of the accounts, and the production hereafter of a monthly financial exhibit, and for the examination of the municipal books by a committee of respectable citizens. There is sufficient reluctance of tone in the resolutions to prove that this action, which is of the highest importance, has been forced on the managers by the rank and file. The Germans will not stand stealing, and we suspect that if they get fairly enlisted in pursuit of the thieves, they will make this city too hot for them. We believe they have not contributed a single great thief to the City Hall, nor a single knave to the bench. It ought to be said for the Irish that two of the most respected judges, Daly and Brady, are Irishmen; the two noted judicial rascals are Americans; and the chief scoundrels of the City Hall are drawn almost equally from the Irish and Americans. The clearest brains of the Ring are Irish, but the most of the money seems to go to the Americans, who, by the bye, are far more luxurious dogs than the Irish. Their wants are vaster and more varied, and their appetites more delicate.

General Butler opened what he called his "campaign" for the governorship of Massachusetts by a speech on Friday last at Springfield. We have commented on its leading points elsewhere. It was divided into two parts; in the first, he lauded himself highly, with the aid of the "Rebellion Record," from which he made quotation; in the second, he abused his enemies, and notably the editors of the Springfield Republican and Hartford Courant. The former he ridiculed for not suffering himself to be carried before the Senate Committee in 1859, to testify in the matter of the John Brown raid; of General Hawley, the editor of the Courant, he invented a pure falsehood, namely, that he (Butler) had removed him from his command on the James for inefficiency and incompetency, which led to General Hawley's denouncing him as a "liar and a blackguard." This mode of meeting his enemies is an old one of Mr. Butler's, and nothing probably would lead him to abandon it except the fear of physical pain. It does not injure him in the least, however, either with the apostles of the Humanitarian persuasion, or the "ministers of the Gospel" engaged in the Temperance movement, or the "noble women" of the Female Suffrage movement. The New York Times has severely reprimanded Mr. Butler for his want of decorum, and regrets that he should have engaged in personalities, instead of a lofty discussion of grave public questions. We entirely concur in this view. We think that for a Christian statesman his conduct has been somewhat unbecoming.

We doubt if there has ever been, in the history of steam transit in America, such a series of accidents as the papers have told of within the last seven days. What with the Lodona wrecked, the Mobile explosion, the Westport collision, and the slaughter near Boston, even our careless American travelling public feels, for the moment, at any rate, a decided sense of uneasiness. The popularity of the traditional negro sitting on the safety-valve has entirely vanished; he would be in danger of his life on board a Mississippi steamboat itself, so angry is the community in general with the wicked recklessness or neglect of railway and steamboat officials and owners. The latest accident, up to this time of writing, that which took place near Boston, on Saturday last, is perhaps the worst, and wants hardly any circumstance of horror. It is even probable that the unfortunate passengers perceived that their death was upon them, and had some moments of dreadful expectancy before they perished; some, at least, saw that their time had come; and death coming in that shape must have seemed almost vindictive as well as inevitable and horrible. Another thing about the massacre that was dreadful was the robbery of the mangled bodies while yet not dead, or but just dead. This, we suppose, is to be accounted for by the fact that the usual annual camp-meeting a little further down the road was in session, and, of course, that is a gathering which, like any other large crowd of country people within striking distance, attracts a concourse of dehumanized wretches from the neighboring great city. On the other hand, there was made by some of the victims a display of endurance and unselfishness which was a glory of human nature; or would be but for the fact that it is not a rare display on such occasions, as everybody knows who, during the late war, used to see the hospitals after a battle. It is hardly doubtful that this time the guilt will be fixed upon the criminals, and it is every way probable that they will get from a jury the mercy they deserve. We are glad to see that the relations of the killed and wounded are already bringing suits against the company for damages, which in the aggregate will be a very large sum; and we hope that, whatever may be the delicacy of private sorrow, considerations of the public good may overbear it, and suit be brought in every instance. Another good thing about this frightful affair is that it will reinforce the public opinion which demands the punishment of the owners of the Westfield and their incompetent employees. In the case of that accident, many families lost the mainstay of the household, and suits for damages are peculiarly appropriate.

A very noticeable thing about this disaster is the graphic accounts of it which one and another of the survivors have given. Every reporter and other person engaged in the corruption of the English language, and desirous of having his week's wages raised for doing his work better, should cut out Mr. Charles Story's account, for instance, and keep it by him as a model. Here is a specimen of it:

"A moment after I saw a woman lying upon the grass, her right arm fearfully crushed between the elbow and shoulder, and her face badly scalded. She must have been suffering intense pain. I asked her what I could do for her. She replied: 'There are others hurt a great deal worse than I am. Go and attend to them. I can bear it.' She was taken to a house near by, and laid upon the floor, with a bundle of bloody clothes for a pillow. She would not let the doctor attend to her injuries until she knew that the others had been seen to. There were several others badly hurt in the same house. After the train had been thoroughly cleared, I got my wife and little girl a place to stay, and got on a Lynn horse-car. I went to Lynn and spread the news, and a train was sent up."

Not that some of the reporters also did not do well. But they still have among them the writer who, the other day, spoke of Mayor Hall's truckling to the mob as "Mayor Hall's truculency"—which latter would have been almost a subject for Nast.

We said last week that it is idle for the politicians to attempt prognostication of the canvass of 1872 from the elections of this year, at least so far as concerns the elections in September and October. Neither party will rest much hope for next year on this year's result in California, or Maine, or Ohio, or Pennsylvania, however they go, unless the majority is very unexpectedly large. So, too, of North Carolina, which some Republicans have persuaded themselves is once more in the Republican line. The recent election affords no refutation whatever of the doctrine that the Republicans, if they are to elect the next President, will elect him in the North, and get very little, if any, help from the South. The full official returns show the heaviest vote that the State has ever cast, being 181,359, while the vote in the last Presidential election was a thousand lighter, and the vote of last year seven or eight thousand lighter. Last year the Democratic majority was 5,000. The question as to whether there should be a convention called to revise the constitution, or, rather, frame a new one, was what called out so heavy a vote, and though this was a Democratic measure, it was the votes of Democrats which defeated it; Democrats who voted for the Democratic candidate in 1870 voting against it certainly to the number of three thousand at least, and probably, though the returns do not make it clear, to the number of thrice three thousand. It was a Democratic measure, for the party was anxious to get certain Republican judges off the bench whose terms are too long to suit its mind, and there are other evidences and fruits of Republican ascendancy which it would like to destroy. But, as our readers know, the question whether the Legislature had any right to order a vote for a convention was a legal question of some nicety, and the President being advised—wrongly, as we believe—that the Legislature had no such right, allowed his Attorney-General in person to make speeches, threatening the people with Federal interference in case the call for a convention was carried. These threats alone would doubtless have been enough to turn the scale against the convention. And besides this there was the fear—potent with thousands—that if the creditor class were allowed to frame a new constitution, they would be much less merciful to debtors in regard to the amount of property exempt from seizure for debt than the present constitution is.

The preparations for the arbitration provided for by the Treaty of Washington are slowly approaching completion. England has appointed Lord Chief-Justice Cockburn (of the Queen's Bench) to represent her. The United States sends Charles Francis Adams, the happiest and most fitting appointment the Administration has ever made. Switzerland has appointed M. Staempfli, the Ex-President of the Confederation. The Emperor of Brazil and the King of Italy have still to appoint representatives before the Board is complete. Should they neglect or refuse to do so for two months after request made, the King of Sweden will fill the vacant places. This Board, which is to sit at Geneva, decides the question whether, under the rules of international law laid down by the treaty, Great Britain failed, in the Alabama matter, to do her duty as a neutral towards the United States during the late war. If it decides that she did not so fail, the Alabama claims vanish into history; if it decides that she did so fail, then it decides further whether she shall pay a round sum to the Government at Washington in satisfaction, or shall pay the claims in detail as they are proved. Each side is now busy in drawing up a "case," or, in plain language, its version of the story for submission to the Board, the Lord Chancellor, Professor Mountague Bernard, and Lord Tenterden, for England, and Mr. Bancroft Davis and Mr. C. C. Beaman, jun., for the United States. Mr. Beaman, by the way, has already made an excellent compilation, published some months ago, of all documents bearing on the Alabama case. Who are the counsel who will argue on both sides is not yet known, but the occasion is one of the greatest in which counsel ever appeared, and they ought to be the foremost men of their respective bars.

The success of the new loan is no longer doubted, and all intelligent men are thankful for our narrow escape from another wretched failure. To those who know how narrow that escape has been, and on what dangerous ground the Secretary has been and is yet treading, the attempt to represent the affair as a distinguished triumph of his skill and management is simply absurd. As the facts in relation to the matter gradually leak out, it seems to be settled that Mr. Boutwell has largely exceeded his authority in the terms granted to the Syndicate, who are said, according to one version, to make three months' coin interest, or one and a half per cent., and, according to another version, six months' interest, or three per cent. in coin, on the total amount of the conversions, in addition to the commission of one per cent. provided by law. If these appearances deceive, and Mr. Boutwell is unjustly charged, the blame must fall chiefly, though not wholly, upon himself. And we must call the attention of all papers and people who are becoming enthusiastic over the "success" of the Secretary's pet loan to the fact that of the $1,500,000,000 which he asked for authority to place at 4, 4½, and 5 per cent. interest, he has placed, after a year of advertising and hawking, not fifteen hundred millions, but two hundred.

The loan negotiations have had no visible effect upon any of the markets. Governments are scarcely so firm; gold is steady; foreign exchange higher. There has been an artificial scarcity of gold, which has no real significance, being merely a Broad Street trick. Great efforts have been making to advance the stock market; but in the face of diminished railroad earnings, reduced freights, and the growing distrust of all these manufactured securities and their gambling directors and managers, the failure of the attempts surprises no one. Money continues extremely easy, though with occasional slight upward fluctuations. Business generally in all the money markets is dull and limited.

The interruption to the long-continued decline in the prices of the leading staples pointed out a week or two ago, seems to have assumed the character of a permanent improvement. With the exception of some kinds of provisions, still suffering from accumulated stocks and speculative inflation, almost every important article of merchandise has been firm and inclined to advance. Cotton, in spite of crop accounts which seem to us on the whole more favorable, has risen in price, owing to the very large European and domestic consumption, and the declining stocks. Breadstuffs have been decidedly higher, the change being attended with the crop of failing speculators which seems to be the usual consequence of even slight fluctuations nowadays, indicating the diminishing means at the disposal of the average class of dealers in almost every description of trade. The improvement in breadstuffs has been chiefly due to unfavorable weather in England and on parts of the Continent, together with a dogged determination on the part of farmers not to submit longer to what they call "starvation" prices. Sugar, coffee, and other groceries are all higher and apparently advancing. General business has assumed a more cheerful aspect, and there has been more activity. But the thoughtful merchants point with some alarm to the incessant and growing complaints among the farmers of their want of prosperity, to the continued scarcity of money and difficulty of making collections in the country districts, and the remarkable decline in the earnings of most of the leading railroads. The real-estate market is dull, but held pretty firmly. The number of new buildings remaining unfinished, or unoccupied when finished, is quite large. Foreclosures of mortgages continue uncomfortably frequent. This week alone, four mortgages on improved city property were foreclosed by one insurance company. With the advancing season and with improved markets, the mercantile community do not generally display much buoyancy or sanguine feeling.

Affairs in France have again assumed an unusually serious aspect. The Right in the National Assembly has obviously determined to make a strenuous stand against M. Thiers and his friends of the Left and Centre, and to reclaim for that body not only the control of current affairs, which has been gradually slipping from its hands, but the right to decide on the future constitution of France, which the Chief of the Executive so often asserted it was not wise for it to exercise, and the Radicals positively and vehemently deny. In a word, the "compact of Bordeaux," which was to secure the country, through a cessation of party hostilities, the time required for the re-establishment of order, the consolidation of peace, the reorganization of the army, and the revival of industry, credit, and—let us add—good sense, is to be broken, and the destinies of the nation henceforth to be shaped by the dictates of a majority which has ceased to represent a portion of its constituencies, or—if the attempt to curb M. Thiers fail—by a kind of dictatorship derived only from the necessities and complications of the moment, and, in any case, founded on indirect and contested legal titles. M. Thiers has hitherto chiefly maintained himself by the adroitly used threat of resigning his powers, and thereby surrendering the Assembly and the country to the fury of factions, the arrogant demands of the foreign foe, and bankruptcy; he now repeats this threat more frequently than ever, and its power ought fully to be felt—for the foreign enemy is still at the gates, and the domestic no less menacing—but the Right is becoming more and more accustomed to it, and, whether it believes it not to be entirely serious, or whether it has been goaded by contention and defeats to risk all consequences, it seems resolved to fight.

The bellicose spirit of the Right fully manifested itself in the debates on the bill for the disbandment of the National Guard. This bill was, of course, violently combated by the Radicals, in the Assembly as well as in the press; and the excitement caused by it among the laboring classes in the large cities, against whom it was chiefly aimed, grew to an alarming degree. In the sitting of Thursday, August 24, General Pélissier characterized the measure as inopportune and dangerous; the Extreme Right, however, insisted on immediate and "uncompromising" disbandment—a resolution so evidently adventurous that it may appear to give color to the assumption that the provocation of a new armed conflict is considered by certain leading members of that extreme wing as their only means of recovering the ascendancy the Right neglected to secure on the reduction of Paris. M. Thiers objected to immediate action—that is, to disbandment before adopting the new army organization, which would convert the National Guards into soldiers—as unjust and uselessly offensive to the loyal portions of the civic force. Being violently interrupted, he concluded by declaring that, having lost the confidence of the Assembly, "he knew what course to adopt." He was sustained by the Centre and the more moderate portion of the Right, and an amendment, proposed by General Ducrot, providing for a gradual disbandment of the Guards, was adopted by a very large majority. Yet the uncompromising, who thus showed themselves ready to face both the resignation of M. Thiers and a new insurrection, mustered upward of one hundred and fifty on the division. The sitting was exceedingly stormy, and marked by indecent violence.

The main battle, however, is to be fought on M. Rivet's motion for the prolongation and extension of the powers of the Chief of the Executive. The report of the special committee on the subject—presented, not by M. St.-Marc-Girardin, as formerly expected, but by M. Rivet himself—is, if the Cable rightly informs us, far from representing the views of the mover. It concludes with submitting a decree declaring the Assembly "entitled to constituent powers, which have not been exercised hitherto solely from the force of circumstances"—a double assertion of disputed and disputable correctness—and providing "that M. Thiers take the title of President"—of the Republic, not of the Council, as held hitherto—"continue to exercise executive powers under the authority of the Assembly"—and as long as the latter likes, not for three years, as proposed—and be himself, no less than his ministers, "responsible to the Assembly." This decree, if passed, would, as far as such things can be decreed, render the Assembly omnipotent, and M. Thiers its humble tool; and yet we hear only of a timid amendment on the part of the Government, presented by the Minister of Justice, Dufaure—an amendment expressive of confidence in the future President; and even this proposed insertion is reported to have been considered and rejected by the committee. The Radical members of the Assembly are furious at the new attitude it threatens to assume, and General Faidherbe, the special friend of M. Gambetta, is reported to have resigned his seat as deputy on that ground, without waiting for the consummation of the usurping encroachments he revolts against. And his example, we are told, is to be followed—not quite as hastily, we suspect—by all his Radical associates, whose watchword is the dissolution of the Assembly, and the convocation of a real Constituante. Such a resignation en masse might, under the circumstances, easily be equivalent to an "appeal to the street." It cannot be surprising, therefore, to see Assi, Ferré, and other Commune leaders, now on trial before the courts-martial of Versailles, hurl defiance at their prosecutors—who, by the bye, have proved themselves masters in producing impressions favorable to their enemies. Still less can the hesitation of the Germans in evacuating the forts of Paris be surprising. Pouyer-Quertier, however, does his best to pay them off.

The anti-infallibility movement among the Catholics of Germany and Austria continues unabated, meeting with encouragement on the part of more than one government. In Bavaria, an almost entire reorganization of the cabinet has taken place, which leaves the former premier, Bray, a friend of the Ultramontanes, out, and their opponent, the Minister of Instruction, Lutz, in. The often-repeated reports of Chancellor Beust's position in Austria becoming shaken and untenable are now contradicted more firmly than ever—though the Cisleithan cabinet, under Hohenwart, seems actually to have completed its arrangements with the Czechs, "Young" and "Old"—that is, radical and feudal—preparatory to a modification in their favor, by constitutional measures, of the constitution of the western division of Austro-Hungary, while the Chancellor is busy bringing about an entente cordiale with the German Empire, the terror and abomination of the Czechs and their Slavic brethren. That the basis of such an entente between the empires of William and Francis Joseph has lately been laid at Wels, or Ischl, or elsewhere, and is soon to be cemented by a meeting of the two emperors at Salzburg, is now confidently asserted by authoritative organs in the dominions of both; and Italy is stated to be "the third one in the union." This triple alliance, if really brought about, would be more than a match for a possible Franco-Russian alliance; it would dictate on the Lower Danube, secure the predominance of the Germans and Magyars on the upper banks of that river, seal the doom of the Pope's tempora power, and frustrate alike all attempts at Panslavism and Panlatinism. But it is too early to indulge in speculations on a fact which, after all, may exist only in the brains of correspondents and editors erroneously supposing themselves to be "well-informed."

BUTLER'S "FIRST GUN."

We do not like Benjamin Franklin Butler, as every reader of this paper knows, but we confess that we have read his speech at Springfield on Friday last with a good deal of enjoyment. He said hardly anything that we could wish unsaid, or which did not in some way, to our humble apprehension, further the design of Providence in creating him and letting him live. We were for a long time puzzled as to what that design might be, but it has of late become, we think, tolerably clear. The use of him we take to be the thorough and perspicuous exposure of the falsity and mischief of the doctrine which has been for some years growing in this country, and is now held by large numbers of people, some of whom are honest and some of whom only try to believe themselves to be honest, that not only, as Plato taught, are there certain abstractions called The Good and The True, but that these abstractions may safely and properly be pursued and worshipped, in state affairs at least, altogether apart from human character and conduct. That is, while believing that honesty is a good thing, they decline to treat any man as a knave; and, while acknowledging the value of truth, they decline to treat any man as a liar. The result is, that while in no age were these virtues so much talked about or admired, in no age did knaves and liars not only suffer so little inconvenience, but enjoy so much confidence and consideration. They have abounded in all times, but it is only in our time that places of trust, profit, and dignity are absolutely thrust upon them, and this not by their fellows, but by saints both of the Christian and Humanitarian churches, who go to the polls with upturned eyes and crossed hands, and have difficulty in keeping their marrow from freezing at the sight of the support given by the poor Irish to Hall and Connolly and Tweed. Butler is reported to have said last winter to that valuable public woman, Mrs. Victoria C. Woodhull, that she must not mind the unkind things said of her by the newspapers; that "he himself had never enjoyed real happiness till he lost his character." Now, whether it be true or not that Butler said this, we have no doubt that if he had said it he would have told the truth. As long as society believed him to be honest, he doubtless made some effort to keep up an appearance of honesty, and found it very irksome. As soon as his real character crept out, and society ceased to expect anything from him but ingenious and impudent rascality, he not only regained his liberty, but he found that, to a man of his aims and views of life, a good character is really of no use, or, in other words, that he got all he wanted in this life just as readily without it as with it. Men of the Butler and Fisk type, as we have more than once pointed out, do not care for the good opinion of their neighbors, as an end; if they value it at all, it is as a means. If they find that they get what they desire without it, they would far rather forego it, for it imposes restraints and responsibilities. What such men seek in life is money and power, office and physical pleasure; and if they can only get these things through a good character, they will play the hypocrite; but if they can get them without a good character, they will joyously strip it off. It is this peculiarity of theirs which makes newspaper denunciations of them so ludicrous and useless when not followed by other penalties. If you took from Fisk his railroad, his boats, his women, and his champagne, he would probably repent heartily; if you took from Butler all his ill-gotten gains, and his seat in Congress, and his other civic honors, he would, perhaps, doubt the wisdom of being a rascal. As it is, no doubt of it ever crosses his mind.

We believe there is no man who knows Butler who thinks him to be honest, who would believe him on his word, or his oath, or trust him in a transaction in which good faith was a necessary ingredient. There has been no such man for many a year. To many persons, the prevalence of such an opinion about them would be a source of discomfort. Butler is simply amused by it; first, because he doubts in his heart of hearts whether anybody is honest; and, secondly, because all he has ever asked of decent people they have given him, his reputation to the contrary notwithstanding.

Of late—within the last year—the leading Republican papers have begun to denounce him. During the three years previous, that is, during the three years that had elapsed after he had emerged from the discreditable seclusion which followed his removal from his command, and appeared in the political arena, they spoke of him almost invariably with great respect; although the editors would, to a man, assure you privately that he was a great scoundrel, and although nearly all those who had to do with him in the army reported him to be a cruel and insolent pretender, trying to play a soldier's part in the field with the nature, arts, and talents of a police detective. The reason of this adulation, we were constantly told, was gratitude to him for the services rendered in the war—those services consisting in the march of a brigade through one disaffected city, and the stern, severe, and thoroughly corrupt government of another one, and having been rendered in a war which had been glorified by a thousand displays of high military genius, sanctified by the death of tens of thousands of honest men, and waged for the express purpose of preventing selfish and unprincipled rascals from ruling the earth. To do the newspapers justice, it must be said that they were not alone in this mode of dealing with him. The leading men of the Republican party, especially of that portion of the party which prides itself on applying morals to politics, were just as earnest in their worship of the unclean idol as the press. They did not, and, indeed, could not, deny the badness of Butler's character; but, when he presented himself for a seat in Congress, supported him on the ground that he would probably prove "useful." When he had given a fair specimen of the kind of service he was likely to render, and when, after his attack on the national credit in 1867, an attempt was made to oust him, the saints of the party almost unanimously refused to countenance it. To be sure, it was the benighted shoemakers and fishermen of the Essex District who elected him, but the party "moralists" and philanthropists stood by silent or applauding.

His career in Congress has been what everybody who believes there is any connection between morals and politics might have expected. In parliamentary tactics he has been tricky, deceitful, and violent. His attempts at legislation have carried people's minds back to the dark ages, or over to the kingdom of Dahomey; for Butler, to his other defects, adds one which men of his moral stamp do not always display—namely, gross ignorance. He has contributed a great deal of virulence to the debates, and his relations with his brother members are of a kind, in many instances, unparalleled in their meanness and degradation; and, finally, he devoted a portion of his leisure at the close of the last session to trying to plunge the country into a bloody war—a slight tribute, we suppose, to the Boston peace men who supported him. All this was, as we have said, what was à priori to be expected of a man of his antecedents, and it has had the effect of opening people's eyes and loosening their tongues. The newspapers at last begin to speak out their minds about him freely, and "moral" and religious people begin, though slowly and unwillingly, to acknowledge that persons like Butler cannot be converted into instruments of righteousness. In short, there are signs that what ought to have been done three years ago—the reprobation of him by all that is best in the Republican party—is now about to come to pass. It is curious to witness, however, the way in which the stupid audacity of the criminal and the dexterity of the Tombs lawyer are mingled in the speech at Springfield. His labored recital of the mark of confidence bestowed on him by "the great party," the chairmanship of the Committee on Reconstruction, the "management" of the Impeachment trial, and so on, were excellent answers to the denunciations of some of the party organs. As Mr. George Ticknor Curtis says of Judge Barnard, if the man is a knave, how came his fellow-citizens to put him in these posts? On the other hand, the deliberate invention of a malignant falsehood about General Hawley, with the view of getting it circulated before the victim could overtake it, and with the well-grounded hope that many people would believe that there must be some ground for it, or else the worthy "Manager," "the Apostle John of Salvation by Impeachment," would not thus publicly produce it, was in all respects the device of the lowest class of criminal lawyers. General Hawley's indignation over the equanimity with which the inventor bore being informed that he was a "liar and a blackguard" would be amusing if the Reverend Doctor Marvin—we believe it was he—a "minister of the Gospel" and a temperance apostle, had not risen up in Boston, the other day, to advocate the election of "the liar and blackguard" to the governorship of Massachusetts, because he would make Boston "too hot for the rum-sellers." We are happy to be able to inform the Reverend Doctor that there is no evil in this world which it is in the power of scoundrels to extirpate without doing counterbalancing mischief. Providence sometimes seems to use base instruments to accomplish great ends, but seems only. He always lets the scoundrels sow the seeds of other and far greater evils than those they appear to remove. This arrangement may seem injudicious to some temperance men, but they cannot modify it.

THE NEW PAPACY.

The attributes of which Papacy has just been deprived were called its temporalia in the Middle Ages—a low Latin term, which, in classical Latinity, would have meant "perishable," but which was intended to imply the reverse, and to mean something altogether different, of which neither perishableness nor imperishableness need be predicated. When Philip le Bel wrote to Boniface VIII.: Sciat tua maxima Fatuitas, nos in temporalibus nemini subesse, he did not mean to say (what would have been no untruth) that French royalty was a fleeting daughter of time, but he referred to the dry question of clerical taxation. Since then, however, fate has interpreted the term more literally, as though its inventors had been logical against their wish and will, and the old word-oracle has, as far as it went, fulfilled itself.

How far then did it go? and what was the real extent, what were the real limitations, of the power called the "temporal" power of the Pope? The hand which broke the chains of the murderer Pariselli in 1852, and which immured political sinners in the dungeons of Perugia until 1860, is, if not withered, disarmed. It may still bless and baptize Jewish children, but it can no longer kidnap them. By thus enumerating the things which the Pope could do until 1870, and which he cannot do now, we might easily arrive at a proper definition of the so-called temporal power. But we should also discover that the two powers wielded by the Pope, having grown up together, have ended by growing together in such a manner that it is impossible to foretell whether the death of either twin will not endanger the health and life of the other. This is, in fact, what Catholics dread, and this is what Protestants would like to hope, if their own notions on the subject did not prevent them. They think, and are fond of thinking, that the spiritual power of any church is to its temporal power as the soul is to the body; and, as the soul not only survives the body, but commences a higher and purer existence when freed from worldly cravings and physical sufferings, so even the Roman Catholic Church will reappear in its true celestial garb, when freed from the only obstacle to its transfiguration—its temporalities. This is a kind and disinterested view of the matter, which honors those who take it, and which looks as if it ought to be the right view, but which (we need not say unfortunately) is utterly and thoroughly false.

The Roman Catholics were perfectly right in clinging to their temporal power with such desperate tenacity, and in saying "avaunt" to the Son of Man who tempted them with "other-world" kingdoms. We cannot but admire the sagacity of their instincts, which prompted them to act as if they knew how indissolubly the "spirit" of their church was wedded to its temporalities—to that part, at least, of its temporalities which we may call its economic interests, and which ought to be distinguished from its political interests. These two are separable things: they are to each other as movable property is to real estate. And as a man may lose his house and his field, or (according to the socialists) even his right to any kind of landed property, without ceasing to be a rich man; so the Roman Church may lose (as it has lost) its political power without ceasing to be a financial power. Of course, movable property is less tangible than brick and mortar. There is something abstract in notes, and cheques, and paper-money; nay, even gold is nothing but a promissory symbol of earthly goods. But who would call these things spiritual for that? Tetzel, the indulgence hawker of the sixteenth century, had nothing to do with what we are wont to call the temporal power, the whole transaction (which was one of the most profitable on record in financial history) being of a strictly ecclesiastical nature, and carried on upon the extra-political and ever-neutral ground of the confessional. Yet who would have the hardihood to qualify the power which Tetzel served, and in whose name he acted, as a spiritual power?

The truth is, the old antithesis of spiritual and temporal is neither grammatically nor empirically correct, and, though good enough for the Middle Ages, ought not to have remained so long unchallenged by modern criticism. Spirit and time have no relation whatever to each other. They are neither equals, nor opposites, nor correlatives. The power of the Roman Church is—in quality if not in degree—as temporal and as earthly now as it was before the 20th September, 1870. To talk of it as if the occupation and annexation of Rome by the Italians had sublimated it into a state of seraphic spiritualism is sheer nonsense. Those who rejoice over the change as implying the regeneration of the Roman Church, commit an error of judgment; while those who lament the change err both intellectually and morally, since the thing lamented has not taken place, and ought not to be lamented if it had taken place. To avoid all further confusion and looseness of expression, we should substitute the terms ecclesiastical and political for "spiritual" and "temporal," which would bring us to the perfectly intelligible antithesis of church and state. Both church and state are temporal institutions, and both may one day become spiritual institutions. Each has its doctrinal, each its economic aspect. Even the most advanced Protestant congregations are so far removed from the old Ebionitic spirit of Christianity, that the idea of an "invisible church" could hardly be grasped by them. And if this is true of Protestant churches, what shall we say of that church which the Italians have called the santa bottega, or "holy shop"? Even if it were deprived of all its stock, and all its cash, we are at a loss to see how it could ever be "reduced" to a spiritual power, its very doctrines being materialistic and mercenary.

We may say, therefore, that the Papacy has ceased to exist as a political power without having yet lost its temporal power, and that it continues to exist as an ecclesiastical power without having any chance of staying or hiding the decline of its spiritual power. Its wealth is undiminished, and, surely, the acceptance of offerings is less troublesome and less costly than the gathering of taxes and the levying of duties. Its ecclesiastical authority is likewise unimpaired, and it is pleasanter to be coaxed and pampered by repentant enemies and pitying friends than to enforce respect by spies, policemen, inquisitors, and jailers.

If people would take the trouble of making these distinctions and bearing them constantly in mind, they would be better judges of the importance or irrelevancy of certain events which seem to have received an undue share of public attention of late. They would, above all, be able to see that (whatever may have to be done intellectually by the spread of education) as long as there are concordats the Papacy of 1871 must be treated as a political power, and combated (if it is to be combated at all) with political weapons, such as the abolition of concordats and the decatholicizing of the Roman Church through the establishment of national churches. If the religious agitation in Southern Germany could ever lead to such a result, it would require no further justification. But Germany being more Protestant than Catholic, such a would-be-national German Church would be only a provincial sect after all, at most a Bavarian state church, but could never become to Germany what the Gallican Church is to France or the Anglican Church is to England. And this being so, we cannot see the utility and opportuneness, much less the importance, of Canon Döllinger's cheap triumphs over the doctrine of Papal infallibility. The Italians look upon this new doctrine as upon "a farce" which could not be seriously discussed or confuted, and from this point of view the whole "religious movement of Bavaria" looks like a pitiable waste of German earnestness. The intense interest taken in it by the public is not unlike the interest which the same public has taken in the Tichborne trial, one of the most transparent and least interesting cases on record. A thing may be called interesting when it taxes our intellect. If it merely tickles our torpid imagination or fills the vacuum of our ennui, it may be called amusing or sensational, but cannot be more to us. A man whose greatest or whose only known merit consists in not believing in the bloody miracle of San Gennaro, or the genuineness of the Santa Casa of Loretto, or in the Immaculate Conception of 1859, or in the many winking, weeping, and frowning Madonnas of Roman sanctuaries—such a man would still have to show cause why he should not be considered as a very ordinary person. Why should he become the hero of the day? And what difference is there between the credibleness and rationalness of any of these wonders and the credibleness and rationalness of Papal infallibility? What little difference there may be is all in favor of the latter.

Canon Döllinger professes strict allegiance to the Roman Church, so that we have no right whatever to suppose that he does not believe in winking Madonnas. We must be small, indeed, if such a man be great among us. And we should be wanting in self-respect if we were ready to admit that a man who has nothing greater to boast of than his disbelief in Papal infallibility could be a leader of men in this our nineteenth century. He is a straggler rather than a leader on our march—and a straggler being worth more than a deserter, he ought to be encouraged by all—but to call him "the Luther of the nineteenth century" is preposterous. The nineteenth century, having outgrown the first Luther, cannot possibly want a second; and if it did, Canon Döllinger would not be the man required. Luther was a born leader of men, having a bold, defiant, heroic spirit, who dared to burn a Papal bull amidst a bigoted crowd, to nail a long string of heretic theses to the church door, to throw off his monk's frock, and to break openly and thoroughly with a past with which he knew there could be no compromise. It would be cruel to Canon Döllinger to carry the comparison any further. Whatever may be his merits (and they need not be denied), he certainly is not the man to break with any past; and this, no doubt, the Oxford professors implied when they sent him their diploma complimenting him on the services he was rendering to the cause of "historic truth." What is "historic truth"? If we understand the Oxonian phrase rightly, Galileo could not have become doctor of civil laws in Oxford, the "historic truth" being all on the side of those who applied the screw to his thumbs. Partiality for historic continuity is a laudable and useful sentiment, which, when applied to law and politics, may lead to national greatness, but which can work no good whatever in the intellectual world, where old husks must be broken and thrown away when the seed swells within, and where it would be as useless as the wheat found in the mummies was useless to the deceased Egyptians.

The Italians nod assent to Döllinger, though rarely without giving him to understand that he should either not have stirred at all, or gone a little further. They talk like people who trust that the world will in due time outgrow all follies and errors, who think that there are things too elementary to be discussed or attacked; altogether, they appear more worthy of the Oxonian honors than the Bavarian professor, their attitude towards the Pope being far more "historic" than that of the latter. Having never taken much notice of the Pope's spiritual power, and having, by a happy coup de main, destroyed his political existence, they treat the surviving ecclesiastical power with great gentleness and consideration, stroking it rather than striking it, not because they hope ever to tame or to reconcile the priest, but because it is Italian nature not to strike. The Pope has had a real surfeit of "guarantees" from the Italian Government, including the abolition of the royal exequatur and placet, which hitherto served, as they still serve in other countries, to prevent the promulgation of mutinous pastorals and encyclicals, and the nomination of disloyal bishops. When we consider that apostolic letters may be published in Florence which could not even be read from the pulpit in Paris without the permission of the Government, and that the Pope may send any arch-Jesuit as archbishop to Florence, but can give only his approval and his investiture to such French bishops as M. Thiers may choose to appoint, the tender anxiety evinced by M. Thiers's countrymen for Papal spiritual independence would be ludicrous if it were not provoking. If the Italians could only be provoked, the parts might easily be inverted: Italy might become the Pope's protector, and France, when using her Gallican rights, might be told once or twice a week "que cela trouble les consciences." Perhaps Italy would not use such a canting phrase; but her protection of the ecclesiastic Papacy would be more sincere and more impartial than French protection ever was. In French eyes, Papal independence means exclusive dependence upon France, just as, according to M. Thiers, European equilibrium means the preponderance of France.

Italian politicians have ceased to make political capital of the Roman question. If the priests and clericals of other countries try to do so now, they have but little chance of success. At all events, their success will chiefly depend on the stupidity of their adversaries. We will not say that the belief in "liberal Catholicism" and in "historic truth" is an absolute sign of stupidity, but it can certainly be considered as a sign of that selfish laziness of the intellect which would like to eat the pudding and to have it. Germany has tried her hand at this kind of "national Catholicism." But Ronge's and Czerski's "German-Catholic" Church melted away in a couple of years without leaving the slightest trace of its existence behind it. Why should the Germans try again? Should they really wish to reform the Roman Church, they must begin by leaving it in the old blunt Lutheran way. And should some Bavarians and Austrians wish to found a new church for themselves, let us hope that they will be honest and accurate enough not to call it either German or Catholic.

Notes.

"A HAND-BOOK of Colorado," containing a directory of places and routes, statistics of population, and facts about climate, colonization, mining, farming, stock-raising; together with a business index, railroad and stage guide, etc., etc., will be published immediately in Denver, by Mr. J. A. Blake. The advance sheets promise a work creditable at least to the printers of that distant territory; and we presume it will be intelligently compiled.——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. will publish the "Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, comprising portions of his Diary from 1795 to 1848," edited by Hon. Charles Francis Adams. The work will fill five or six octavo volumes, uniform in size and style with the papers of John Adams already published, and is designed to "serve as a substitute for a biography at one time contemplated." "The Diary begins with Mr. Adams's appointment by President Washington as Minister to the States of Holland, in 1795, and includes sixteen years of his diplomatic service in that country, in Prussia, Russia, and Great Britain, and in the negotiation of the Treaty of Ghent. It likewise embraces the whole of his later labors in posts of the highest responsibility at home, down to the termination of his career in the hall of Congress, on the 22d of February, 1848." Subscribers to the "Memoirs" will obtain it at five dollars a volume; all others, at six.

—Mr. Charles Scribner, of this city, publisher and bookseller, died at Lucerne, Switzerland, on Saturday last, the 26th of August, in his fifty-first year. He was educated at Princeton College, and, after his graduation, studied the law, and became a member of the bar of this State. He was, however, not a strong man physically, and was obliged to relinquish his chosen profession on account of the confinement which it compels. Abandoning it, therefore, in 1846, Mr. Scribner entered into partnership with another gentleman, the firm being thenceforth known as Baker & Scribner, and established himself in the business of bookselling and publishing. In 1857, Mr. Scribner's first partner being now seven years dead, he formed a new partnership with Mr. Charles Welford, and the new firm, successful like the old, by-and-by purchased the importing business of Messrs. Bangs, Merwin & Co. Of the two kinds of knowledge about books—knowledge of the outside and of the inside, bibliography and literature—Mr. Welford probably had more at once than anybody else in America, and his ability, joined to that of Mr. Scribner, who had, in a high degree, that sixth sense for a publisher, the sense of what would be palatable and profitable to his public — in this case to a large portion of the better half of the reading public — procured for the house which they founded a very extensive clientage both among readers of American books and buyers of English. It is proof of Mr. Scribner's sagacity as a publisher of books to please very many purchasers, that his imprint is on the works of Doctor Holland and "Ik Marvel;" that a favorite designer of his was Mr. Hennessy; and that his monthly magazine, but lately established, already surpasses in circulation almost every one of its older competitors for favor, and may probably be set down as second in this respect to Harper's Monthly alone. Very marked, too, was the success of Mr. Scribner and his associates as a publisher of text-books for schools—Guyot's excellent works on geography, and many other similar publications, owing much of their wide sale to his zealous energy. Concerning the house of Scribner, Welford & Co—which has been the style of the importing house, so to call it, as distinguished from the American publishing house of Charles Scribner & Co.—it is enough to say that it was doubtless the largest and (the house of Messrs. Little, Brown & Co., of Boston, not being forgotten) the best, all things considered, which this country has to show. Mr. Scribner was a man much beloved by an unusually large number of friends, and well liked and respected by all his many acquaintances, and it may be doubted if he had an enemy in the world. He was sympathetic, kind-hearted, and good-natured, and his natural disposition he cultivated rather than repressed in the busy course of his daily life. The younger men of his own profession could go to him for advice, and always found in him, not a wary competitor, but a frank and friendly counsellor; and in every relation of life he was a good man. The immediate cause of his death was an attack of typhoid fever. He had been ill, however, for some years, and was in Switzerland seeking health. He thought he had found it, and "his last letters show that his mind was turning with all its old activity to business." He died so much too soon that perhaps it is not improper to let his loss remind us that it is too late to take rest after sickness has come; that well men must give themselves rest.

—A visit from a distinguished Frenchman for the exploration of our society and institutions is not so frequent an occurrence as to make it superfluous to note the recent arrival in America of Athanase Coquerel, the younger. The father, who died a few years ago, long maintained one of the brightest and purest reputations in France, and was well known to such of our countrymen as go to church even in Paris, and indeed to many not of that class, for he was in his later years as eminent as a patriot as he always was as a preacher. The son is thought by good judges very much to surpass the father in pulpit oratory, and in genius every way. His studies have been carried into literature, history, and art, on any of which topics, as upon religion, he may be expected to be a most effective speaker; and we can hardly imagine a greater pleasure for the eloquence-loving American than to hear him. It is, as we learn, a part of M. Coquerel's plan to make public addresses, which, fortunately for most of us, he is able to do in English. For this purpose, however, as well as for his other objects, he should prolong his stay in this country beyond the time which is understood to be its limit, November. From June to October, the American gives himself a rest from the higher emotions. Philanthropists and even politicians know that not much can be done with him till the frost has set in. With the coming of cold he becomes serious, and there is perhaps nowhere so intent a listener to a man that has something to say. It is not inappropriate to mention that in politics M. Coquerel is a Republican of the type of his and our friend Laboulaye.

—The photographer on the battle-field has ceased to be a novelty, but that does not prevent the artist who accompanied the Corean expedition from being admirable of his kind. He has sent to the State Department, along with the official despatches in regard to the late engagements, a bound volume of large-sized views which are not only remarkable for their execution but for the manner in which they have, as it were, taken history on the wing. Some of them, the majority in fact, were not beyond the range of ordinary photography—views of the fleet at anchor; of Corean junks, sailors, and officials; of interviews on the fleet; of the Corean camp and magazine; and of the Corean prisoners. The views of the forts, however, are peculiarly the achievement of that branch of the service which may come to be recognized as Flying Photography. Those of the interior of Fort McKee after the capture "show the dead Coreans where they fell, the camera in some instances depicting the very smoke of the ruin, which had not dissipated when the enterprising photographer followed on the heels of the enemy." One feels like suggesting that a few copies of these prints transmitted to the Corean authorities would have served a more useful purpose than Minister Low's formal and regular, but necessarily futile, communications in writing.

—The theatre-goer is to have a very good chance of amusement in New York this winter. Whether The Great American Play is to precede, in the regular historical order, The Great American Novel, is yet to be seen; but we notice that at the Fifth Avenue there is to appear a comedy, by Mr. Daly, called "Divorce," which certainly is a title not unattractive nor distinctively un-American. With the companies at Wallack's Theatre and the Fifth Avenue, besides Mr. Fechter, Mr. Matthews, Mr. Sothern, Miss Cushman, Miss Janauschek, Wachtel, the Vienna troupe, and the Parepa-Rosa troupe, we shall certainly see some good acting. As for the plays, we have plenty of good plays in English, besides the French ones that are always on hand; but we are confident that the literary young man who shall come up to town with a good play in his carpet-bag, instead of a manuscript volume of desperate poems, need not go back with an empty pocket. It is not only a crying disgrace to have Jefferson's exquisite acting shown in that crudest of all plays, "Rip Van Winkle"; but it is a disgrace that Mr. Jefferson keenly feels, and would pay a good deal of money to any play-writer to avert. At Booth's Theatre we can see how easily the public taste, which in the case of "Rip Van Winkle" is corrupted by carelessness of dramatization, may be vitiated by gorgeous upholstery and ingenious machinery. To dazzle the eyes of the audience by real silks and satins, at so much a yard; indeed, to leave the audience capable of noticing that the actor is dressed with historical accuracy down to his shoe-lacings, while they forget to notice whether he bears the slightest resemblance in voice or manner to any human being, is much easier than it is for an actor to act in such a way that we forget to notice the color of his stockings. To a certain extent this is natural and right enough; but we shall always try to forget seeing the opera of "Fidelio" given at Boston, when, in the prison-scene, a shovelful of earth was dug out from the grave and rattled down upon the stage, amid the whispers of the audience, "It's real dirt"—which is something like what it indeed was. This at Boston; and in opera; and the opera "Fidelio." In getting a good play, the German plan of offering a prize would probably succeed no better here than it does there; still less, we may safely say, could we, like the ancient Greeks, let our magistrates decide upon the merits of the pieces to be acted during the winter. Give our Department of Public Works control of our theatrical amusements, and all next winter we shall be listening to a farce entitled "A Coroner's Inquisition," written by a certain A. O. Hall; rather than which, let us wait for the young man with the carpet-bag. Criticism may in time do something if it will concern itself less with the plays and more with the acting. The Fortnightly Review recently gave some translations by the Hon. Robert Lytton—which, by the bye, as Mr. Lytton's acquaintances might have apprehended, had already appeared in English, having been contributed by Mr. Tom Taylor to the first volume of the Victoria Magazine—from the letters of one Lichtenberg, now forgotten, in which that gentleman gives an account of Garrick's acting in a way that may well serve as a model for the dramatic critic. Not only for this are the extracts interesting, but also as giving us a definite idea of this great actor. He says:

"What gives to this man his astonishing ascendancy over our imagination, and his unrivalled command of our sympathies? Many things, no doubt. But much of it is probably due to his felicitous physical formation. There is in his physiognomy, his figure, and his gait, a peculiar distinction and charm which I have just now and then noticed in a few Frenchmen, but have never noticed in another Englishman. . . . . For instance, when he turns to salute any one, it is not only his head and shoulders, or arms and legs, that come into play, but all these, all together, and every other part of the man, that simultaneously and harmoniously contribute, each its special grace, to the most refined expression of a supreme courtesy, such as could not be surpassed by the greatest grand seigneur of the court of Louis XIV. There is no man in England who can make Garrick's bow. . . . Nothing in him is slipshod, slovenly, or slouching. No actor ever needed less elbow-room for effective gesture. . . . Amongst other actors he moves like a man among marionettes. His way of walking across the stage, of shrugging his shoulders, of crossing his arms, of cocking his hat, of putting it on and taking it off—in short, whatever he does is so easily and securely done that the man appears to be all right hand."

—In his account of Garrick's Hamlet, Lichtenberg says:

"Hamlet appears in a suit of mourning, the only one which is to be seen at court within a few months after the death of the late king. With him are Horatio and Marcellus; the two latter in uniform. Hamlet is walking up and down the stage, with his arms folded high over his chest, and his hat pulled down low over his eyes, like a man who is struggling with strong inward emotion. . . . . Hamlet is now in the far background of the stage, a little to the left. He has his back to the audience. At this moment Horatio starts, and points to the right, when the ghost suddenly becomes visible to us all. 'Look, my lord, it comes!' Horatio cries. Garrick, at these words, rapidly turns round, and, instantly confronted by the ghost, he staggers backward three or four paces. His knees knock together, his legs seem giving way beneath him. His hat falls to the ground. His two arms are stretched out before him horizontally—the right arm quite straight, and the right hand on a level with his head; the left arm slightly curved, and the hand lower. The fingers of both hands are spread wide. The mouth gapes open. In this entreating, deprecating attitude he remains for a while perfectly motionless; like a man suddenly petrified by the terror from which he is endeavoring to escape. His two friends, who are already familiarized with the apparition, support his sinking frame. His countenance expresses such intense horror that, long before he uttered a word, I was seized with a cold shuddering. . . . Then, at length, he speaks; not with the beginning, but at the end of a long respiration; and, in half-suffocated, tremulous accents, he exclaims faintly, 'Angels and ministers of grace defend us!'"

—So admirable and useful, and so difficult of access, is this description of really good acting that we make no apology to our readers for quoting more of it. Those of them who are to see "Hamlet" next winter will thank us:

"The ghost beckons Hamlet to follow him. Could you but have seen Garrick in the movement, when he endeavors to rid himself of the two friends who are holding him back! It is only mechanically and unconsciously that he goes on speaking and struggling with Horatio and Marcellus. All this while his eyes are intensely fixed upon the ghost, and his whole being is in the look of those eyes. At last, however, he loses patience with this friendly hindrance, which, till then, he has scarcely realized. He turns upon his two friends, shakes them off with impetuosity, and draws his sword upon them with a movement as flashingly rapid as his sudden perception of the impediment which they are placing in the way of his uncontrollable impulse. . . . They loose their hold upon the prince, who, with drawn sword pointed in the direction of the ghost, then mutters, 'Go on, I'll follow thee.' The ghost now recedes and slowly disappears. Hamlet, however, remains as it were transfixed upon the spot where he has last addressed the receding phantom; his sword still stretched before him, as though to put a certain distance between himself and the spectre in whose track he feels irresistibly urged forward. Then, just as the spectator loses sight of the ghost altogether, the immovable figure of the prince begins to follow it; slowly, hesitatingly, like a man who is jerked onward from within, and is feeling his way onward over dangerous ground. From time to time he halts; then again advances, creepingly, with laborious breath; his gaze still fixed upon the spot where the ghost was last seen; his hair dishevelled, until, at last, him also we slowly lose sight of behind the scenes."

With one more extract we close:

"In that admirable monologue, 'O that this too, too solid flesh would melt,' etc., he works out, if I may use a mathematical term, a whole series of small equations, which serve to bring the action of average human nature up to the highest degree of individualized intensity. Tears of righteous affliction for the loss of so beloved a father (whose unweeping widow is a wife again before her weeds are a year old); tears the most difficult of all to suppress, because, in such a struggle between conflicting duties, they are the only solace of an honest heart; tears restrained, yet ever starting from the bitter sources of a boundless resentment, overwhelm the utterance of Garrick when he exclaims, 'So excellent a king!' The last word of the sentence is submerged in a choking sob, inaudible, and yet visible in the inarticulate quiver of the lips, which immediately afterwards close convulsively, as though to break off too literal a translation of the secret grief, which thus vented might degenerate into unmanliness. 'So excellent a k . . .!' This revelation of unwept tears discovers to us simultaneously the heavy weight of a deep inward woe and the strength of the soul which is enduring it. At the close of the monologue, a just impatience mingles its tones with those of Hamlet's lamentation; but just as his uplifted arm falls like the stroke of a hatchet, to accentuate the climax of his scorn and indignation, the expected word which should accompany the action is, to the astonishment of the audience, not forthcoming. It fails altogether for an instant, re-emerging the instant after from the deepest depths of a profound emotion, all heavy and weak with the inward tears in which it has been plunged."

—"American and English periodicals," says O Novo Mundo, a Portuguese paper published in this city, whose continued existence is a hopeful sign of the times, "are full of notices of books and publications in all European languages except the Portuguese. Italian, Spanish, Hungarian, Modern Greek, and Russian works are noticed on a par with the English, German, and French; but not the Portuguese. Why is this? Can it be because the mind is less active in Portugal and Brazil than in Spain or in Modern Greece?" The editor thinks not. The reason why the foreign press is ignorant of the Portuguese literature is the apathy of Portuguese editors and authors. The latter, from the disbelief in the power of the press, attach no weight to its criticisms, and the former fail to assert for them the weight which they deserve to have. In Brazil, according to O Novo Mundo, it may be said, speaking generally, that there is no bibliographical criticism; what answers for it is discussion of the author rather than of his book, and not only is he thus cheated of a salutary corrective, but the public is prevented from forming a sound judgment of his work, and foreign periodicals have no source from which to ascertain its true features. The result is that, on the one hand, less attention is paid by these periodicals to Portuguese publications; and, on the other, a Portuguese book, when noticed at all, is more carefully studied and criticised in England, France, or Germany than in Portugal or Brazil. Admitting the justice of this reasoning, it cannot be denied, we think, that the geographical isolation of these two countries has much to do with their literary obscurity. Portugal, at least, is much more out of the current of European progress than Hungary or Modern Greece, while (and partly because) it is encompassed and shut off by a country which counts for almost nothing in European affairs. Of all the Latin nations, Portugal offers the least historical, political, or commercial inducement for acquiring its language, according to the common proficiency in which is naturally proportioned the amount of notice a foreign periodical can venture to give to its literature. With Brazil there is reason to hope that our relations will steadily become closer, and its language therefore more familiar; while the abolition of slavery, which seems at last begun in earnest, will be an important step towards independent opinion not only in politics, but in every field of thought and discussion.

—The last important discovery of prehistoric remains in Germany was made in the fall of 1866, when the "Schussenried Station," belonging to the first glacial epoch, was found. Last winter, a few archæologists became aware of the great importance of the Hohefels cave in the Aachthal, Würtemberg, long known to those who lived in the vicinity for its copious yield of bear-bones. This extensive and high-vaulted cavern lies at the base of a deep rock, towering some 125 feet above the Aach River, near Schelklingen, and was, probably at the commencement of the glacial epochs, the dwelling-place of a hunting tribe. Of the bones contained in it, by far the largest number belong to the cave-bear, the Alpine bear, and the reindeer; less numerous are the remains of the dwarf-ox and the urus, of a thick-headed horse, of the two-horned rhinoceros and its usual companion, the mammoth, of swine, foxes, polar foxes, otters, wolves, antelopes, cats; of the swan, goose, duck, heron, and snipe. Bones of the hare and lion were found only in a single instance. The presence of man was proved by a number of animal bones split lengthwise in order to take out the marrow, and by hand-wrought implements (pierced teeth, thin lamellæ of mammoth ivory, and splinters of flint of the rudest and most primitive shape). The conclusion is warranted that the Aachthal hunters flourished at a time when our so-called polar and tropical animals lived in close contact and contemporaneously, of course under a hotter climate than the Suabian hills now have; that these men possessed no tame domesticated animals; and that the terrible cave-bear was hunted by man—a fact of which we here get the first evidence. In Switzerland, a new lacustrine station has been discovered at Heimenlachen, near Berg. Among the fragments of vases and stone hatchets unearthed was the skull of a deer, whose horns had each nineteen branches, and measured four feet across.

—As one cannot know too much about his countrymen, we have made it a point from time to time to indicate the sources of information in regard to Alaska. With Mr. Whymper's and Mr. Dall's works at hand, indeed, the American reader need hardly resort to foreign works; yet perhaps these should not be neglected by one who wishes to be thoroughly informed. Mr. Dall, for instance, gives us a very full chapter on the aboriginal inhabitants of our new territory, but in order to be brief he had to omit many discussions of doubtful points. In Nos. 4 and 5-6 of Bastian and Hartmann's Zeitschrift für Ethnologie will be found the first of a series of articles by A. Erman, consisting of ethnographic observations and experience on the coasts of Behring's Sea, with a colored map showing the distribution of the tribes. Here one may learn who the Aleuts are and what their name signifies, and the same of the Koloshes, together with numerous facts in regard to the appearance and manners of these tribes. The writer shows that the name Aleut was bestowed by the Russians, and is absolutely without significance or etymological relation to their language or to that of the inhabitants of the Fox Islands. As for Kolosh, Mr. Erman differs from Mr. Dall, considering it a purely Russian word (from the verb to split), though they agree in connecting it with the practice of labrets, or lip-distension—a name, then, comparable to that of the Indians whom the Canadians have called Nez percés. Our author has also something to say about the slavery in vogue among the Koloshes, one of whose pleasant customs it is, or was, to kill a couple of their servile Kalgi at a sort of wake held in memory of any deceased person, the mourners' chattels and not the dead man's being levied upon for this sacrifice. Other characteristics of this people are not so unamiable—as that parents are too tender-hearted to train their children properly, and so put them in charge of their grandparents—and their mechanical proficiency is much more than respectable, as is shown in their manufactures of iron and copper. On this side, if on no other, they would appear to be not of Asiatic origin.

—Luther's famous words at the Diet of Worms—"Here I stand, etc."—seem likely to share the fate of the stories of Tell and Pocahontas, Wellington's "Up, guards, and at them!" and similar anecdotes and sayings. In the Historische Zeitschrift, Waltz shows that the earliest contemporary account, that of Conrad Pentinger, written only a day or two after the affair, says "Ym beschluss sprach er die wort, Got kum mir zu hilf." Luther's own account ended simply, "Gott helf mir, Amen, Amen." The form, "Ich kan nicht anderst, hie steh ich, Gott helff mir, Amen," came very early into circulation, but did not receive full currency until the publication of Luther's collected works, we believe, in 1546.

—The city authorities of Rome, having considered the necessities of the new capital, are about carrying out a plan of reconstruction which will ere long greatly transform and improve the city. Three elements have entered into the municipal problem—ancient Rome, the Rome of to-day, and the Rome of the future. To the former is resigned the seat of its grandest remains, the Aventine, Cœlian, and Palatine hills, on and about which the excavations will be carried on till all is revealed that can be; the result being a quarter unique in picturesqueness and historic interest, beside which Pompeii would seem tame and inconsiderable. The Rome of the hereafter is to be pitched on the high and wholesome ground of the Pincian, Quirinal, and Esquiline, where the government is already encamped and will by-and-by build for itself, and where the rich and the fashionable will also take up their residence. To connect this half of the city with that of the low ground, two broad avenues have been determined on, which will cross the city from east to west; and the Rome of to-day will perhaps be still further benefited by diverting the Tiber into the meadows behind St. Angelo—a change which would destroy the Ponte Elio, but would afford room for an entire new quarter, and, it cannot be doubted, a rich harvest of relics now concealed in the present bed of the river.

KAMTCHATKA.*

The effort of the Western Union Telegraph Company to build a line of telegraph up the western coast of America and down the eastern coast of Asia, through countries which are inhospitable, almost inaccessible, and utterly unexplored, was probably the nearest approach to an adventure of chivalry that we have had in these modern times. Sailing westward like Columbus, the Company's explorers sought a short cut from the new Indies to old Europe. The unexpected success of the Atlantic Cable put an end to the enterprise, but not before the goal had been substantially attained. The explorations in Alaska were conducted by Messrs. Whymper and Dall, both of whom have given us accounts of this region, while to Major Abasa, Mr. Kennan, and Mr. Mahood was committed the task of finding a route from Behring's Straits across Kamtchatka, and around the Okhotsk Sea, to the mouth of the Amoor River. Divided into small parties, and often alone with a few natives, they scaled mountains, rounded impassable cliffs on narrow ledges of ice, slept in the open air at a temperature of sixty degrees below zero, travelled on reindeer, snow-shoes, and dog-sledges, in all about 5,000 miles, nearly frozen with the extreme cold, and often on the verge of starvation; they successfully surveyed a practicable route, only to find after two years of hardship that the work into which they had thrown themselves with such energy and devotion was to be abandoned.

It is fortunate for us that Mr. Kennan was of this party, and has been able to tell us its story. Without affectation or pretension, he has written a book which is so true and lifelike that Sir Roderick Murchison calls it the first of recent books of travel, and to which Mr. Walton Grinnell, an excellent observer, who during the last year has travelled almost exactly the same route as that gone over by Mr. Kennan, says that he can add no word.

The author landed at Petropavlovsk, a small trading town at the southern end of Kamtchatka, in August, 1865, and went from there by land to Ghizhiga, at the head of the Okhotsk Sea, a journey of about 800 miles, reaching there only at the end of November. From here, in the middle of winter, he travelled 600 miles eastward, to the mouth of the Anadyr River, in search of some lost companions, and then back to Ghizhiga. Spending the summer at this place, he went again, in November, to Anadyrsk with succor to another starving party, then back, and finally, when, in the spring of 1867, the message came that the enterprise was abandoned, he started homeward through Siberia, and reached Moscow in January, 1868.

During the most of this time, Mr. Kennan was either alone or with a single companion, except natives, many of whom were said to be hostile, and whose language he was obliged to learn. He suffered very great privations, and was at times almost without the hope of returning alive. A cheerful, buoyant spirit, which we see reflected everywhere throughout his narrative, kept him up. This reflection of himself is one of the charms of the book. He does not conceal the fact that he suffered, and was at times in great straits, but he does not dwell on it, and rather presents to us always the bright side of the picture. The humors of the occasion seem to impress him much more strongly than the dangers. As illustration of this, take Mr. Kennan's description of his unsuccessful attempt to pass the Samanka range of mountains, or his account of his journey down the Anadyr River in search of his companions. In the little settlement of Anadyrsk, near the Arctic circle, Mr. Kennan vaguely heard of a small party of Americans who had landed near the straits, and, from lack of transportation, were compelled to winter there. Finding that there was evidently some truth in the story, and knowing that the party must be in want of provisions, if even yet alive, he resolved to rescue them, and, therefore, with his companion, Mr. Dodd, and twelve natives, set out over the snowy plain, not knowing whether the journey was of two or of five hundred miles, his only data being that it was down the river, and that somewhere there was a little hut buried in the snow-drift, with an iron stove-pipe sticking out of it. It was well for him that he did not fully realize the perils and difficulties of the expedition, and it was only after travelling for eleven days, more than 300 miles, when they were fifty miles from any wood, some of them already stupefied with a cold of fifty degrees below zero, that the party woke to the feeling that their own safety depended on their finding this little black pipe in the midst of a dreary, desolate, and apparently unbounded snowy waste. We leave it to Mr. Kennan to tell how, weary with a fruitless search, and on the verge of despair, they were about to adopt the last resource, and break up some of their sledges for firewood, when, by a mere accident, the hidden hut was found almost under their feet. The pathos of his story is too genuine to be mutilated by an abridgment.

But Mr. Kennan's book is much more than a narrative of personal adventure; it is a valuable contribution to science. The author tells us much about the physical geography and resources of this unknown Kamtchatka, and much about the languages, customs, and habits of the various tribes of Kamtchadals, Koraks, and Tchuktchis who dwell in it. Gifted with good powers of observation, and possessed of the fruits of considerable reading, he is able to tell what he saw in a pleasant way, which leaves the impression of accuracy, and to tell it briefly, giving us in a short compass what others would have spread into a bulky octavo.

Kamtchatka, as seen by Mr. Kennan, bears little resemblance to the barren, frozen region which rises up in our imagination at the mention of this name. The peninsula is chiefly of volcanic origin, and its great central range of mountains has still five or six volcanoes in a constant state of activity. The central and southern parts are broken up into fertile valleys and sequestered glens, and the scenery is everywhere majestic and picturesque. The climate is equable; rye, turnips, cabbages, and potatoes grow well as far north as lat. 58°, and in summer the vegetation everywhere has an almost tropical luxuriance. The only fruits are wild-cherries and some twenty different kinds of berries. Salmon and other fish are abundant, while in the plains and valleys there are numbers of reindeer, bears, wild sheep, and ibexes, and millions of ducks, geese, and swans. Cattle are kept by the natives in nearly all the settlements. Mr. Kennan says that he has "seen natives in the valley of the Kamtchatka as pleasantly situated, and enjoying as much comfort and almost as many luxuries, as nine-tenths of the settlers upon the frontiers of our Western States and Territories."

With the country north of the peninsula the case is very different, the only food of the inhabitants of the settlements during the long winters being dried fish, and reindeer bought from the wandering tribes of Koraks, who are a sort of special providence to the shiftless natives. Supplies are, indeed, occasionally sent out from Russia to the larger settlements, but these do not always arrive, or last for long, so that a town is sometimes abandoned, as was once the case with Aijan, for lack of food. Mr. Kennan and his companions were, naturally enough, astonished at the amount of comfort enjoyed by the Russians in these out-of-the-way coast settlements, and at the little luxuries they possessed in the shape of carpets, books, musical instruments, and pictures (in one case, a colored lithograph of General Dix being worshipped as a Russian saint). A Russian colony is, in fact, as nearly as possible the image of a Russian town. Difficult as it is to teach the Russian civilization, what he gets he holds, and his natural conservatism here stands him in good stead. You may go into the house of a Russian merchant in Eastern Siberia or Central Asia, and you will find furniture of the same pattern, arranged in the same way, as on banks of the Volga, with possibly a copy of the Yenisey or Tashkend News on the table, and you will be welcomed with a little glass of the same vodka or a bumper of the identical brand of champagne that you tasted on setting out from Moscow.

* "Tent Life in Siberia, and Adventures among the Koraks and other Tribes in Kamtchatka and Northern Asia. By George Kennan." With a map. New York: G. P. Putnam & Sons. 1871. 12mo. pp. 425.

In treating of the Koraks, the author describes their very curious marriage ceremony, which consists in the bridegroom chasing the bride through all the compartments (made by means of skin curtains) of the hut, impeded at every step by numerous old women, armed with willow-rods, who endeavor, by beating him and tripping him up, to keep him from catching his bride. Mr. Kennan is unable to explain the meaning of this custom, while Mr. A. S. Bickmore, in the American Journal of Science for May, 1868, in noticing it, says that the chastisement is intended to test the young man's ability to bear up against the ills of life. This can hardly be the case, for probably no custom among savages is ever purposely symbolical, but is a relic of something which had a meaning. This custom exactly corresponds to what is called the "love chase" among the Kirghizes of the Steppes of the Aral. There the bride, armed with a stout whip, is mounted on horseback, and, being given a fair start, is pursued by all whose wealth and courage entitle them to be her suitors. She may beat off any who approach her with all the violence she chooses to use, but is the prize of him who catches her. Both customs are additional evidence for the theorists who make primitive marriage to have consisted only in capture.

A POET REDIVIVUS.*

THE reader need not take alarm at the uncouth titles of these books, nor need he put them in the same category with most Eastern poems, to be read from a sense of duty rather than from any keen interest in their ornate and luscious imagery and their novel mise-en-scène. Verses that depend for their interest on the rarity of the bulbul and lotos in our variable climate, he will not find here, but something much more than that—rarer even than the bulbul—genuine poetry. The author touches a note as old as the human race—the wonder at the world. At the bottom of his utterance is the cry of man's heart desiring and seeking a solution of the universe, longing to see behind the veil which most mortals so contentedly leave untried. It expresses the unrest of one who seeks, in a word, to find out the meaning of life. Here is an example which will make this plainer than pages of description:

"Think, in this battered caravanserai,
Whose portals are alternate night and day,
How sultan after sultan with his pomp
Abode his destined hour and went his way.

They say the lion and the lizard keep
The courts where Jamshyd gloried and drank deep;
And Bahrám, that great hunter—the wild ass
Stamps o'er his head, and cannot break his sleep.

. . . . . .

For some we loved, the loveliest and the best
That from his vintage rolling time has prest,
Have drunk their cup a round or two before,
And one by one crept silently to rest.

. . . . . .

Were it not folly spider-like to spin
The thread of present life away to win—
What? for ourselves who know not if we shall Breathe out the very breath we now breathe in!"

This mournful poetry, so pathetic from the earnestness of the yearning and the impossibility of an answer, and so modern in its manner, was written at about the end of the eleventh century. Besides being a poet, Khayyam was an astronomer, and no contemptible one, for he reformed the calendar, establishing a computation of time which, according to Gibbon, as quoted by the anonymous author of the English version now before us in this second edition, "surpasses the Julian, and approaches the accuracy of the Gregorian style." That so rare a literary treasure should have remained hidden from Europeans for so long a time is indeed extraordinary, and no less so that its appearance should coincide with the doubt, enquiry, and pessimism so characteristic of the present day. Khayyam has been most fortunate, too, in finding a good translator. The English version closely retains the form of the original Persian, while, at the same time, this formal accuracy is not obtained at the expense of the poetical grace of the original. The version is anonymous. The first edition met with no success, and the copies were given away to tradespeople. In this way one chanced to meet the eye of a customer who found the verses in which his purchase was enveloped superior to the usual poetry of wrapping paper, and, finding out the translator, he persuaded him to publish this second edition. In spite of the merits of the translation and the rare beauty of the poetry, the work has not met with the success it deserved. The first mention made of it was in the literary notices of the North American Review, in a very interesting article. A brief notice appeared some months ago in Fraser's Magazine. This silence is the more remarkable when we consider the hot enthusiasm of various English critics over the discovery of Walt Whitmans and Joaquin Millers, who brought them nothing more than the charm, such as it was, of their novelty. The quatrains we can recommend most heartily to all lovers of poetry. Although many readers may be offended by what they will consider the irreverence and conviviality of the Persian, yet, if they will reflect, they will find it is something far different from the wanton, vainglorious flippancy of heedless or impudent materialism, or from the noisy laughter of the sensualists. It is but the expression of the sad despair of the baffled thinker. It is not that he will not, but that he cannot, listen to the ordinary explanations. There is no dangerous hilarity in such lines as these:

"Impotent pieces of the game he plays
Upon this chequer-board of nights and days;
Hither and thither moves, and checks and slays;
And one by one back in the closet lays.

. . . . . .

The moving finger writes and, having writ,
Moves on: nor all your piety and wit
Shall lure it back to cancel half a line,
Nor all your tears wash out a word of it.

And that inverted bowl we call the sky,
Whereunder crawling coop'd we live and die,
Lift not your hands to it for help—for it
As impotently rolls as you or I.

With earth's first clay they did the last man knead,
And there of the last harvest sowed the seed;
And the first morning of creation wrote
What the last dawn of reckoning shall read.

Yesterday this day's madness did prepare,
To-morrow's silence, triumph, or despair;
Drink! for you know not whence you came nor why,
Drink! for you know not why you go, nor where."

His moral is "Eat, drink, for to-morrow ye die," but it is not pleasure for its own sake he seeks, but some relief from his wonder at the great mystery of the world. It is a solemn, not to say almost a ghastly, merriment that possesses him, all the sadder from its incongruity with the language of joviality. His deep thoughts are perpetual skeletons at the banquet, they continually remind him of the emptiness of all things:

"And fear not lest existence closing your Account should lose, or know the type no more;
The eternal sáki from that bowl has poured
Millions of bubbles like us and will pour.

When you and I behind the veil are past,
Oh! but the long, long while the world shall last,
Which of our coming and departure heeds
As much as ocean of a pebble cast.

One moment in annihilation's waste,
One moment of the well of life to taste—
The stars are setting, and the caravan
Draws to the dawn of nothing—oh! make haste.

Why, if the soul can fling the dust aside,
And naked on the air of heaven ride,
Is't not a shame—is't not a shame for him
So long in this clay suburb to abide?

But that is but a tent, wherein may rest
A sultan, to the realm of death addrest;
The sultan rises, and the dark Ferrásh
Strikes, and prepares it for another guest."

The French translation of M. Nicolas is a very handsome book, with the original Persian text on one side, and the literal unmetrical translation upon the other. It contains, in all, four hundred and sixty-four quatrains, of which the English version gives us only one hundred and ten. Three or four have been rather coldly translated by Mr. Emerson in the end of his "May Day." One finds in the literal translation many more of the wine-singing verses than in the English version; many of the quatrains being of rare beauty. For instance: "When my soul and thine shall have departed, they will place a heap of bricks upon thy tomb and mine. Then to cover the tombs of others with other bricks our dust shall be thrown into the mold of the brickmaker." "This jar was once like me, a loving, unhappy being—it sighed after the tresses of some young beauty; this handle you see fastened to its side was an arm lovingly passed around some fair one's neck." It is worth while observing that M. Nicolas holds the convivial verses to be mystical and full of deep religious sentiment, in which case it must be hard for Persians to distinguish between their hymns and their drinking songs. In closing, we will give the last few verses of the English translation, and let them speak for themselves:

* "The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyam." London: B. Quaritch. 1868.
'Les Quatrains de Khèyam, traduits du Persan par J. B. Nicolas." Paris: Imprimerie Impériale. 1867.

"Yet ah! that spring should vanish with the rose!
That youth's sweet-scented manuscript should close.
The nightingale that in the branches sang,
Ah! whence and whither flown again, who knows?

Would but the desert of the fountain yield
One glimpse—if dimly, yet indeed revealed,
Toward which the fainting traveller might spring,
As springs the trampled herbage of the field!

Oh! if the world were but to re-create,
That we might catch, ere closed, the book of fate,
And make the writer on a fairer leaf
Inscribe our names, or quite obliterate!

Better, oh! better, cancel from the scroll
Of universe one luckless human soul,
Than drop by drop enlarge the flood that rolls
Hoarser with anguish as the ages roll.

Ah love! could you and I with fate conspire
To grasp this sorry scheme of thing entire,
Would not we shatter it to bits—and then
Remould it nearer to the heart's desire!

But see, the rising moon of heaven again
Looks for us, sweetheart, through the quivering plane
How oft hereafter rising will she look
Among those leaves for one of us in vain!

The English translator, who seems to be of a genius akin to that of Khayyam, deserves very high praise for the vigor and sincerity with which he has done his work. He may be held to have added one more to the roll of English poets. And the new-comer, if not such as to attain popularity, and to be received warmly by the persons who make the public of the fashionable poets, will surely find his way into the inner circles of lovers of poetry, and will be there respected and admired after generations of our skilful makers of poems shall have fleeted away. In fact, the public of this sad singer, who was making his quatrains while William and Harold were fighting, is of the kind that only becomes large by lapse of generations, and is never anything but small at any one time.

THE MAGAZINES FOR SEPTEMBER.

At least one department of literature, our school-book history of the United States, we Americans have a national interest in improving as soon as we can. It is not too much to say that it needs to be rewritten. As it stands at present, the principal design of each writer of it would appear to be to present American youths with his plaster cast of some one's else ideal head, in plaster, of the Father of his Country, all the life being taken out of Washington to fit him for service as a model, and nearly all the likeness. Accompanying this each gives a figure of George the Third as a "tyrant"; another of Benedict Arnold; another of Israel Putnam and the wolf, and a formless narrative of events which is not full, nor exact, nor anything like impartial, nor in the least philosophical, and which is much more successful as ministering to the national vanity than as history—as giving a clear account of the American colonial system, that apprenticeship to liberty; of the connection of the colonies with Europe; of the true characters—not the dress-parade characters as "patriots," "warriors," and the like—and true careers of the founders of the United States, and of their fathers before them who made their work possible; of the nature of the government founded, and of those—from town meeting and parish meeting to Confederation—which it displaced or crowned; of its working since; of its prospects; of its real advantages and its real dangers. The case doubtless grows better, and future rudimentary text-books in history will be less and less likely to present the eagle brand of American history, and more and more likely to give that view of it which shows why we have a right to be well content with the work which has been done here, and to have faith in the work that is doing. The truth is always best. For instance, as bearing on the question whether we are on our way to the dogs, it can do the young student no harm to learn that the supply of heroes and saints seems to be, on the whole, increasing rather than diminishing; that they had plenty of peculators and shoddy-makers in Revolutionary times as well as more recently; that Wayne and Gates and Greene were only men, as Thomas was, who fought but a while ago, and Farragut, and many thousand more whose virtues we may take courage to emulate, and whose honor we should take care not to lessen by deluding and ill-considered eulogy bestowed on other times and men. This and similar lines of thought may very well be suggested by an article in the Catholic World, entitled "America's Obligations to France"; but we do not know that its writer, suggesting them, does very much to enforce them. So far as concerns acknowledgments in print we have not been very culpably remiss. We do after all confess in all the books that had it not been for French aid we should not have brought the war to an end when we did, and we praise Lafayette and De Grasse and Rochambeau, without whom we admit we should not have compelled the surrender at Yorktown; and more than this we can hardly be expected to do. Compare with our behavior that of the Spaniards, for example, not a man, woman, or child of whom will admit that they and the Maid of Saragossa found the assistance of the English of any value whatever in driving the French out of Spain. We do better than that at least; though of course it may be doubted if we are sufficiently eager to insist upon our indebtedness, and if we estimate it exactly. As usual in such cases, complete justice in pointing out the full extent of obligation is to be expected from third parties rather than from the parties concerned. And had we been as chary of our acknowledgments as the writer in the Catholic World thinks us, it would nevertheless be unnecessary to believe, as he apparently is inclined, that our forefathers could not quite make up their minds to be grateful to allies, however effective, who went to mass. We suppose that he makes far too little account of the facts that the American colonists were in nearly all their habits of thought and nearly all their opinions Englishmen, with some contempt and much dislike of Frenchmen, and some hatred and fear of France; that they were Englishmen in an America where they had often had to meet in the field the Frenchman allied with the detested Indian; that they knew or thought they knew that France lent us assistance not as a free gift of love, but because our success would be a vast injury to Great Britain; finally, we suppose that even had it been true, as our author maintains, that the French people took our part not because we were fighting their hereditary enemies, but because we were fighting for liberty, they, nevertheless, by the explication of this word liberty which they gave the world shortly afterwards, would have seriously interfered with the liveliness of our ancestors' sense of gratitude.

A better article in the same magazine has something to say to Mr. Carlyle about the justice of his onslaught on "one Père Bouhours." "Motion in vacuo," says Mr. Carlyle, "is well known to be speedier and surer than through a resisting medium, especially to imponderable bodies, and so the light Jesuit, unimpeded by facts or principles of any kind, failed not to reach his conclusion"—his conclusion in the particular case which Mr. Carlyle had in hand being, according to Mr. Carlyle, his answer to his own question, "Si un Allemand peut avoir de l'esprit?" He comfortably decided in the negative, Mr. Carlyle goes on to remark, and announced that "a German could not have any literary talent." For the expression of this nefarious sentiment, Mr. Carlyle instantly trices up the "light Jesuit" and gives him a couple of dozen. But it is the light Scotch essayist, it appears, who should be in the rigging undergoing punishment; as this writer shows, the world had been correct in its usual version of the smart saying of the Père Bouhours. Looking through that gentleman's works, he discovers in the "Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugène" that the question stands in the words, "Si un Allemand peut être bel esprit." The lack of wit rather than the lack of literary talent of the Germans was what the author more particularly took as the subject of his jest. But had he held the opinion which Carlyle charges him with holding—and in all probability he did hold it—he would not have been so much to blame. Mr. Carlyle himself, and in the very essay in which this diatribe occurs—"The State of German Literature" (1827)—shows how universal, not only in other parts of Europe alone, but in Germany itself, in the lifetime of Bouhours and for centuries before it, and for a long time afterwards, was the ignorance concerning mediæval German satire and poetry. Even now it might be retorted upon him that people are not reading the Nibelungen, and that one of Heine's most admired jests—that about the Romans having found time to conquer the earth because, unlike the moderns, they had not to stop and learn Latin grammar—he ventured to take from the "Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum." Mr. Carlyle, by the way, seems to be in trouble just now in the periodical world. The Westminster pays its respects to him in an article on Cromwell, for garbling facts to make them fit into the fabric he has chosen to shape, and to shape after such pattern as pleases him.

Other articles which may be read with pleasure are some chapters of a novel translated from the Spanish of Fernan Caballero, who is well worth the attention of our novel-readers; and a letter, written from a Roman Catholic point of view, but interesting to such as have not made themselves acquainted with the details of the miracle which takes place every year at Naples. The writer is an American Romanist and a priest, and was allowed unusually good opportunity for watching the liquefaction in the reliquary, and the somewhat disgusting details are given very clearly.

Harper's begins with what we have found a very taking paper, though we do not know that there is anything especially good to be said about it after one says that it is very suggestive of the kind of place it describes. That is Montauk Point, away at the end of Long Island, with its queer people, its delicious air, and its loneliness—undepressing to the tired vacation-seeker. We might, indeed, add to this, which, however, is enough in all conscience for a magazine article in August, that the writer has something of Mr. Swiveller's "remarkable power of quotation," and gives some pretty scraps of poetry, which chime with the sea and the breeze. In the "Editor's Easy Chair," something good is said for the city of Washington, where, we learn, an unwealthy man lives more cheaply than in any other American city, the reason being that in Washington there are always many dignitaries, domestic and foreign, of small means and on small salaries, who live plainly in unobtrusive quarters, but who yet are dignitaries, and persons of consideration. Their example makes the like unostentation possible for other men of moderate means, while in nearly all other American cities all persons of a certain class are expected to live within the limits of a comparatively small section of the town, and in a style dictated by persons of much larger means. To go a step further, however, in seeking a solution of this problem, we should say that the comparative freedom of Washington from the American wife and daughter, and the congregation in large numbers of the reflecting male, will be found to be at the bottom of the phenomenon in question.

The best article in Scribner's Monthly is by a practised journalist, Mr. W. F. G. Shanks, who has been up at North Adams, inspecting the Chinamen, and can tell us how they are doing after one year of trial. They are doing very well. The immediate cause of their coming was a dispute between their employer and his former workmen. He appears to be a man of energy and tenacity. Ten years ago he defeated a determined strike against the employment of machinery in his manufactory; just before calling in the Chinamen he had kept the whole factory running for three weeks with only a single man in it, this man being a workman who would not join the "Crispins," and whose dismissal the Crispins demanded. He next discharged a full set of hands who were playing him a common trick of trades' unions, and turning out inferior work in the expectation of forcing a rise in the price of labor. To take the place of this set he hired another, but the Union ordered them not to go to the benches, and they obeyed. It was this last vexation that determined Mr. Sampson to send to San Francisco for Chinamen. The Chinese brokers made enquiries into his character and commercial standing, and satisfied themselves also that he did business in a small town—for they will not send their countrymen to towns so large as to possess a rabble of prejudiced men—and then procured him seventy-five young fellows from eighteen to twenty-eight years old, who were shipped to Massachusetts at an expense of about $125 a head. "The cleanest lot of emigrants that ever went over the road," a conductor on the Pacific road said of them. The original expenditure being not less than $10,000, and the men being ignorant of shoemaking and of English, the enterprise did not look, in its first stage, very promising, but it speedily put on a prosperous aspect. At the end of a week the men were turning out "the average work of beginners," and at the end of three months they were making more shoes in a week than the same number of Crispins (though, undoubtedly, they were slower workmen), and were making them equally well. To their remarkable faculty of imitation, the perfection of the machinery, and the great steadiness with which they worked, these results are due. The further result of cheapness is due to the comparative lowness of their wages. "The saving in the cost of production on a week's work was (at the end of the twelfth month) $840," or an annual saving of $40,000; "in itself a handsome profit on a business which, under Crispin dictation, had, to use Mr. Sampson's language, 'hardly held its own.'" It is agreeable to hear that thirty-one of Mr. Sampson's displaced workmen have set on foot a co-operative shoe-shop, which is successful, has made the men engaged in it steadier workmen, and in which they produce more goods each week and of a better quality than they ever produced for Mr. Sampson. Mr. Shanks gives an account also of the Passaic Laundry's experiment with Chinese labor in place of the unsteady labor of girls. The report is substantially the same as in Mr. Sampson's case—steadier work; more of it, and cheaper; no fault to be found with the behavior of the men.

Some of Mr. Edward Whymper's book, entitled "Scrambles among the Alps," forms the first article in Lippincott's Magazine, which will publish by instalments the whole of the volume. Mr. Whymper is evidently a better hand at climbing up all sorts of places at the peril of his neck than he is at writing, and masterly description such as Mr. Clarence King has given of his climbing among our sierras will not be found in Mr. Whymper's chapters. Indeed, they are not a little bald, and presuppose in their readers a good deal more of the Alpine Club instinct than the general public has. But now and again, in the dizzy places, they have an interest which will be sufficient to carry the reader through them.

A correspondent, "W. P. M.," in writing about St. Petersburg and Moscow—the latter of which may be called the capital of the Panslavic party, as the former is the political capital of Russia—tells a good story of the Ladies' Section of the Slavic committee which the enthusiastic Moscovians have in operation. The committee had sent a commission into Bulgaria to see how white for the harvest that Slavic field might be, and the commission reported with regret that in Bulgaria education was not what it should be, the women and girls in particular being lamentably uneducated. Upon this the Ladies' Section convened itself, and resolved that something must be done immediately, and did do something, for it established several normal schools, where Bulgarian girls can not only be fitted for teaching, but are even supported until graduation. But just under the noses of these ladies, not across the Turkish border, but in the Province of Moscow and the District of Mashaisk, the number of girls who attend school is 1 out of 27,519 souls.

The Atlantic is most readable of the month's magazines. Mr. Howells's piece, "The Wedding Journey," should be missed by no one who likes, and by no one who wishes to learn to like, the most delicate of humor. The adventures, slight though they be, of the newly-wedded pair—the young woman whom everybody is fond of, and in whose happiness every one is glad—will serve to bring the humor a little nearer to readers whose taste as yet is not such as to enjoy our author's humor in its simplicity.

Mr. Henry James, jun., continues his story of "Watch and Ward," which, in this third part of it, is marked by all his excellences, and promises to be one of his best. The young Westerner is finely studied; and perhaps even better is the unfortunate lover; and good, too, we suppose, is the young girl. They all, it is perhaps unnecessary to say, are by this time in a fine state of torture. Good, too, is Mr. T. G. Appleton's article, entitled "The Flowering of a Nation," which proposes a statue of Leif Ericson, who, sailing from Iceland, first found Vinland. He is surely an excellent subject for the sculptor. Must there, though, be the "flowering of a nation" before the Bostonian can find an appropriate statue for the place "formerly occupied by Scollay's Building"? However that may be, Mr. Appleton's suggestion is excellent; and so is the article, only the approaches leading up to the suggestion above-mentioned are rather of the longest; and we may add that "the Latin races" will undoubtedly last for a time yet, even though "they crumble and dissolve," and though "from the beginning they were slaves to the passion and prosperity of the hour," and though "individuality, the possession of one's self, is not theirs." The Germans have beaten the French, certainly; but we suppose we need not, therefore, all of us be all the time beating all the Latin races. Very hasty, wide generalization is one of the things that some people of Latin race, as distinguished from some people of Teutonic, have had for one of their bad habits. Mr. Bret Harte's "Greyport Legend" is the most effective poetry of the Atlantic this month, but it is less effective than it might be, partly from obscurity and partly from other causes. An evil thing the last stanza is to any one who cares for the poetry of the legend. The other poetry in the Atlantic is rather pretty.

In Old and New there are "Some Words about Women," written by Miss, or Mrs., M. P. Lowe—it is customary among ladies who write to leave you in doubt as to their proper title—which will meet with general approval. Other writers in Old and New this month are Mr. E. E. Hale, Mrs. J. W. Howe, "Gail Hamilton," who writes something rather pleasant, and with some of her usual disagreeable snappiness, and lastly, Mr. Joaquin Miller, who has a sonnet—or whatever it is—as follows, which we commend to the thoughtful admirers of that poet:

THE SUNNY SOUTH.

Come to my sun-land! come with me
To the land I love, where the sun and sea
Are wed for ever; where palm and pine
Are filled with singers; where tree and vine
Are voiced with prophets! O come! and you
Shall sing a song with the seas that swirl,
And kiss their hands to the cold white girl,
To the maiden moon in her mantle of blue.

The History of Peoria, Illinois. By C. Ballance. (Peoria: Printed by N. C. Nason.)—Whoever collects and puts on record, however unskilfully, the annals of an American town, deserves our thanks. Every day is making it harder to obtain materials for this; and now, especially, while "first settlers" are still living, efforts should be made to preserve everything. Incidents and illustrations of manners and modes of life are especially valuable, because it is in them that the essence of history largely consists. Mr. Ballance's history of Peoria has value, therefore, in spite of its defects. These defects are easy to point out. It is ill arranged, and written in a "newspaper" style, both as regards expression and manner of thought. It contains a good deal of worthless detail, and, at the same time, tells us less than we should like to know of those early times the memory of which it is not yet too late to preserve. Thus, the French colonization in the Mississippi Valley is a subject of great interest; and wherever it has left a trace upon Western society, that trace should be carefully followed up. It seems impossible that industrious search should not give more information in regard to the French colony of Peoria than this meagre chapter, the best thing in which is the argument that the French civilization must have been at a very low stage; for, "when the present population commenced to settle here, about forty years ago, there was not to be found, in this neighborhood, a vestige of a tree, shrub, or plant belonging to Europe. . . . I therefore pronounce the wine story a humbug."

Again, instead of wild assertions as to the evidences of ancient civilization being all a delusion—upon which subject, begging his pardon, Mr. Ballance has not earned a right to speak ex cathedra—we ought to have a clear account of whatever such evidences are alleged to exist in the neighborhood of Peoria. Give us the facts, and we can dispense with crude assertions. A good illustration of the clumsy way in which the book is put together is found in the criticism (p. 10) of Mr. Parkman's description of Fort Crèvecœur, as "not justified by anything Hennepin says about it, nor is there any ground at that place that fits his description. There is no hill or knoll there, but the land is all under water occasionally, for more than a mile back from the river. Where does he get the authority for saying this fort was defended by chevaux-de-frise and palisades twenty-five feet high?" But on page 25 we find Hennepin's own description: "An eminence on the bank of the river, defended on that side by the river, and on two other sides by ditches the rains had made very deep, by succession of time, so that it was accessible only by one way; therefore we cast a line to join these two natural ditches, and made the eminence steep on every side, supporting the earth with great pieces of timber"—a description which gives authority to most of Mr. Parkman's details, and which, our author declares, exactly fits the village of Wesley.

Notwithstanding these faults in judgment, the book seems honestly and faithfully done, and no doubt can be relied upon as a record of facts, whether or not it will persuade the people of Illinois to take Peoria for their capital. It is not devoid of incident, and contains many entertaining bits of personal gossip—rather gratifying, one would say, to the representatives of the persons in question. One is struck, however, with the commonplace character of persons and events in those days—fifty years ago. Were they really so devoid of picturesqueness, or is Mr. Ballance destitute of the skill to find it out and present it?

Pioneers and Founders; or, Recent Workers in the Mission Field. By C. M. Yonge, author of the "Heir of Redclyffe." (New York: Macmillan and Co.)—Since the great discoveries of the fifteenth century, missionary enterprises have taken again the important place, as means of civilization, which they held a thousand years ago. It seemed, perhaps, to the contemporaries of St. Augustine, Boniface, and Adalbert, that these English, Saxons, and Prussians were nothing but rude barbarians, with no part to play in the world's history; it was to save their souls in the future world, not to help on the progress of the present world, that the martyrs preached and suffered. So now we can hardly conceive of a great future before these Hindus and South-Sea Islanders; and yet it may be that future generations will cherish the names of Swartz, Judson, and Williams not only as teachers of Christianity, but as the founders of a new civilization. It is with good reason, therefore, that Miss Yonge's book is named "Pioneers and Founders." She has selected, for Macmillan's Sunday Library, a few of the most characteristic names of the modern missionary work, and has told their story in an interesting manner. One could hardly desire a book which should tell of the spirit and character of these enterprises more graphically and sympathetically. It is impossible not to feel, however, that there are two classes of missionary enterprise which command our sympathy in a very unequal degree. Eliot, Brainerd, Marsden, and Mackenzie labored among pure savages, and their aim was quite as much to teach them industry, frugality, and thrift as the truths of Christianity. In regard to such labors as these, one can feel nothing but admiration for the zeal, the heroism, and the good sense that distinguished them. But when it comes to sending propagandists to communities which possess a civilization and a religion in some cases older than our own—to people who are educated and thoughtful—is there not something intrusive in it? If the Buddhists or Mohammedans should send missionaries to us, we should not kill them, or lock them up, or send them away, we suppose; but we should think it rather an impertinence. Somehow, we cannot help feeling that these earnest pioneers, who were so busy in spreading merely the dogmas of Christianity, might have been better employed among the heathen of their own land.

Inside Paris during the Siege. By an Oxford Graduate. (London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1871.)—The author witnessed the first siege of Paris with his parents and a sister, and he tells its story in his "own way, without invention or embellishment," offering it to the reader with the words of Montaigne: "'C'est icy un livre de bonne foye, Lecteur'"—which, an attentive perusal makes us inclined to believe, he has a full right to use. His object is not to pass sentence of condemnation or approval upon what he narrates, nor even to sketch events in their bare objectivity, but "to bring forward . . . . whatever may tend to dispel the conventionalities of history which efface the true human interest of things," and to save for the future student of the siege "something of its original Parisian naïveté." This limited task, as far as in him lay, he has very well executed; and his production, though far inferior in wit, humor, and brilliancy of narrative to the "Diary of a Besieged Resident," with which it has many points of resemblance and coincidence in style and views, will be found both entertaining and instructive even by those who have fully enjoyed the attractive siege pictures and spicy talk of that philosophic caricaturist. The book before us is in its main parts also a diary, but neither are the whole of the writer's notes presented, nor does he seem to have abstained from emendatory alterations, as we infer partly from a remark attached to an inserted account of the "Organization of the Republican Party" in France, received from a friend in Paris long after the conclusion of the siege, and yet "freely used for the composition of these pages." We presume, however, that the alterations are rare, as the diction of the "Graduate" is quite fresh and racy, and his humor, if not so sparkling as that of the "Resident," is at least as genuine as his. His sketches from life are sometimes very pleasant in their plainness, like the following:

"My mother and I went on 'our siege walk' toward the Faubourg St. Antoine, as far as the Place du Trône, and then turned to the left up the Boulevard de Charonne. Scarcely a vestige remained of the young saplings that peopled this outer line of boulevards, except here and there a stump with the bars of the iron fence that protected the tree lying wrenched and twisted on the soil. Further on, huge trunks lay prostrate, around which swarmed an eager crowd of women and children, hacking with their puny hatchets at the twigs and bark. A few tall elms, which still defied the efforts of the people, were being sawn at their base, while all the time clusters of gamins were preying on the branches; one moment more, and the tree might totter on its trunk, and hurl its gavroches on to their mother earth. All Belleville had turned out into the streets, and swarmed in ant-like procession, divina vis populi, each one bearing away his portion of the spoil, branch, log, fagot, sweepings of small twigs, shovelled into aprons and pinafores—a desperate struggle for existence. Hard by was the cemetery of Père la Chaise, with its ample garden of tombs, spread on the steep flanks of mountainous Charonne. As we went slowly up the steps which lead to the mortuary chapel on the summit, the muffled sound of distant guns fell like a dirge on our ears—so low, so mournful, so deadened by the snow that lay thick on the intervening ridge of Montreuil, that it seemed to come from another world. We paused awhile to look into a long, wide trench, which the diggers were carrying through the eastern slope of the hill, while at the other end, three by three, the coffins were being piled, and a thin layer of earth gradually veiled them from our sight. Sorrowing relatives gazed tearfully at the closely-packed fosse commune, crushing its dead in such tight embrace. 'Never mind,' quoth the gravedigger, who recked not of the agonies of the tomb, 'there's room enough for all of 'em—il y a de la place pour tout le monde; allez.'"

The theme of the "Graduate," like that of the "Resident," is the people of Paris during the siege, though he offers, also, quite a number of interesting remarks on the leading men infra muros—statesmen, generals, and revolutionists. He starts with a rather friendly disposition towards the besieged, but is gradually more and more disgusted with their mock heroism, boastful ignorance, and senseless insurrectionary attempts, and finally yields to a pessimism which vents itself in observations and conclusions occasionally even gloomier than the following:

"In his (Thiers's) account of revolutionary scenes, I recognize the Paris of 1870; they stand the test of experiment which makes other histories dissolve into mere flimsy bombast. After all, Paris was, in 1793, very much as we see it now, with one great exception—that its working-classes have been tamed and enervated by luxuries at that time unknown. The Empire has glutted them with the refuse of the rich. High wages, fine squares to saunter in, great alcazars with rouged women to educate their sense of beauty, Theresas to howl for their musical entertainments—all these cheap luxuries of civilized Imperial life have made of the Parisian workman a simple repetition in the blouse of what the little boulevard fop is in his modish waistcoats. I sometimes hear a regret expressed by Revolutionists of the St. Just type, that a guillotine was not set up in the Place de la Concorde at the outset of the siege. The absence of this instrument of terror in the Republic of the 4th of September is rather a sign of degeneracy than of progress. The populace has been too much saturated with pleasure to have the nerve for guillotining; it will scratch, tear, and lacerate with a venomous ferocity of puny, degenerate creatures. The guillotine, with all its atrocity, was a symbol of strength; and there is not one man amongst the fanatical leaders of the present within our walls with faith enough in himself or in his followers to have recourse to such desperate means of coercion."

A Key to the Pentateuch, Explanatory of the Text and Grammatical Forms. By Solomon Deutsch, A.M., Ph.D., author of "A New Practical Hebrew Grammar." Part I.: Genesis (New York: Holt & Williams. 1871.)—The second part of this work is to contain Exodus and Leviticus, and the third, Numbers and Deuteronomy; and the whole is to be "the means of introducing the student to a full and thorough understanding of the Hebrew text of the Bible," being chiefly calculated to spare such beginners as have acquired some grammatical knowledge of Hebrew the trouble of hunting up roots, forms, and exceptions in dictionaries and grammars, and to enable them to study the Hebrew text without a teacher, or fully to prepare at home for every school lesson. The arrangement of the "Key" is, in the main, the following: Every word of the text is translated where it first occurs, in the form in which it there appears; rare and chiefly irregular words receive repeated translations. Every idiomatic phrase is at least once explained, both literally and agreeably to the sense. Verbs are retranslated in every conjugation; in addition to the root, the verbal analysis is given. Special attention is paid to derivations, with reference also to other Semitic languages. Historical, geographical, and archæological remarks are given in notes. Lists of "paradigms," from the author's grammar, to which frequent references are made, are added in an appendix. The work is very elaborate and very carefully done, and its Hebrew portions are remarkable for distinctness and correctness. It will thus undoubtedly be found an excellent help and guide both by students and teachers. The following extracts from the lexicographico-grammatical part and the explanatory notes may serve to illustrate the plan and execution:

"Chapter XIV. 1. Melekh, king (malakh, to reign.) 2. Milhamah, war, battle (laham, to fight); asu milhamah eth, they made war with. 3. Haberu, united; emek, vale (amak, to be deep); siddim, Siddim (plains, fields); melah, salt; yam hammelah, the Salt Sea (Lake). 4. Abedu, they served; shelosh-esreh, in the thirteenth; maradu, they rebelled, pr. K. (p.) Vayakku, a. they smote; nakhah, cv. f. Hi.

Notes to the same verses.—"1. Shinar, in Mesopotamia. Ellasar, a locality now generally identified with Larsa by the explorers of Southern Babylonia. Elam, the Elymais of the classical writers, a region of Western Persia. Goyim, nations, a number of various tribes. Yam hammelah, the Asphalt Lake, or Dead Sea. Shelosh-esreh [Grammar] § 84, 4; when? Maradu, in pause, for maredu. Rephaim, a giant race. Ashteroth Karnayim, a town of Eastern Palestine, sacred to the horned (keren) goddess Ashtoreth. Zuzim, a race of giants, called in the language of the Ammonites, by whom they were extirpated, Zamzummin. Ham, prob. in or near the country of the Ammonites; Deut. ii. 20. Emim, a giant race, whose very name signifies terror, south of the Arnon, an eastern affluent of the Dead Sea."

The Roadmaster's Assistant. William S. Huntingdon. (Chicago: A. N. Kellogg. 1871.)—This clearly written little volume thoroughly deserves its title. Many of the requisites to the maintenance of good track it treats with a minuteness and an excellence of judgment which can only be the result of a full and well-digested experience on the part of its author. It avoids most of the prominent questions in railway construction, such as quality and strength of materials, and devices of form for securing greatest service with least quantity; but these major points have always received due attention. Mr. Huntingdon has selected neglected topics, and with a just apprehension of their real importance has presented them forcibly and plainly. In indicating good methods for maintaining safe and efficient roadways with such devices and materials as are ordinarily supplied, he has rendered a service to railway owners of which they should be wise enough to avail themselves.

* Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books on the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Bache (R. M.), American Wonderland	(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)
Browning (R.), Balaustion's Adventure	(J. R. Osgood & Co.)	$1 50
Connelly (Rev. P.), The Italian Reform Movement in the Church of Rome, swd...	(Florence)
Goodwin (Prof. W. W.) and Allen (J. H.), Greek Reader	(Ginn Bros.)	2 00
Gray (Rev. E. P.), The Apostolic Treasury, swd	(Libby & Swett)
Hopkins (Rev. M.), The Law of Love and Love as a Law, 3d ed.	(C. Scribner & Co.)	1 75
Illustrirte Kriegs-Chronik, Part 22, swd	(B. Westermann & Co.)
Labberton (R. H.), Historical Atlas	(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)	3 50
Historical Questions	" " "	1 75
Lowly Ways: Diary of a Poor Young Lady	" " "
Mackenzie (Mrs. A. S.), Aureola: or, The Black Sheep	" "
Macquoid (Katherine S.), Rookstone; a Tale	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Palestine Exploration Society, First Statement, swd	(New York)
Peters (Dr. J. C.), Notes on Asiatic Cholera, 2d ed	(D. Van Nostrand)
Potter (H. L. D.), Manual of Reading	(Harper & Bros.)
Sand (Mme G.), Cesarine Dietrich	(J. R. Osgood & Co.)	1 25
Saunders (Katherine), Gideon's Rock: a Tale	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Spofford (Mrs. H. S.), New England Legends	(J. R. Osgood & Co.)	1 00
The Four Gospels in One	(R. A. Campbell)
The Workshop, No. 8, swd	(E. Steiger)	40
Tuckerman (H. T.), Life of John Pendleton Kennedy	(G. P. Putnam & Sons)	2 00

THE GREAT CENTENNIAL EDITION OF SCOTT'S

NOVELS.

Just Published by

PORTER & COATES,

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.

BY SIR WALTER SCOTT, BART.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

A NEW "CENTENNIAL MEMORIAL" Edition, prepared with great care, printed on fine paper, illustrated with more than one hundred illustrations, on steel and wood, by the most celebrated English and Scottish artists, bound in a new and appropriate style of fine cloth, with emblematic stamps, and fac-simile of the celebrated author's autograph in gold on the side. Complete with all the author's latest introductions, notes, and revisions. In 23 vols. crown 8vo.

All the merits to be desired in a good copy of "Waverley Novels" we claim to be obtained in the PORTER & COATES Edition. For convenience of size, beauty of paper, typography, legibility of type, elegance of illustrations, copiousness of notes, neatness and compactness of appearance, in short, for completeness and desirability in every respect, no edition in the market surpasses it.

We therefore advise every reader, every head of the family—1st. To buy a set of "Waverley Novels. 2d. To get a thoroughly good edition, so that you need never have to purchase another. 3d. To examine "Porter & Coates's Centennial" edition, and buy it in preference to any other.

The Centennial edition is published in 23 vols. crown 8vo, fine cloth, emblematically and neatly stamped in gold. Price $35. The same in half-calf, gilt and marbled edges, $70.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

YALE AND HARVARD USE

WHITNEY'S GERMAN COURSE,

OTTO'S FRENCH COURSE.

HOLT & WILLIAMS,

PUBLISHERS,

No. 25 Bond Street, New York.

The Publishers issue a very large assortment of works in the same department.

☞ A Descriptive Catalogue will be sent gratis to any one referring to this advertisement.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY, CAMBRIDGE, MASS.,

COMPRISES THE FOLLOWING DEPARTMENTS:

HARVARD COLLEGE.
THE UNIVERSITY LECTURES.
THE DIVINITY SCHOOL.
THE LAW SCHOOL.
THE LAWRENCE SCIENTIFIC SCHOOL.
THE SCHOOL OF MINING AND PRACTICAL GEOLOGY.
THE EPISCOPAL THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.
THE MEDICAL SCHOOL.
THE DENTAL SCHOOL.
THE BOTANIC GARDEN.
THE ASTRONOMICAL OBSERVATORY.
THE MUSEUM OF COMPARATIVE ZOÖLOGY.
THE PEABODY MUSEUM OF ARCHÆOLOGY.
THE BUSSEY INSTITUTION (a School of Agriculture and Horticulture).

The Academic Year begins in all departments on the THURSDAY FOLLOWING THE LAST WEDNESDAY IN SEPTEMBER, and ends on the last Wednesday in June.

The Second Examination for admission to Harvard College will be held on September 28, 29, and 30, beginning at 8 A.M. on September 28.

The Examinations for admission to the Engineering Department of the Lawrence Scientific School, the Mining School, and the Bussey Institution will be held on September 28, beginning at 9 A.M.

SCIENTIFIC DEPARTMENTS.

INSTRUCTORS.

LOUIS AGASSIZ, LL.D., Professor of Zoölogy and Geology.
BENJAMIN PEIRCE, LL.D., " Astronomy and Mathematics.
ASA GRAY, LL.D., " Natural History.
THOMAS MOTLEY, Instructor in Farming.
JEFFRIES WYMAN, M.D., Professor of Anatomy.
HENRY L. EUSTIS, A.M., " Engineering.
JOSIAH D. WHITNEY, LL.D., " Geology.
HERMANN A. HAGEN, M.D. " Entomology.
WOLCOTT GIBBS, M.D., " the Application of Science to the Useful Arts.
FRANCIS PARKMAN, A.M., " Horticulture.
DANIEL D. SLADE, M.D., " Applied Zoölogy.
JOSEPH WINLOCK, A.M., " Astronomy and Geodesy.
JOSIAH P. COOKE, A.M., " Chemistry and Mineralogy.
JAMES M. PEIRCE, A.M., " Mathematics.
FRANCIS H. STORER, A.M., Professor of Agricultural Chemistry.
CHARLES FRED. HOFFMANN, " Topographical Engineering.
RAPHAEL PUMPELLY, " Mining.
WILLIAM H. PETTEE, A.M., Instructor in Mining.
NATHANIEL S. SHALER, S.B., Professor of Palæontology.
FRANCIS G. SANBORN, Instructor in Entomology.
JOHN TROWBRIDGE, S.B., Assistant Professor of Physics.
GEORGE A. HILL, A.B., Assistant Professor of Physics.
PIERRE J. BORIS, Instructor in French.
WILLIAM G. FARLOW, M.D., Assistant in Botany.
CHARLES L. JACKSON, A.M., Assistant Professor of Chemistry.
JOSIAH C. BARTLETT, A.B., Instructor in Mathematics.
HENRY B. HILL, A.B., Assistant in Chemistry.
GEORGE THEODORE DIPPOLD, Instructor in German.
CHARLES E. MUNROE, Assistant in Chemistry.

LAWRENCE SCIENTIFIC SCHOOL.—This school has been reorganized, and now offers:

1. A four-years' course of study in Civil and Topographical Engineering, as follows: First Year—Spherical Trigonometry, Analytical Geometry, Descriptive Geometry, Chemistry, Surveying and Plotting, Road-making, Free-hand and Water color Drawing, French. Second Year—Differential and Integral Calculus, Mechanics, Physics, Mathematical and Physical Geography, Elementary Geology, Crystallography, Mineralogy, and the use of the Blowpipe, Mechanical Drawing, French, German. Third Year—Applied Mechanics, Practical Astronomy and Geodesy, Hypsometry, Topographical Surveying and Drawing, Structural and Dynamical Geology, Photography, German. Fourth Year—Building materials, and their applications in railroads, canals, bridges, etc.; Applications of Descriptive Geometry to masonry and stone-cutting; Hydraulics; Heat and its applications; Discussions of existing structures, and working out of projects.

Candidates for admission to this course on Engineering (unless they are graduates of colleges) will be examined in Arithmetic, Algebra, Geometry, and Trigonometry, and will also be required to show that they are reasonably proficient in English Grammar and Geography.

2. A one year's course of study in the elements of Natural History, Chemistry, and Physics, as follows; Physical Geography, Structural Geology, and Meteorology; General Chemistry and Qualitative Analysis; Physics; Botany; Zoölogy; Entomology.

This course is especially intended for teachers, or persons who intend to become teachers. The instruction will be mainly given in the laboratories and museums of the University; it will be of the most practical character, every student being taught to make experiments and study specimens himself.

3. Thorough instruction for advanced students in any of the following subjects: Physics (Heat and Light), Chemistry, Zoölogy, Geology, Botany, and Mathematics.

Professor Gibbs will receive special students in Heat and Light at the Rumford laboratory. Professor Cooke will receive special students in Chemistry at the laboratories in Boylston Hall. Professors Agassiz, Hagen, and Shaler will receive special students in Zoölogy and Geology at the Museum of Comparative Zoölogy. Professor Gray and Assistant Farlow will receive special students in Botany at the Botanic Garden and Herbarium. Professor Benjamin Peirce and James M Peirce will receive special students in Mathematics.

The opportunities for advanced students in all branches of Natural History and in Physics, Chemistry, Astronomy, and Mathematics will be much greater next year than ever before. The Museum of Comparative Zoölogy has been more than doubled in size during the current year; a laboratory, lecture-room, and greenhouse have been added to the equipment of the Botanical Department; a laboratory of Physics is to be created during the Summer in Harvard Hall; the chemical laboratories are to be greatly enlarged and improved; the interior of the Scientific School Building is to be completely reconstructed; and a distinct physical laboratory and cabinet are to be assigned to the Rumford Professor. At the same time, the scope and volume of the instruction will be greatly enlarged.

MINING SCHOOL.—The full course, prescribed for candidates for the degree of Mining Engineer, occupies four years, the first three of which are identical, as regards the subjects of instruction and the order thereof, with the first three years of the Engineering Course above specified. The terms of admission are the same as those of the Engineering Course. The fourth year of the course is as follows: Economical Geology and the Phenomena of Veins: Mining Machinery and the Exploitation of Mines; General and Practical Metallurgy; Assaying; Working-up, Plotting, and Writing out notes of summer excursions.

BUSSEY INSTITUTION.—The School of Agriculture and Horticulture, established in execution of the Trusts created by the Will of Benjamin Bussey, will give thorough instruction in Agriculture, Useful and Ornamental Gardening, and Stock-raising.

The regular course of the study will fill three years. First Year—Physical Geography, Structural Geology, and Meteorology; General Chemistry and Qualitative Analysis; the elements of Physics; Levelling and Road-making; the Elements of Botany, Zoölogy, and Entomology; French; German. The instruction of the first year's course will be given at Cambridge, and students of the first year must live in or near Cambridge. The instruction of the second and third years' courses will be given at the Bussey Institution, and students of those courses must live within easy reach of the Institution, which is situated near the village of Jamaica Plain, about five miles southwest of Boston, and close to the Forest Hill Station on the Boston and Providence Railroad. The subjects to be taught at the Bussey Institution during the year 1871-72, being subjects of the second year's course, are as follows: Theory and Practice of Farming, Horticulture; Agricultural Chemistry, Applied Zoölogy, Entomology, Quantitative Analysis. The third year's course will be hereafter arranged, and will be given for the first time in 1872-73.

The teachings of the School will be amply illustrated by the rich scientific selections of the University, and by a Botanic Garden, a large and profitable farm, greenhouses, propagating-houses, and field experiments.

FEES AND EXPENSES.—The tuition fee for the Academic year in any of the above departments or courses is $150; for half or any smaller fraction of a year, $75; for any fraction of a year greater than one-half, the fee of the whole year is charged. In the Bussey Institution there are also separate fees for certain distinct courses of lectures; and in that Institution tuition fees will be freely remitted to poor and meritorious students.

The other expenses of a student for an academic year may be estimated as follows: Room, $30 to $100; Board for 38 weeks, $152 to $304; Books, $20 to $25; Fuel and Lights, $15 to $35; Washing, $19 to $38.

For University Catalogues, descriptive circulars, examination papers, or information about any department of the University, address J. W. HARRIS, Sec.

ARUNDEL SOCIETY.

This Society was founded in 1848, for promoting the knowledge of Art by copying and publishing

IMPORTANT WORKS OF ANCIENT MASTERS.

Its publications are beautifully executed

CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHS,

Fac-similes of the originals, both in color and drawing, and are manufactured under the superintendence of well-known artists. The following are among the

MOST POPULAR SUBJECTS.

CHRIST AND MARY MAGDALENE IN THE GARDEN. From a fresco by Fra Angelico, in the Convent of St. Mark, at Florence. Size, 15x8½ inches. Price $6 25.

THE ADORATION OF THE KINGS. From a fresco by Pietro Perugino, at Cetta Della Pieve. Size, 22x18½ inches. Price $13 75.

ST. PETER DELIVERED FROM PRISON. From a fresco by Raffaelle, in the Stanza of the Vatican. Size, 28x19 inches. Price $12 50.

THE CORONATION OF THE VIRGIN. From a fresco by Fra Angelico, in the Convent of St. Mark, at Florence. Size, 18x19 inches. Price $10.

THE VIRGIN AND CHILD. From a fresco by Fra Bartolomeo, now placed in the Convent of St. Mark, at Florence. Size, 11x16½ inches. Price $8.

THE ADORATION OF THE LAMB. From the centre-panel of the Altar Piece painted by the brothers Van Eyck, in the Cathedral of St. Bavon, at Ghent. Size, 26x15½ inches. Price $15 75.

The sizes above-given are the actual sizes of each picture, all of them being mounted on a heavy white cardboard, so that when framed the white border can either be left as a margin, or not, at pleasure.

Any of the above pictures will be securely packed, free of charge, and sent by express, on receipt of advertised price.

POTT & AMERY,

Cooper Union, Fourth Avenue, New York.

NOW READY.

Second and Revised Edition.

ON THE GENESIS OF SPECIES.

BY ST. GEORGE MIVART, F.R.S.

Second edition. With Notes on Mr. Darwin's last work—"The Descent of Man." Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.

A DIGEST OF FACTS—relating to the Treatment and Utilization of Sewage. By W. H. Corfield, M.A. Second edition, corrected and enlarged. 8vo, cloth, $3 50.

GREEK AND ENGLISH DIALOGUES. For use in Schools and Colleges. By John Stuart Blackie. 18mo, cloth, $1.

A GRAMMAR OF THE LATIN LANGUAGE. From Plautus to Suetonius. By Henry John Roby, M.A. Part I., containing Sounds, Inflexions, Word-Formation, Appendices. Cloth, $2 50.

SERMONS preached in Rugby School Chapel. By the Right Rev. Frederick Temple, D.D., Lord Bishop of Exeter. Second Series. Cloth, $1 50.

MACMILLAN & CO.,

38 Bleecker Street, New York.

ESTABLISHED IN 1836.

LIBRARY AGENCY

FOR THE

ECONOMICAL PURCHASE OF BOOKS

FOR

COLLEGE, SCHOOL, AND TOWN LIBRARIES,

PRIVATE COLLECTIONS, FAMILY BOOK-SHELVES.

G. P. PUTNAM & SONS

Continue to make it a special and important part of their business to attend to orders for Public Institutions and individuals who desire to have accurate information and suggestions as to the best books and the best editions, and to purchase what they need, whether in thousands or a single book, in the most economical way.

N. B.—Orders for American or Foreign Books of every description, whether for whole libraries or for single books, are carefully and promptly executed at the above Agency. The experience acquired by thirty-five years' study of this specialty on both sides of the Atlantic will, it is believed, be useful to book-buyers with reference to choice of the best books and the best editions, and also with reference to economy.

G. P. Putnam & Sons will also make purchases at any of the Library Auction Sales.

At their rooms, as above, will be found specimen volumes of the choicest books of the time, which can be examined at leisure.

G. P. PUTNAM & SONS,

Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street, N. Y.,

PURCHASING AGENTS FOR PUBLIC AND PRIVATE LIBRARIES.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

FOUR MONTHS FOR ONE DOLLAR.

"POOR MISS FINCH,"

A new and beautifully illustrated serial story by

WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "The Moonstone," etc., has just commenced in

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

New Subscribers will be supplied with the WEEKLY from No. 766 (for September 2), in which number this story began, to the close of the year, four months, for one dollar.

HARPER'S WEEKLY contains one-third more reading-matter, a larger number of Illustrations, and is conspicuously better edited and printed than any other illustrated newspaper. Its circulation is four times that of any similar publication.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine, One Year	$4 00
Harper's Weekly, One Year	4 00
Harper's Bazar, One Year	4 00

Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, and Harper's Bazar, to one address, for one year, $10, or any two for $7.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL. Why will people persist in burning fluids which yearly cause the death of thousands, when Pratt's Astral Oil is free from all explosive qualities? It is not the cheapest, but the safest and best illuminating oil ever made.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO

Have Just Published:

I.

THE GREAT NOVEL OF THE YEAR: OUIDA'S NEW WORK.

FOLLE-FARINE.

By "Ouida,"

Author of "Strathmore," "Idalia," "Under Two Flags," "Tricotrin," "Puck," etc. 12mo, fine cloth, $2.

This new story, from the powerful pen of this popular author, is fully equal, in all respects, to her previous works. It is a story of intense interest, beautifully expressed in the rich language of the gifted writer.

II.

GIDEON'S ROCK.

A Charming Story. By Katherine Saunders, author of "The High Mills," etc. With Frontispiece. 16mo, cloth, $1.

More than 100,000 copies of this masterly piece of fiction have already been sold in Great Britain. It is undoubtedly one of the most powerful and pathetic stories that has appeared in a long time.

III.

ROOKSTONE.

A Novel. By Katherine S. Macquoid, author of "Forgotten by the World," "Hester Kirton," "Patty," etc. With Illustrations. 8vo, paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1 25.

A fascinating story of English life, with an absorbing plot, charmingly told by its experienced and able author.

ALSO,

TANNER'S MIDWIFERY. Practical Midwifery and Obstetrics. (Including Anæsthetics.) By John Tanner, M.D., M.A., LL.D., etc. With 115 Illustrations. 16mo, fine cloth, $2.

THE ANTISEPTIC SYSTEM. A Treatise on Carbolic Acid and its Compounds, with an Enquiry into the Germ-theories of Putrefaction, Fermentation, and Infection, the Theory and Practice of Disinfection, and the Employment of Antiseptics in Practical Medicine and Surgery. By A. E. Sansom, M.D., etc. With numerous illustrations. 8vo, extra cloth, $5.

THE DIVINE EVOLUTION OF THE Churches; or, The New Church as the Church of Humanity—its Position and Prospects Considered. By George S. Phillips. 12mo, paper cover, 25 cents.

WEAR AND TEAR; or, Hints for the Overworked. By S. Weir Mitchell, M.D., etc. Third edition. 18mo, fine cloth, 50 cents. Paper cover, 30 cts.

This little treatise has received universal commendation. The fact that it reached the third edition within four weeks of its issue is ample evidence of its having supplied a real want.

For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price by the Publishers.

Published by J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,

715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia.

LONDON BOOKS.

We invite the attention of Book-buyers to our Stock of

RARE,

STANDARD,

AND

VALUABLE ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS,

which we offer at very low prices.

PRICED CATALOGUES

sent free of charge to any address.

A. DENHAM & CO.,

IMPORTERS OF ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS,

17 MURRAY STREET

(Near Broadway), New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1871.

The Week.

THE meeting to discuss the financial abuses in the city government was held on Monday evening, and was very crowded and enthusiastic. The most striking speech of the evening was that of Mr. Ottendorfer, the German editor, who spoke a very uncommon amount of good sense about municipal affairs, but was evidently apprehensive lest his appearance should be taken as a sign of adhesion to the Republican party. It is quite plain that nothing can be done against the Ring except by a coalition of Democrats and Republicans for this purpose, and it will be impossible to bring this about without the rigid avoidance by Republican conventions of all attempts to treat the Ring frauds as ammunition for use against the Democratic party. It may be hard to do this, but we earnestly beseech the managers to try it for once. It will matter little to most of us who rules at Washington if Hall and Tweed take all our earnings and accumulations. A committee of seventy was appointed by the meeting, whose business it will be to find out what ought to be done next, and it is well composed, or rather would be, if there were not so many Republicans on it. What can be done next is, for reasons we have given elsewhere, a knotty question. But one thing can certainly be done, and that is, get a majority in the Legislature sufficient to repeal the charter, and put the Ring out of office. We doubt if more than this can be done at present.

The committee of seventy which the meeting appointed to see what can be done, and to do it, have already begun operations. Very nearly half of them—a promising number, considering how such committees are appointed—met yesterday at an office in Nassau Street, and went to work in what seems, on the whole, a sufficiently businesslike manner. It agreed to call itself by the long name of "The Executive Committee of Citizens and Taxpayers for the Financial Reform of the City and County of New York," and it chose Mr. Henry G. Stebbins for its chairman. But it appointed an assistant-secretary on a salary —Mr. Roswell D. Hatch being the nominal secretary; it resolved on a Committee of Ways and Means; and it encouraged Mr. John Foley—and will doubtless back its encouragement with money—to bring the suit against the city authorities for which he some time since had the papers prepared. Mr. Foley will at least demonstrate how much legal measures in our Courts can help us—or else how little. His first move is to be made before his honor Judge George G. Barnard, and to see it made before that jurist will be as good as a play.

The World, we are sorry to see, was a good deal shocked by our views on a Vigilance Committee, à propos of Hall, Connolly & Co., expressed last week, and seems to think we desire to see these gentlemen "lynched." "Lynching" is, however, here a question-begging term What we say is, that in our opinion Hall, Connolly, Tweed, Barnard, and all the class to which they belong, and of which Louis Napoleon was the most conspicuous member, fear no penalty for their misdeeds except a violent death. They are indifferent to public opinion, and have matters so arranged that the penitentiary has no terrors for them, and a natural death they calculate on. But the prospect of a violent death, which would suddenly stop their champagne, knock the satin sofas from under them, shut out the velvet carpets from their view, cause their fast horses to vanish into thin air, and launch them into the cold unknown, would terrify them exceedingly, and such a death, we repeat, a large and growing body of respectable citizens think they ought to die, first and foremost, in order to stop their thieving and rid the community of them; and, secondly, to prevent the unwholesome influence on public and private morals of the spectacle of the peaceful close of their career in the enjoyment of their stealings. The way in which good citizens justify this view of their deserts is the way in which they justify all revolts against unsupportable tyranny, and all inflictions of punishment on persons who have grossly abused power for the injury of their fellow-citizens, and against whom the law affords no redress. But where they err, in our opinion, is in supposing that justice can be done on Hall and his associates through what is commonly called "a vigilance committee." An appeal to force in New York would mean civil war; and those who talk of appealing to force must make up their minds to civil war, and must be prepared for some fighting. Should they succeed in securing the persons of the malefactors, and in bringing them to punishment, their act, however, will be no more lynching than the execution of Robespierre and Rigault was lynching. It might be called high-handed, or cruel, or remorseless, or various other things, but it would have in it a solemnity which in lynch law is wanting.

The Butler campaign in Massachusetts is, owing to the increasing recklessness of the great chief himself, ceasing to be even amusing. After the invention of the falsehood about General Hawley in Springfield, and seeing it "nailed to the counter," as the Tribune says, almost as soon as uttered, the good man went off sadly to Worcester, where he resolved to try his luck again, and invented two more falsehoods—one fixing the date on which he removed Hawley for incompetency, and the other declaring that General Alonzo Alden had written to him, telling him that, had it been known that Hawley was hostile to Butler, he (Hawley) would never have been elected president of the Association of the Army of the James. Whereupon comes the remorseless Hawley, and shows that at the period at which Butler says he removed him, he (Butler) had been for one fortnight at his home in Lowell in disgrace, and General Ord in command; and then comes Alden also, and declares that he never wrote a word to Butler about Hawley. This does not leave "the Christian statesman" in a worse position than he was in before, but it makes it somewhat more awkward for his friends. What does the Reverend Doctor Marvin say now about the Boston "Christians" who are all to vote for him for the governorship, in order to get rid of rum? What does the Doctor think Christ would say, were he on earth, if the Doctor were to bring Butler up some fine morning, hot from a lying speech, and recommend him for employment as a "useful" disciple? We do not like to seem irreverent or hurt anybody's feelings, but does not the Doctor really believe "the whip of small cords" would be brought into play to sharpen both his own moral sense and Butler's?

The Republicans in Pennsylvania are in nearly as much trouble as their brethren in Massachusetts. In 1867, the Legislature passed a joint resolution to the effect that the United States was supposed to be in debt to the State; that their accounting officers, however, disallowed her claims; that a special agent should be sent to put in further evidence concerning them; and that his pay for his services should be a commission, not to exceed ten per cent. of all sums collected. It seems to have been supposed by the Legislature that the sums due were comparatively insignificant. Others, however, knew better; and on the day after the passage of the resolution Governor Geary had sent greeting to a Mr. George Evans, and made him the special agent provided for. Mr. Evans found two bondsmen in $5,000 each, and then he signed a certain agreement with the Governor, in which he stipulated to make, on oath, frequent official reports, and to pay over, "less the rate of compensation," all moneys collected by him. The rate of compensation was not mentioned. This agreement Governor Geary did not put on file, and it was not till four years after the first collection had been made that Mr. Evans made any report of his stewardship. It was not till after something else, either. Mr. Joseph McClure, Deputy Attorney-General, last month became satisfied that there was something wrong about the proceedings of Mr. Evans, and, pursuing his investigations, discovered, or was the means of the discovery, in substance, that the sums collected by Evans—or, rather, on which he got his commission—were not insignificant, but large, being close upon $3,000,000; that on about $1,300,000 of this sum he had as much right to a commission as the man in the moon; that the commission paid him was the very maximum allowed by the joint resolution; that it had been set without the knowledge of the financial officers of the State; that it had been paid Mr. Evans by Mr. Evans himself, without any auditing of his accounts by anybody, or any exhibition of vouchers that he had done any work, or, if so, how much; that some of the treasury warrants, amounting in all to about $300,000, he never paid to the State treasurer at all, whether with his commission deducted or not deducted; that he coolly put it into his pocket, as representing his commission on sums yet to be collected; that regular reports he had never made; and, finally, that Governor Geary had never alluded to all these transactions in any of his public messages.

When public attention was called to Mr. Evans, Governor Geary assured the newspaper correspondents that Mr. Evans was "a most satisfactory agent," and sent word to Attorney-General F. O. Brewster that his deputy, Mr. McClure, must resign; he had used his official position to get from the United States Treasury and the Pennsylvanian Departments official documents with a view to publication. As a matter of fact, Mr. McClure seems to have at once called the attention of the State auditor and the cashier of the State Treasury to the evidences of peculation. This was on the 8th; on the 10th he went to Philadelphia in search of his superior officer, Mr. Brewster, and on the 11th found him at Atlantic City, and gave the law-officer of the State the benefit of his discovery, at the same time telling Mr. Brewster that from what Geary had said when he knew that he (McClure) was investigating the affair, the Governor would demand his removal. He has been removed, but Governor Geary has been compelled to issue his requisition on Governor Hoffman for the delivery of Evans to Pennsylvania officers, the financial officers of that State having taken out both a civil and a criminal warrant against him—suit having been brought for the recovery of the three hundred thousand, and against Evans for embezzlement, and he having disappeared from Philadelphia. Whether he and his partners, whoever they may be, will be punished and made to disgorge may perhaps be doubted; moral guilt and legal sharp practice may turn out to be the worst that can be made of what they have done; but there is no doubt that the Republicans in Pennsylvania are not at present particularly proud of their Governor. Nobody ever charged the Pennsylvania Legislature with being more intelligent or more virtuous than ours at Albany; but the average Pennsylvanian voter has a very definite notion of the size and weight of a dollar—especially of a dollar of taxation, and his freshened sense of it will very probably be felt in October. For the moment, of course, the Pennsylvania Democrats for their parts have a detestation of crimes, and in particular of crimes against property, and public property, that would be creditable in Aristides or William Wilberforce. It really seems a little hard to have to choose between the Republican Evanses and Gearys and the Democratic Connollys. Mrs. Woodhull and her friends must make haste, or our politics will be past purification before they begin voting at all.

The condition of politics in this State is somewhat perplexing, and not altogether encouraging. There are still the two factions or "gangs" in the Republican ranks, though their dissensions are kept out of view somewhat better than they used to be. One is headed, if it can be said to have a head, by Horace Greeley, and is opposed to Grant's renomination, and contains a considerable body of what are known as "Tammany Republicans." The others, who are designated by the irreverent as "the Custom-house faction," are led on by Collector Murphy and Senator Conkling, and are devoted to the Administration. Whether they will be able to patch up their differences in time either for the State election or the Presidential election, it would take a wise man to say. Mr. Conkling, whose successor is to be chosen by the Legislature to be elected this fall, is evidently not going to stand in the way of harmony, though he is an out-and-out Grant-man. He has written a letter on the situation to Mr. Griswold, of Troy, which is as edifying as anything we remember to have read for a long time. He is in favor of "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether," he says. He speaks most contemptuously of "loaves and fishes," and thinks foul scorn of the Republican who, in a campaign like that before us, would be affected by such considerations, or who would "plot against creed or cause because the offices are too few to go around." Perish the thought! "Satan," he thinks, "cannot entrap men with so coarse and bad a snare as this." Perhaps not, but Satan is very smart. Mr. Conkling is heartily for Grant, and is deeply afflicted by the spectacle of Democratic misrule in this city. He says the rascals "infest our chief city, disgrace humanity, and mildew the commonwealth by their pestilential profligacy," which shows Hall, Connolly, and Tweed to be worse than we thought them—"mildewing the commonwealth" being a new and, we may safely say, unheard-of outrage. So Mr. Conkling is in favor of nominating and electing the best men in the Republican party for office, and he is astonished that, under the circumstances, "men should stand talking about Federal patronage, and differences among leaders, and personal feeling among individuals, and the like. What have such things," he passionately asks, "to do with the duty of the hour? It is high time," he adds, "to be done with unprofitable things, signifying nothing, and only productive of harm"—an opinion in which all good citizens will cordially concur. In short, when we read Mr. Conkling's views, and remember that he has not stood particularly high as a party politician, we are a good deal puzzled by the present low condition of humanity. When such sentiments reign in such breasts, how comes it that man is not better off?

A Maine paper has been charging Speaker Blaine with the possession of "enormous wealth, acquired through his connection with public affairs"; and the World of this city has made it the subject of an editorial article, in which, however, it graciously concedes that the possession of great wealth does not necessarily prove dishonest acquisition in his case any more than in Mr. Tweed's (Tweed of the Ring). This has provoked Mr. Blaine into doing what we must call an ill-advised thing—namely, denying the existence of a large portion of the possessions attributed to him, and indicating what the real extent of his fortune is, and from what source he derives it, and mentioning the real value and cost, and his real reason for owning a house in Washington, called by his tormentors a "princely residence." It is, undoubtedly, hard to remain silent under charges of this kind, in the existing condition of the newspaper press; but every man can tell readily whether his reputation can bear letting them go unnoticed, and Mr. Blaine need certainly have had no doubt on this point. Nobody really questions his integrity, and nobody but a blackguard would publicly pretend that he questioned it by an inquisition into Mr. Blaine's private affairs. He might, therefore, have remained silent with perfect impunity, and he owed it to the community to remain silent for two reasons; one is, that the making such attacks has the same effect on the men who make them as the taste of blood on tigers; and the other is, that the spectacle of men as strong as Mr. Blaine flying before them naturally alarms thousands of others, of whom political life would be the better, but to whom no life would be tolerable in which a man was compelled to exhibit his ledger and check-book whenever called on by a rascally reporter.

General business has been fairly active during the week. The fall trade commences early, the Southern and Southwestern buyers being noticeable for their numbers, the prudence of their purchases, and the steady improvement in the average quality of the goods required. The importations of every description are simply enormous, largely exceeding those of any previous period of our history, and clearly marking the extravagant extent to which we have devoted our labor to railroad building and other not actually productive pursuits. The great staples have been active, with some fluctuations in price and large exports, limited only by the number and size of vessels at the disposal of shippers. The shipping trade has greatly improved under the advance in freights, but, unfortunately, our tariff has left us no American ships to profit by it. Crop accounts continue fairly favorable with us, and rather unfavorable abroad, with pretty firm prices for breadstuffs. Groceries are scarce, and continue to advance. Coal, under the fear of a repetition of last year's strike, and the very general laying-in of winter supplies by the wealthy, has slightly advanced. Real estate is more active, in a somewhat spasmodic fashion, and without a steady market for any kind of property except medium-sized city dwellings in choice localities for actual use, and unimproved land in the northern suburbs for speculation. Building continues with a fair degree of activity.

The success of the so-called new loan, the uncommonly favorable debt statement on the 1st of September, and the uninterrupted ease in the money market, have materially aided the Wall Street speculators for higher prices, and stocks have had a decided advance. But the movement is confined almost exclusively to the professional operators, and the public seems indisposed to participate. Gold is firm, partly owing to speculative movements and partly from the inevitable influence of our extraordinary importations. There are not wanting experienced financiers who look with anxiety upon the artificial and complicated arrangements of the Syndicate as likely at any moment to involve the financial community in some unforeseen difficulty. Government bonds continue to advance, and great but not altogether successful efforts are being made to create a demand for the numerous railroad loans still pressing upon the market. The banks still persist in their career of expansion, and seem unable to profit by the experience of the past. There has been a great change in the character of the country's business during the last two years, and the immense gains of "finance" are shrinking to more legitimate proportions.

The principal debate on the prolongation of the powers of M. Thiers—or, as it would be perhaps more proper to say, on the extension of the powers of the National Assembly—took place on Wednesday, August 30, amid uncommon excitement on the part of the deputies, as well as of the crowded galleries. The reporter of the special committee, who, to judge by one of the very unsatisfactory Cable despatches, may not have been M. Rivet, the mover of the original proposition, but old M. Vitet, announced that the committee had agreed to receive Minister Dufaure's amendment, expressive of confidence in M. Thiers's patriotism and wisdom; and to this the corresponding announcement was made that the Government was ready to accept the decree. Thus a compromise was effected between the majority of the Assembly and the Chief of the Executive, which saved the prestige, and, for an indefinite period, continued the power, of the latter, but, in reality, subjected him more formally than he had ever been to the authority of the Assembly, whose constituent rights, embodied in the preamble of the decree, he now acknowledged. And by thus resigning the chance of appealing, with the Left, to the people and the decision of a new and uncontestedly constituent assembly, M. Thiers had made a momentous change of base, which his former supporters of the more pronounced Republican ranks violently protested against, at the same time withdrawing several amendments prepared in his favor. These opponents, however, and among them Gambetta in a highly impassioned speech, vainly endeavored to combat the obnoxious first part of the preamble, which, after a most uproarious and violent discussion, was adopted by 433 yeas to 227 nays.

The Conservatives were charmed with the result, which, of course, had been decided by the Centre, but their leading organs were wise enough to promise the support of the majority to M. Thiers's own policy, which under the altered circumstances ceased to menace a sudden triumph of radicalism through his connivance. The Radical deputies were exasperated to the highest pitch, and for a moment their resignation in a body appeared probable, but more moderate counsels seem to have prevailed. They took part in the discussions of the following day, August 31, when, after some exhortations to harmony, the remainder of the preamble and the decree proper were adopted, including M. Dufaure's paragraph in eulogy of M. Thiers, which was voted against by only thirty-four members, while "one hundred abstained from voting." Whether these hundred were all or mostly men of the Extreme Right, or, on the contrary, Radicals still meditating resignation and grumbling at M. Thiers for his submitting to the usurpation of the majority, we are not told. "President" Thiers was felicitated by the representatives of the foreign powers on assuming his new dignity. In consequence of the change, the members of his Ministry resigned, but only pro forma, resuming their portfolios at his request. The Minister of Finance was happy to announce that the third half-milliard installment of the war indemnity had been paid to the Germans, who, in consequence, are bound to evacuate the Departments of Seine—including the Paris forts—Seine-et-Oise, Seine-et-Marne, and Oise.

The trial of the eighteen members of the Commune or of the Central Committee arraigned before the Versailles court-martial—"troisième Conseil de Guerre"—has come to an end, excepting only the case of Lisbonne, delayed on account of the ill health of the accused. Ferré, a heartless and cynical amateur terrorist, of 29 years of age, and Lullier, a half-crazy would-be dictator of 31, are condemned to death; Urbain, a selfish and fierce insurrectionist, of 34, and Trinquet, an equally fierce but sincerely fanatical one, to imprisonment for life; Assi, a conceited and bold "International" conspirator, of 30, Grousset, a vain but rather gentlemanly Bohemian, of the same age, Régère, Billioray, Verdure, and Ferrat, to deportation and confinement in a fortress—for how long we are not informed; Jourde, the youngest and by far the ablest and most respectable of all, and Rastoul, like Jourde, a medical man, to simple deportation; Courbet, a weak-minded Republican, who would rather decapitate bad artistic monuments than the worst of royalists, to six months' imprisonment; Clément, a noble-hearted plebeian, to three months' imprisonment. Descamps and Parent, quite insignificant persons, are acquitted. The presiding officer, Colonel Merlin, deserves all credit for the fairness and strict judicial decorum with which he conducted the trial. Of the accused, Ferré showed himself shockingly impudent; Lullier, stupidly boastful; Assi and Trinquet, defiant; Grousset, frank; but most others did their best to escape a rigorous sentence through denials, extenuating evidence, and a frequently-displayed abhorrence of the crimes imputed to them.

It is now admitted on all hands that the meeting of Kaisers William and Francis Joseph at Ischl, and the subsequent one of Chancellors Bismarck and Beust at Gastein—in the presence of the Emperor of Germany alone—have been productive of diplomatic results calculated to ensure a harmonious action on the part of the two empires on the most important questions of Central and Eastern Europe; and that the cordial understanding already arrived at is to be made more explicit and firm at a new imperial interview, at Salzburg, where Francis Joseph is just now expected, in company of Beust and the two premiers of Austro-Hungary, Hohenwart and Andrássy. Whether Italy, more or less secretly, has or has not had a share in the preliminary agreements, or whether she is to have any in those now preparing, the despatches received here are not distinct enough to let us know. Thus much, however, seems certain, that the negotiations are highly distasteful to both Russia and France, and especially to the former, who must be horrified to see Bismarck lend a friendly arm to Austria, and secure her peace, at the very moment at which she extends the autonomy and national rights of her Polish province, and attempts to satisfy the Czechs, in order to make them renounce their affiliations with Panslavism and leanings towards Moscow. It is, however, quite possible that a partial abandonment of this attempt will follow, or even precede as a condition, the completion of the agreement with Germany.

A TREASURY VIEW OF THE FINANCES.

It has been often remarked, and with no little truth, that a considerable part of the present strength of the Republican party is due to the weakness and inability of the Democrats to perceive and take advantage of the blunders and mistakes of their opponents. How much longer this will continue to be the case is an open question; but there certainly can be no question that it is not politic for the Republican party, through its representative men, to take positions in partisan discussions which are wholly untenable, and which, sooner or later, from their inability to sustain criticism, must be abandoned. Of such a character, it seems to us, was much of the recent financial speech delivered at Sandusky, Ohio, by Hon. Columbus Delano, who, from having been for a time Commissioner of Internal Revenue, may be supposed to know something of what he was talking about.

Mr. Delano, in the outset, starts with the proposition that during the fiscal year of 1868, when the last Administration exercised full executive power, the total receipts from the internal revenue were $191,000,000; but that during the first entire fiscal year of the present Administration, notwithstanding a reduction of taxation, since 1868, of seventy-eight millions of dollars, the receipts were $185,000,000; and he claims that this remarkable gain was due almost exclusively to a more honest and efficient execution of the laws.

Unfortunately for Mr. Delano, the facts do not sustain his theory. Let us see. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, the internal revenue receipts were $191,000,000; but, during this year, taxes amounting in the aggregate, according to Mr. Delano, to over seventy-eight millions, were abated. In one single item, the reduction in the taxes on manufactures and products amounted to fifty-eight and a half millions in the receipts for the fiscal year, 1869, as compared with the receipts for the preceding year; and yet, notwithstanding this and other reductions, the total receipts for the fiscal year 1869 amounted to $160,000,000, or a falling-off of only $31,000,000. That Mr. Delano, however, is not entitled to claim for the Grant Administration the credit of this result, is shown by the fact that the first eight months of this fiscal year (1869) were under the Johnson Administration, while during the remaining four the Grant Administration exerted little other than a disturbing influence through the extensive removals and changes of officials, and had not had time to put the new machinery effectually in motion. During the next fiscal year, or from July 1, 1869, to June 30, 1870, the new administration had full control, and the revenues increased during that year to the extent of twenty-five millions, or from $160,000,000 in 1868–9 to $185,000,000 in 1869–70, and that, too, without any new abatement of taxes; so that if we attribute the increase in both instances to efficiency of administration, the balance remains in favor of the last fiscal year of the Johnson Administration, by the difference between forty-eight millions, the gain in 1868–9, and twenty-five millions, the gain in 1869–70.

But the fact is, the gain in neither of these years was due to efficiency in personal administration, but to other causes, for which neither party is entitled to claim especial credit.

In the first place, it has been noticed as one of the fiscal phenomena of our recent experience, that from the passage of the very first bill reducing internal revenue taxes in 1866 down to the present year, in no case has the revenue for the succeeding twelve months declined to an amount equivalent to the receipts from the abandoned taxes during the twelve months immediately preceding the reduction—a result which may be in part attributed to the natural elasticity of the revenues, increased by every stimulus given to production and consumption consequent upon relief from burdens; and in part, also, to a discontinuance of the frauds which were contingent upon the levying of high taxes. Ex-Commissioner Wells has shown that this natural elasticity has, since 1865, amounted to at least ten millions per annum, while in Great Britain, according to Mr. Gladstone, the average annual increase for a series of years has been in excess of eight millions.

Secondly, Mr. Delano, and others who have recently discussed this subject, overlook or ignore the fact that the major portion of the increase of revenue in 1868–9, and also in 1869–70, following the large reduction of taxes in 1868, was clearly and unmistakably due to the reduction of the taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and to the new methods instituted by which the reduced taxes on these articles were assessed and collected. Mr. Delano, in his remarks, seems to desire to convey the idea that these reduced taxes were the work of the present Administration, for he says: "During the year 1868, in which the last Administration exercised full executive power, with an excise of two dollars per gallon upon spirits, of forty cents per pound upon tobacco," the entire receipts were $191,000,000. But the truth is, that the great reductions on whiskey and tobacco were all made under the Johnson Administration, nearly four months before the election of Gen. Grant, and more than seven months before his inauguration; and the increase in revenue from both of these sources began to be experienced from the very day that the new law went into operation. For the fiscal year 1868–9, eight months Johnson and four months Grant, but practically, as we have just shown, all Johnson, the increase on distilled spirits was from eighteen to forty-five millions; on tobacco, from eighteen to twenty-three; and on sales, mainly liquors, from four to eight—making a total gain of thirty-six millions from these items alone. During the next fiscal year, 1869–70—all Grant—the increase on spirits was ten millions; on tobacco, eight; and on sales, six hundred thousand; or a total of less than nineteen millions, which sum represents all the gain in internal revenue during the first full fiscal year of the Grant and Delano Administration, with the exception of about six millions, which last may be fairly set down to the credit of natural elasticity rather than personal efficiency. In short, nearly the whole credit of internal revenue gain for the last two years, so far as personality is concerned, is due to Ex-Commissioner Wells, who first proposed and demonstrated the expediency of these reductions, and to Mr. Wells and District-Attorney Tracey, of Brooklyn, who devised the plans and essentially drafted the laws according to which the taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco are now collected; and we believe we are entirely justified in asserting that if these gentlemen had been allowed by Congress to carry out their ideas sooner, and in the manner they originally proposed, the country would have, up to this time, collected a good deal more revenue, at considerably less trouble and expense.

Mr. Delano, furthermore, in discussing this subject, omits to notice that all of these reforms were strenuously opposed in Congress by many of the very men who now on the stump are loudly claiming credit for the adoption and execution of them. When the Internal Revenue Bill of July, 1868, was before the Senate, Mr. Morton, of Indiana, in particular, was outspoken in his opposition, and voted in favor of the continuance of the two-dollar tax on distilled spirits; as did also Messrs. Anthony, Cole, Edmunds, Harlan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Pomeroy, Wade, and others. Mr. Morton, indeed, seemed to plant himself on the platform of opposition to all reforms on taxation, for in his speech opposing the reduction of the tax on distilled spirits, he used the following language: "We threw away twenty or twenty-five millions of revenue by repealing the tax on cotton totally last winter, under peculiar circumstances, and we can now see from the price of cotton and from the general promise of its production, that we acted very unwisely." In the House, also, the reduction was objected to by Thaddeus Stevens; and Mr. Boutwell, true then as now to his instincts and apprehensions, declared "that if we put the tax below fifty cents, we certainly shall be deficient in the necessary revenue to carry on the government."

Equally disingenuous is Mr. Delano's claim that the large increase of fifty-nine millions that has accrued within the last two years in the Customs revenue, is due to the "superiority of the Administration" in efficiency and honesty, as compared with the exercise of the same qualities by the Administration that preceded it, when the fact is patent to every one that the recent increase of customs revenue is due to an increase of imports, and that the only connection that the present Government can claim with these is that, by maintaining unnecessary taxes for an unreasonable extinction of the public debt, and doing nothing to improve the currency, it has favored a continuance of that state of affairs which, for the last eight years, has made the United States the very best possible market of the world for foreign nations to sell in, but the very poorest to buy from. In truth, the experience of the last ten years in respect to the collection of the revenue is rather a dangerous subject for Administration orators to deal with. Mr. Delano was Commissioner of Internal Revenue for a year or more, and gave less personal attention to the duties of his office than any commissioner that ever preceded him; while, for the last year, there has never been so little efficiency in the management of this bureau and so little sense and harmony in its rulings and decisions. Thus the income-tax, for example, has been so intentionally muddled in its workings, that what little Congress left of it has hardly paid the cost of collection; the annual receipts from distilled spirits are understood to have declined, during the past year, to an extent of at least ten millions, with no diminution but rather an increase in the quantity manufactured and consumed; while the article itself is generally understood to be purchasable in the various leading markets at a price which is either less than the cost of production plus the tax, or at rates which cannot honestly admit of any profit on its manufacture.

It is also notorious that smuggling is continually on the increase, and is probably carried on at the present time to a greater extent and more systematically along our coasts and borders than at any former period of our history. In St. John's and Halifax, the fact that a large and increasing business of this kind is going on is no longer a matter of any concealment. Tourists upon the border this summer have had continued intimations that foreign goods of value, but of comparatively little bulk, can be delivered to them at any designated point in the States for a slight advance upon the cost in the Provinces; while journeys are now avowedly taken to the British possessions and to Europe for the purpose of the purchase of clothing, the difference in the cost of a suit of clothes between Montreal and New York being more than sufficient to pay the travelling expenses between the two cities. Any one, furthermore, who has fished or sailed along the Long Island coast or Sound during the past two years, and has been cautiously inquisitive, must have abundantly satisfied himself that, if ship-building and fishing on these waters are not so productive as formerly, the fishermen have made up for their deficiencies in a way that has, in a great degree, ceased to be a mystery.

We desire, finally, to call attention to one other rather singular statement in the speech of Mr. Delano, as reported. He says:

"Observe, further, that in 1868, in the last Administration, the expenses of the Internal Revenue Bureau were $8,387,793 17, while for the first fiscal year of this Administration the same expenses were reduced to $5,916,410 22, making a gross reduction of the cost of collecting the revenue of $2,471,382 95."

Where Mr. Delano obtains the figures for the above statement we do not know; but we do know that they are not in accordance with his own official report, or the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Thus, in the Internal Revenue report for 1869, C. Delano, Commissioner, page 17, the expenses of collecting the internal revenue for the year 1868 are stated to have been $8,776,814; and for the year 1869 $7,394,395. But of this latter year, eight months were included under the Johnson Administration. For the year 1870, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, page 18, gives the actual net expenditure of "assessing and collecting internal revenue" at $7,234,531, which makes the actual decrease on a fair comparison $160,863 in place of $2,471,382.

But this method of comparing the annual expenses of the internal revenue, without making any allowance for the work done or the revenues collected, as Mr. Delano does, is obviously unfair; as every one knows that during the four years of the Johnson Administration the taxes were much more numerous and complicated, and required the services of a far greater number of officers than at present. Keeping this fact in view, we find that in 1866 and 1867, when the annual net collections were 309 millions and 263 millions respectively, the percentage cost of assessing and collection to net receipts was 2.4 for 1866, and 3.4 for 1867. But in 1869–70, the first full fiscal year of the Grant Administration, the percentage of cost to collections was 3.8; and that, too, when the number of officials in the latter year was very much less than at any time previously, whole districts having been consolidated, and the number of assessments reduced in consequence to an extent of from twenty-five to fifty per cent. We do not, however, assert that this, or any other method of comparing cost with results under the internal revenue, is in all respects fair; but since Mr. Delano has seen fit to present one side of the case for political purposes, he cannot reasonably object to our turning the picture round and showing the other side.

In short, this whole speech, which is paraded as a model of financial perspicuity, is simply a tissue of unfair, sophistical reasoning, in which results which have come about through causes entirely independent of the Administration, and in spite, as it were, of its interference, are attempted to be used for partisan purposes. The people for a time may be deceived by such financial reasoning, but in the end it will be found that such speeches as those of the Hon. Columbus Delano will, like certain old muskets, prove decidedly more dangerous to those who stand at the breech than those who are in front of the muzzle.

THE BOTTOM OF THE GREAT CITY DIFFICULTY.

THE meeting to consider the financial abuses of the government of this city, on Monday evening, was very remarkable for numbers and enthusiasm, but most remarkable for the thoughtful speech of Mr. Ottendorfer, the editor of the Staats-Zeitung. He said, and said truly, that there was little use in denouncing or abolishing the Ring if the state of things out of which rings grow was allowed to remain; if the city was to be used as a football by the two political parties; and if, he might have added, its administration was to be for ever based on a set of assumptions which everybody knows to be utterly groundless. The facts of the situation are these:

New York, according to the late census, has 71,342 native voters against 113,266 of foreign birth—a foreign majority of 41,924—the native voters being less than two-thirds of the foreign. The native vote is also affected more by sickness, absence, business engagements, and neglect; the foreign is swelled by the voters generally giving to the canvass attention, zeal, and labor, and, upon the day of election, making the success of their party their pleasure and business. Further than this, a large portion of those classed as native are in effect foreign, being merely native of the Irish or German parts of the city, and bound to the foreign vote by race, religion, and political training. Finally, the tendency of things is, that the proportion of the native vote will diminish and that of the foreign increase, the one class seeking residence in the suburbs, and the other growing denser in the town. It is manifest that, so long as the two remain opposed to each other, and the foreign vote remains undivided, the native, though a unit, must be hopelessly subject to it. As matter of fact, these votes now are opposed to each other, the foreign forming the bulk of one party, and the native forming the bulk of the other.

The voters also consist of two other classes—those who are stockholders and those who are not. For the city, though called a government, is but a corporation. Its debts are a lien upon every man's real property, and the private property of the corporators may yet be sold to pay the public debts of the corporation. It has no power, as true governments have, over the life or liberty of a resident, and has only a restricted authority over property within its corporate limits. It has a few petty powers, enabling it to make petty ordinances, in the nature of police regulations; but it cannot make laws. These powers, moreover, the legislature grants at will, and at will can take away. The object of the corporation is mainly to manage such property as is owned in common—the streets, the parks, the wharves, and the public buildings. Such being the legal status of the city, it presents the extraordinary paradox of a corporation ruled by those who are not corporators, and of corporate indebtedness incurred by those who are not responsible for its payment. New York, to all intents and purposes, is precisely like a railroad company where the passengers elect directors, appoint employees, and incur debts; but where the stockholders, though allowed to vote at the elections and to protest against the indebtedness, are a helpless minority. And it is assumed that because this railroad company is authorized by law to license pawnbrokers, and regulate the sale of liquors within its trains and upon its track, therefore the pawnbrokers, liquor-dealers, and other passengers have a natural and constitutional right to vote down the stockholders and mortgage the road.

Of the passengers who ride on this road, some are honest, many well-meaning, the mass indifferent and ignorant. In appealing to them for redress, the distant stockholders, engaged in other pursuits, and giving but little time to the management of the road, have no chance of success against the ever-present, always-active employees, who make it their daily business to retain their places by managing the passengers, cajoling one, bribing another, bullying a third. Once or twice in the modern history of the company the employees have quarrelled among themselves, thereby dividing the passenger vote, and enabling the stockholders to carry an election; but never when united have they failed to control the passenger vote and keep themselves in place. At the present time there is excitement because the employees have refused, for a long while, to let the stockholders know the amount of fares and freights collected, and the magnitude of debts incurred. The employees are calm, for they believe that the excitement merely extends to the owners of the road. They know full well that the indifferent passengers will not be greatly exercised by that which does not concern themselves, and for the most part believe that if the stockholders want help they are abundantly able to help themselves. This calmness takes expression in the assurance that the excitement will soon blow over; which means that the uninterested passengers will soon cease to listen to the complainings of the interested stockholders, and will hereafter rule the road as completely as they have ruled it heretofore. Note here that the employees also know full well that if they should limit the sale of liquor on the track, or pull down pawnbrokers' balls, or make these gentry pay for the accidents they cause, instead of compelling the innocent stockholders to foot those bills, then there would be an excitement among the passengers which would not soon blow over. Note, also, lest you confound the analogy, that the rate of fares to be charged and the number of trains to be run are not discretionary with either employees or stockholders, but regulated by law.

I. The first remedy which any sane mind would suggest to correct these abuses would be to place the funds of the city under the control of the men who contribute them: to let the corporation be controlled by those who pay its expenses, to secure to city taxpayers otherwise qualified to vote the exclusive right to vote at charter elections for charter officers, and with respect to charter liabilities. These taxpayers are not a class of society, for they differ in creed, condition, politics, opinions, and constitute what might be termed "responsible society." Having bought their way into New York, and given pledges of their interest in her welfare, it would seem that they should not be robbed of their investments, nor deprived of the inalienable right accorded to most men, to take care of their property and of themselves. But inasmuch as the directness of common sense is apt to be first regarded as theoretic, visionary, and unconstitutional; and inasmuch as there is no constitutional convention now sitting at Albany, it will be useless at this time to consider seriously so simple and efficacious a remedy.

II. The next remedy is that understood to be commended by the Tribune—the remedy which in civilized communities men are supposed to seek and be content with—a resort to courts of law. It is said that we must contemplate its efficacy with doubt. To doubt the law as the surest remedy for righting great wrongs in the places of our established civilization, is almost to acknowledge the American Republic a failure, and mankind safer under the late French Empire. If actions could be brought to recover moneys had and received, not only against officials and contractors, but also against members of the legislature, publicly charged with having received the city's money, the effect would be most healthful, no matter what the pecuniary result might be. If the country legislator disposed to be bribed was taught that he might be compelled to run the gauntlet of a lawsuit, with its expenses and exposures, and be brought into court and wrenched and shaken on the witness-stand, he would be inclined to retain the old-fashioned view of virtue and vice. But legal proceedings must be instituted by the law officers of the city and county, the Counsel for the Corporation and the District Attorney; and legal proceedings, where unscrupulous wealth is defendant, and the result doubtful and far off, need to be pressed with skill and ability and invincible resolve. Where the defendants will set up every technical defence, and, regardless of costs, interpose every obstacle and pretext, the plaintiff needs a relentless counsel, with mind and heart unchangeably fixed. Such suits also require courts with judges free to do right, looking toward the substantial ends of justice, who will not long allow pretexts to come between justice and the suitor. And they require officers to summon jurors and execute the process of the court who look to the law as their master. Whether these conditions of successful litigation can be complied with, it is hardly worth while to discuss. If there is a power called the Ring ruling New York, such as is said to exist, that power can undoubtedly replace capable officers by incapable, and honest by dishonest. Such litigation, with our defective judicial system, must be a work of years, and in the course of years so absolute a power can work great changes, if it so desire, in an elected judiciary and with elective law officers. Further investigation of the subject would speedily bring us back to the state of things previously sketched. The simple truth is, that the community of New York is not a unit in this matter, and that the responsible majority care for no such suits being brought, and desire no such result to be reached.

III. The third remedy is that which the Evening Post has advocated—a new charter—the intervention of the legislature, a provisional city government (which of course must be only temporary), and then a new "popular government," under which the people of New York shall be allowed to rule and manage the city. With all respect for that able journal, it is difficult to bring these views down to any practical application. If "popular government" means a government under which everybody votes, and the numerical majority rules, such a government the city already has. In structure it is the best the city ever had, bringing the responsibility down to a few conspicuous heads, and finally concentrating it on one. But no structure of government can be devised that will counteract of itself its own maladministration, any more than boilers can be built which drunken engineers cannot blow to pieces. That a great portion of our citizens are honest and well-meaning, having the interests of the city at heart, and being indignant at the conduct of their rulers, may be true. That the united, earnest efforts of all honest men would accomplish much, may also be true. But it is a waste of words to talk to one who has been through such battles as that, for instance, of the Tieman-Wood campaign, of seriously expecting victory, and successive future victories, from this transitory diversion of the enemy's forces. That enemy occupies an entrenched camp, with 100,000 men, well drilled and handled by experienced officers. It is proposed to attack him with 50,000 high-spirited militia, officered by patriotic gentlemen, who have never seen actual service. In cold, plain English, it is impossible. The Times, Post, and Tribune might give their entire columns to the cause, and teem with earnest and eloquent editorials for months, but there are 100,000 voters who never read Post, Tribune, or Times. Where are the 100,001 to overcome them? Arithmetic is not pleasant reading, but it cannot be refuted by rhetoric.

IV. The fourth remedy is a vigilance committee. This is a startling thing to say; but if the judiciary shall cease to administer legal justice, and the legislative power can grant no relief, the revolution of force must sooner or later follow. No community suffers for ever. The Anglo-Saxon race has never consented long to stand still and be robbed, and has cared little whether the robber was highwayman or king, corporation or parliament. In our Western towns, the vigilance committee came quickly to administer justice when the courts ceased to do so. No one can predict when the remedy of force will or will not be resorted to. New York may now be much nearer to it than most men suspect. But the resort to force would be a great and awful calamity, undeserving the name of remedy, and is enumerated here only as an incentive to find that which may bring a lasting and peaceful reform.

We suggested two weeks ago what we believe to be the best thing practicable in the existing state of public opinion in the State at large which is to furnish the majority of the legislature. That this is a radical remedy, however, we do not believe, nor do we believe that the radical remedy will be reached till sorrowful experience and much discussion shall have brought about a more rational mode of dealing with political and social problems than now prevails. The root of the trouble which now afflicts New York, and which before the close of the century will, we venture to predict, afflict every large city in the country, is to be found in our adoption and adhesion to the absurd mediæval tradition that a city is a political community and should be governed as such. A city was a political community when cities were really fortresses and the inhabitants were a garrison, constantly in arms to repel the aggressions of their neighbors in the country and resist the exactions of their own government. No such state of things prevails in our day. The inhabitants of no modern city, and especially of no commercial city, are held together by political bonds such as those which united the mediæval burghers, from whom our politicians borrow their talk about "municipal rights" and municipal independence. New York, for instance, is a place in which large numbers of merchants, traders, and manufacturers have settled for the carrying on of their business. The streets, houses, warehouses, and wharves are the implements of their business. It is their duty and their interest to keep the streets paved, drained, lighted, and swept, the piers in good repair, and the markets in good order. It ought to be left to them—that is, to the owners of houses—to do all this at their own expense and within certain limits in their own way. The vast horde of persons who swarm here to pick up a living, and who now vote away all this property, without having any direct interest in it, should have nothing to do with the management of municipal affairs any more than with those of a railroad on which they travel. They are citizens of the State. The State is bound to protect them in the enjoyment of all their political rights, on Broadway as much as on the Hudson River Railroad, and to see that the taxpayers make proper provision for their safety and comfort in their goings and comings. But calling on them to elect the city government and vote the city taxes has been for many years a ridiculous anachronism. It was sure to end, before long, in open and undisguised robbery. It has already done so, and we cannot say we are sorry. It brings us nearer to the day when we shall legislate like rational beings on the facts of human nature and of human experience.

In the meantime, the first thing to be done, and especially by the Republicans, is, as far as we can, to take municipal affairs out of party politics; and, if we may make a suggestion to our brethren of the Republican press, we will say that the first step towards this is the absolute abandonment of their much-loved theory, that a man who holds Democratic opinions must be favorable to corruption. It is true that all horse-thieves, as old Dr. Dwight said, are Democrats, but it is not true that all Democrats are horse-thieves; and we shall never have their co-operation in reform measures till we give up so considering them.

FRANCE.—THE PROLONGATION OF THE EXECUTIVE.

PARIS, August 18.

IT is a painful task to witness and to describe the state of the political world in France. In the physical world, you can fairly hope to solve a problem when you know all the properties of the definite bodies which are involved in the same phenomenon; but among Frenchmen, as among all Latin races, there seem to be no definite properties in politics, no natural elements—the molecules change continually, by a sort of mystic process, their weight, their form, their color. Take the case of Spain. The revolution which upset the corrupted government of Isabella seemed to have a very determinate object: it was made by the friends of the Duc de Montpensier, apparently to put the Duc de Montpensier on the throne, in the character of a liberal, tolerant, and constitutional sovereign. What happened in reality? As soon as the Cortes met, they split in factions; every statesman, if we can give such a name to Serrano, Prim, Olozaga, and others who are merely individuals, tried to make the best possible bargain with the new sovereign. To-day the Duc de Montpensier is in a quiet village of the Pyrenees, almost in exile, and Spain, after having looked for a king, has found one at last in Italy; but the pride of the Spanish nation suffers under a foreign dynasty, which has no association with its own history. The beginning and the end of the Spanish revolution are in contradiction with each other; they do not seem to be chapters of the same drama. Statesmanship has been fairly beaten by individualism.

Individualism is also claiming its rights in France. In an evil hour, when everything seemed lost, Thiers offered himself to France as a saviour; he was willing to sign a dishonorable peace; he asked for no high honors, for no personal distinctions; he accepted, he said, power as sacrifice, as a duty. He told the Chamber at Bordeaux that he would be nothing but its servant. If ever a Chamber could obtain an absolute sovereignty, it was that Chamber, meeting after so many disasters, when everybody had failed, when Napoleon III. was a prisoner, when the government of the 4th September had been compelled to capitulate. France was like a tabula rasa. The political edifice had been shattered to its very foundations; it was necessary to build a new one. Such at least would have been the advice of statesmanship. Real statesmen would have told the people honestly: Consult your own minds, reflect well, let us have a settled government, the government of your own free will—a real republic or a real monarchy. The national will in such a crisis ought to find no revolutionary opposition. If there is one, we will crush it without mercy in the name of all that is sacred in every country. A government so founded, when all hearts were still exalted, purified by misfortune, could have lived. If the country had freely chosen the Republic, what pretender would have denied its right and dared to put his ambition before the will of France? If it had chosen constitutional monarchy as a shelter and a better place of safety against monarchical Europe as well as against socialism, all honest republicans would have been bound to submit to such a decision. But individualism crept in and opposed any decision; it felt instinctively that a decision taken under such solemn circumstances was without appeal; and it preferred the uncertainties of an unsettled future to the certainties of a settlement.

An American mind can, I suppose, hardly understand the perverse temptations of a revolutionary state of things. Your statesmen are like married men who are faithful to their wives, and know all they have to expect from them; to our political men, politics seems like a mistress ever young and ever-changing. Each revolution may add something to their fame, to their fortune, to their influence. It has absolutely come to this that they prefer everything to a domestic status in quo. There are, of course, hundreds of deputies who think better, but they are not the leaders of opinion; they are the unknown members, whose political cowardice is even greater than their honesty. Many of them left their native towns to go to Bordeaux, fully determined to proclaim a constitutional king; but as soon as they found themselves among the Dii majores of the political Olympus, they lost their liberty. They named Thiers chief of the executive of the Republic, though they were adverse to a republic; now they are asked to name him President of the Republic for three years, and perhaps they will do it. At Bordeaux, M. Thiers told them that they must reorganize France and not reconstitute; which means that they must proclaim no definitive form of government, frame no definitive constitution. Now his friends come forward and present to the Chamber what cannot be looked upon as different from a constitution. Hitherto the powers of M. Thiers have been vague and undefined; he was nothing more than the servant of the house, a first minister charged with executive powers; and even in his executive capacity he was always subject to the orders of the Assembly. But if the Rivet proposition is voted, he will be really the president of a republic; his power will be unassailable by the Chamber during a certain period, and the Assembly will have no other method of resisting him than the suicidal method of dissolution. And, in this case, there is very little doubt that M. Thiers, remaining alone in power during the electoral period, will manage the elections exactly as the Empire used to do.

The Rivet proposition amounts, therefore, not only to the virtual proclamation of the Republic, but it institutes a republic which is more after the model of some South American governments than after the model of the United States or of Switzerland—a republic in name, a personal government in fact. Was I wrong when I said that individualism had taken the place of statesmanship among us? M. Thiers is no more willing to abandon his place to another President of the Republic than to a king. He has no real faith in the republican form of government; he has attacked it all his life. He believes it to be fitted only for semi-civilized nations; at least, he always did believe so; and it is rather singular that he should have changed his mind only when it suited his personal ambition to do so. He knows better than anybody that the great mass of the Conservatives in France dread the very name of Republic, which is identified with the Terror of the past and the Commune of the present; that after his own Republic, which he himself calls the Republic without republicans, there may come the Republic of Gambetta, which will not be without republicans, and may throw France back into the arms of a Napoleon IV. All the monarchical members of the Assembly know all this too; they must see that if they name M. Thiers President of the Republic, it will not matter much if they add that this settlement is only a temporary one. Every agitation for the monarchy will be immediately treated as a conspiracy, and even be looked upon with uneasiness by the more timid Conservatives. They have been once deceived at Bordeaux; and now, with their eyes wide open, they are drifting toward new delusions.

Correspondence.

MR. BOUTWELL AND THE "NATION."

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Do you care to know what your readers think of your writings?

Let me thank you for your good service against Butler, for he is a most contemptible demagogue, it seems to me. But I cannot understand your course toward Boutwell. I have known him personally for fourteen years, and he seems to me one of the manliest men we have in Washington. He is a "business man," for it was purely as such that he achieved his success in the Massachusetts Legislature, and was elected Governor of the State. His legal studies (formal) came later—only about ten or twelve years ago, I think.

After the doubts expressed by the Nation last spring upon the question of getting money on the new loan, when money was worth 6½ to 7, and bade fair to remain at that price (views in which I concurred), it seems to me that it would be more noble to "own up" than to be taking every means to belittle the success which Mr. Boutwell has made of it. That editorial on the "Syndicate" is certainly worthy of some member of a "first-class" banking-house not included among those solicited to aid in placing the loan. I do not suppose it was indited by any such person: but that and other articles read as if somebody "did" the finances of the Nation who was so prejudiced against Mr. Boutwell as to be incapable of doing him justice.—Very respectfully,

S. M. Freeland.

Detroit, Mich., Sept. 2, 1871.

[Our hostility to Mr. Boutwell is of long standing, as every reader of the Nation knows, and, it is perhaps well to add, is not in the least personal, but purely professional. It is now almost necessary even for a man who is pursuing a mad dog—we mean nothing disrespectful to Mr. Boutwell by this illustration—to declare loudly, in order to induce bystanders to join in the chase, that he himself has not been bitten, but is trying to kill it on public grounds. The causes of our hostility are these:

1. Mr. Boutwell's à priori unfitness for the Treasury Department, which he got for the simple and absurd reason that he was "a Radical." It is true, in the earlier part of his life he was a "business man"—that is, the keeper of a small country store; he has since been simply a professional politician; and to talk of him as a "business man," meaning thereby that his business career has been of a kind to prepare him to be the financial minister of a great nation, is highly disingenuous.

2. His steady, determined opposition, which he takes no pains to conceal, to civil service reform; his faith, which he openly avows, in the present corrupt and degrading system; and the silly arguments—such, for instance, as the usefulness of the Government offices in helping young men to enter the professions—by which he has defended it in his reports.

3. His narrowness and ignorance—as displayed in his belief, astounding in a Secretary of the Treasury, that there is no such thing as a science of political economy, and no use in statistics; in his refusal to allow the Treasury to give information to be used in legislating on the income-tax; and in his treatment of Mr. Wells, whose expulsion from office he procured, although that gentleman was the first person, and the only person, who had collected reliable information as to the economical condition of the country, for the guidance of Congress and the people, at a time of extraordinary financial perplexity.

4. His believing, or affecting to believe, that he could, if authorized, borrow $1,500,000,000 at five, four, and four and a half per cent., and procuring legislation in aid of his experiment; and his permitting reports to be circulated during a whole year afterwards, that the loan was in a fair way of being taken; and his finally issuing $200,000,000 of the above amount as a "new loan" to a "Syndicate," he well knowing that it was a small scrap of the old loan, which he was trying to place by extraordinary and still doubtful and unexplained expedients. We are very glad to have the United States borrow $200,000,000 at five per cent., but, before we praise Mr. Boutwell for bringing it about, we need to know more than we know now of the cost of the operation, of its legal correctness, and of the nature of the relations of the Treasury to the "Syndicate." On all these points there are widespread suspicions, which he would do well to clear away. And does Mr. Freeland recollect how many millions of the two hundred millions were taken by the national banks under pressure of an intimidating circular sent round to them by the Secretary's financial agents? Does he suppose that Mr. Boutwell can truthfully deny that in placing the last $70,000,000 of the $200,000,000 he has violated the law of Congress authorizing the new loan, and forbidding him to incur in placing it an expense greater than one half of one per cent. of the amount placed?

5. His failure to make any efforts for a return to specie payments.

6. His disregard of the law of the land, openly avowed in a recently made decision, in which he says:

"It is also suggested in the argument of counsel for claimant that, inasmuch as the claim has been passed by the accounting officer, the Secretary of the Treasury has no discretion in the matter, and that it is his duty to sign the warrant and to allow the payment to be made, whether or not such payment is approved by his own judgment. This theory of the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury cannot be admitted. Every Secretary of the Treasury, as I am informed, has practically recognized it to be his duty to pass upon all claims, as far as they are brought to his notice; and in no instance, in the history of the Government, has this power on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury been waived. Such is my conviction of the necessity for its occasional exercise, that I shall do nothing calculated to impair the authority of the Department in this particular."

The law on this point is the following:

"An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts,' approved March three, eighteen hundred and seventeen.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act of March three, eighteen hundred and seventeen, entitled 'An act to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts,' shall not be construed to authorize the heads of departments to change or modify the balances that may be certified to them by the Commissioner of Customs or the Comptroller of the Treasury, but that such balances, when stated by the Auditor and properly certified by the Comptroller as provided by that act, shall be taken and considered as final and conclusive upon the executive branch of the Government, and be subject to revision only by Congress or the proper courts: provided, That the head of the proper department, before signing a warrant for any balance certified to him by a comptroller, may submit to such comptroller any facts in his judgment affecting the correctness of such balance, but the decision of the Comptroller thereon shall be final and conclusive, as hereinbefore provided.

"Approved March 30, 1868."

This is plain and explicit, and certainly it should not have escaped the Secretary's notice. But to leave no room for doubt either as to the law on this subject or the practice of the Government under the law relating to it, we call attention to a little piece of history of which the Secretary is, we trust, ignorant. During the third session of the Fortieth Congress, the Second Comptroller adjusted and allowed revised claims for money due for army transportation to the payment of which the Quartermaster-General was earnestly opposed. The statute above quoted rendered the adjustments and settlements thus made final and conclusive. This was during Andrew Johnson's Administration, which was accused of something akin to contempt for statutory enactments when they stood in its way. But this statute was so plain and positive that it could not be evaded or disregarded. The Secretary of War, at the instigation of the Quartermaster-General, sent to Congress a communication suggesting that the statute be repealed or modified. That communication was, like the same same request on one or two previous occasions in our history, referred to the Committee of the House of Representatives on the Revision of the Laws, of which an excellent lawyer, Judge Poland, of Vermont, was chairman, and of which Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island, and Judge Woodward, of Pennsylvania, were members. In February, 1869, that committee made its report, a portion of which we here insert, as follows. The law, and the reason of the law, the committee thus made plain:

"By the act of March 3, 1817, the offices of accountants in the War and Navy Departments were abolished, and it was provided that thereafter 'all claims and demands whatever by the United States or against them, and all accounts whatever in which the United States are concerned, either as debtors or creditors, shall be settled and adjusted in the Treasury Department.'

"This act provided for the appointment of an additional comptroller and four auditors, making in all two comptrollers and five auditors, and entire and complete jurisdiction over the settlement and adjustment of all the claims and demands above-mentioned was vested in these officers.

"This system of settling public accounts has been in operation from 1817 to the present time.

"The act provided for no appeal to, or revision by, the Secretary of the Treasury, or the head of any department in which the claim originated, and it is evident, from the language used, that the final decision by these officers was to be conclusive, except by a resort to Congress or the courts.

"The committee are satisfied that it was the intent of the framers of the act of 1817 to establish a tribunal for the settlement and adjustment of accounts against the Government that should be wholly independent of, and in no way subject to, control or revision by those departments or officers by whom the public expenditures and liabilities are incurred.

"The special provisions of many subsequent acts show that such was the understanding of Congress. The leading principle upon which this system of accounting and adjustment was established appears to have been that all accounts, involving the expenditure and disbursement of public moneys, should be settled and adjusted by officers holding under appointments independent of the heads of departments, and who, themselves, had nothing to do with the disbursements. In short, they designed to prevent officers who made or directed the expenditure from having any voice or influence in judging of the legality or rightfulness of it, and such check was necessary to insure a judicious and honest expenditure of the public funds.

"As a general rule, this interpretation of the act of 1817 has prevailed ever since its passage. We do not find that it has ever been questioned by anybody except the War Department. There has been an occasional restiveness in that department at being subject to the decision of these accounting officers upon accounts arising in the Quartermaster-General's office.

"As early as 1823, the question was raised as to the conclusiveness of an adjudication by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department upon an account arising in the Quartermaster's Department, and the question was referred to Mr. Wirt, then Attorney-General. The whole subject was fully and exhaustively considered by him in an elaborate opinion, and the conclusion reached that the adjudication of claims by the accounting officers of the Treasury was final and conclusive, and binding upon all the executive departments of the Government.

"In the judgment of the committee, the present system of public accounting (which has worked so satisfactorily, with few interruptions, for more than half a century) ought not to be disturbed, and [it is their opinion] that the act of March 30, 1868, which was designed to prevent such interruptions in the future, was just and wise, and that no necessity exists for its repeal or modification."

Such is the law, such the reason of it, and such Mr. Boutwell's coolly avowed attitude towards it.

7. A series of evasions and misrepresentations which have issued from the Treasury Department, which we have commented on elsewhere, and of which Mr. Boutwell must bear part of the responsibility, for in all that relates to moneys and accounts, silence or acquiescence which misleads is as culpable as words which mislead.

8. His taking away the foreign banking business of the Government from the Barings, one of the greatest banking firms in the world, which had for nearly a century transacted it with probity and honor, and giving it suddenly to a new and comparatively unknown firm, which first raised its head in this city during the gold excitement of the war, and has had a footing in Europe for twelve calendar months, or thereabouts, and giving, through the columns of the press, or allowing to be given, in justification of this change, a ridiculous and utterly false story—which was formally contradicted when it first saw the light, three years ago—about the agent of the Barings knocking Mr. Seward up in the night, during the war, to get payment of a small balance which the State Department had overdrawn.—Ed. Nation.]

MILTON'S VIEWS OF CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I was somewhat surprised to find in the Nation of August 10 the inexact statement that John Milton was a Presbyterian. We have abundant proof that he was, like Cromwell, doctrinally and politically an Independent. Dexter and other writers on Congregational polity refer to him as one of their modern authorities. His "Christian Doctrine," and other works on church order, maintain views now recognized as substantially Congregational.

But this error is one of political history as well as of church order. It is one very like that which Dr. Bacon corrects when he discriminates between the Puritans and the Plymouth Pilgrims. There was a considerable opposition in views and conduct between Presbyterians and Independents in the years immediately preceding and following the death of King Charles. Milton's views on one point of division are tersely summed up in that famous line:

"New Presbyter is but Old Priest writ large."

The death of the king was demanded by the Independents and opposed by the Presbyterians. Milton not only defended the act when accomplished, in his two "Defences," but wrote just previous his "Tenure of Kings and Magistrates," designed, in part, to show that the Presbyterians had acted inconsistently. Other passages in his writings are of the same purport. F. Hurd.

Orford, Iowa, Aug. 17, 1871.

[Mr. Masson says, p. 376: "It [the pamphlet entitled 'The Reason of Church Government urged against Prelaty,' published in 1641] informs us that Milton was at this time a kind of Presbyterian. The form of church government which he then desired to see set up in England was one somewhat after the model of the Presbyterian Kirk of Scotland, as restored by Henderson and the Glasgow Assembly of 1638. As this is a fact not generally recognized, and as Milton afterwards snapped his connection with Presbyterianism and turned round upon it with fury as no better than Episcopacy, it may be well to bring the matter out by specific quotation.

"At the very outset of his pamphlet Milton declares the question respecting church government to be 'whether it ought to be Presbyterial or Prelatical'; nay, shortly afterwards (chap. iii.) he has a sentence which shows that, at this time, there was little thought, either in his mind or in that of people round him, of the possibility of any form of church government that should not be definable as the one or the other of these two. 'This position,' he says, 'is to be first laid down as granted, that one of these two, and none other, is of God's ordaining.'" It probably will not require argument to show that Milton was not an Episcopalian. . . . But he is more specific," Mr. Masson says further on. "Not only does he think of councils or general assemblies over a whole country as the court of last resort in cases of church dispute, but he thinks of such assemblies as constituted or led up to by smaller and more local bodies, each acting on the same principle of free debate and vote. 'Of such a council as this,' he says, speaking of a council of the church over a large tract of territory, 'every parochial consistory is a right homogeneous and constituting part; being in itself, as it were, a little synod.'"

This is being "a pronounced Presbyterian." Undoubtedly it would have been better if we had added, "at this period of his life." But a glance at the context will show that we had in mind his views on doctrine, not on discipline. We are glad, however, of this opportunity to bring out a point which we did not make sufficiently clear in our former article.—Ed. Nation.]

THE FEDERAL ARMY'S INTERFERENCE IN LOUISIANA POLITICS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The demand you make in the first article of your issue of the 24th inst. for the removal of Marshal Packard and Collector Casey clearly shows that you were not in possession of as accurate information regarding the "musket mistake" as was at your command when, in a following article, you forcibly proved the carpet-bag government of this State to be a curse alike to our people and the Republican party, by simply stating one of the many truthful charges that are made against it. Before the supposition you start out with is made, you must know that the troops were technically in the custom-house to "protect the Government property," but really to overawe the "Thugs" of 1866, who, under various guises, had been employed by the Governor, through his supporters, to enable him to browbeat the Dunn majority upon the temporary organization and gain control of the convention by appointing a committee on credentials who would not hesitate to seat a sufficient number of his bogus delegates to let him have his own way. Every well-informed man in the city of New Orleans, of whatever party, will tell you that the presence of those troops prevented a riot. But as the troops could not have been legally used to protect the lives of the Dunn delegates, even had a riot taken place, the Marshal got over the difficulty by employing, without expense to the Government, a large number of deputy marshals to "protect the United States Court room" (and doubtless to fight if necessary), and ordered them to admit no one until half an hour before the hour fixed for the meeting of the convention, and then to admit only those having tickets. Every delegate, and every pretended delegate, received a ticket, thus admitting to the hall only those persons claiming seats in the convention. This was as fair for one side as the other, and had the excellent object in view of excluding the dreaded Thugs. "Warmoth and his Republicans needed" no "nerve" to enforce their right to enter the convention hall; they needed the desire to do it under circumstances that would give the other wing immunity from intimidation. Warmoth came to the hall as a contesting delegate, with his ticket in his hand, two hours before the time, and was told he would have to wait until the hour for opening the hall should arrive, the same thing that was told, under precisely the same circumstances, to more than forty Dunn delegates. With this pretext, this chief of intimidators drew off and sent up a howl of "military intimidation," which has been re-echoed and magnified by newspapers whose inaccurate knowledge of our dreadful situation, or whose overweening desire to make a point against Gen. Grant, have led them to give their great support to the carpet-bag oppressor of the honest but misused and misrepresented colored masses. You of the North must remember that all that money power and brains can do to deceive you in regard to the deplorable condition of Louisiana affairs has been and will be done. You must know that the Dunn party embraces almost every colored man in the State, except a few leaders, who are jealous of Dunn, and hold lucrative positions under Warmoth, but that it is very poor, has no newspaper, and no powerful friend save Grant. This "Dunn movement" is a rebellion on the part of these betrayed black men against Mr. Greeley's "thieving carpet-baggers," and whoever insists upon the removal of Marshal Packard and Collector Casey practically insists upon perpetuating the almost dictatorial power which that class of adventurers have concentrated into the hands of their ingenious chief, the Governor. I was a Dunn delegate, and I earnestly declare I never would have trusted my life near the convention had it assembled at any other place in the city, or without the precaution taken by Marshal Packard, who would doubtless gladly suffer decapitation in order to win the crown of a martyr to honesty and with it the next Governorship of the State. But what I started out to ask the Nation is this: Knowing, as the Dunn men did certainly know, that unless troops were present they would either have to suffer intimidation and see their slim majority overruled by fraud, or be killed, what should they have done? Does it pay to wait until you are killed before you appeal for protection from the threats of your legally constituted protector? If a "loyal" Governor unquestionably demands of a political convention an endorsement of himself or the blood of its members, should the convention appeal to the President for protecting troops and Gatling guns, or submit to the Governor's practical dictatorship? Should the President remove the Marshal for having the nerve to risk his official and physical head in behalf of the people and liberty, or should he merely reprove him for not appealing directly to the President and squarely stating the purpose for which the troops were wanted? In a State where the entire legislative and judicial departments are despotically concentrated into the hands of a usurping Governor, if the General Government cannot at any time, and under any circumstances, protect the lives of any of its citizens against anybody, be he a Governor, what is the use of having a flag or a President? In short, "are we a nation?" I will close with the prediction that when this farce has sufficiently disclosed the venality of our carpet-bag government to force the national Republican party to repudiate it, and side with the colored men and the taxpaying whites against it, you will then acknowledge that those forty soldiers at the Custom-house have won a bloodless victory for the cause of genuine liberty, second only in importance to the taking of Vicksburg or the surrender of Lee.

A Carpet-Bagger.

New Orleans, August 28, 1871.

Notes.

Two prolific New England families, the Lymans and the Howes, have lately held reunions at the homes of their forefathers, in pursuance of a custom which may now almost be called time-honored, and which will certainly be confirmed by these rather notable observances of it. The origin of this (if we are not mistaken) peculiarly Yankee notion is doubtless traceable to the genealogies and town histories upon which New Englanders have bestowed unparalleled industry and research. But these have only fostered a feeling which must have existed previously, and by virtue of which two men of the same name could not meet each other without enquiring into their relationship, and doing their best to connect themselves with one or other of the four brothers (the Howe tradition variously gave from four to nine) who came over to this country from England. Doubtless, too, this feeling coexisted with a prejudice against giving publicity to family details, some of which were and deserved to remain family secrets, which no one would be justified in putting into print. The New England Historical and Genealogical Society encountered a great deal of this sort of opposition at the start, but the shelves of its library show how thoroughly it overcame it. The family conventions now go a step further, even, for a man may confess his kinship with another and see it published with indifference, and yet have a very decided objection to making his acquaintance or sitting under the same tent and at the same table with him, and celebrating the accident of a common name. No such scruples, apparently, marred the harmony of the two most recent gatherings, and we are bound to conclude that they were useful as social festivities, and as binding together by a natural and honorable tie those whom the great New England swarming has dispersed to all parts of the continent. We only regret that no appearance upon the scene was made by Mr. Wm. Parsons Lunt, of Boston, or his agent, offering for sale the very ingenious and too little known invention of Mr. Wm. H. Whitmore, called "Ancestral Tablets," the most tempting blank record ever devised to promote attention to genealogy. Mr. Lunt's limited edition could scarcely have satisfied the probable demand for this publication of his.

—Following the example of the other magazines, and "having considered the great number of requests which have been made for illustrated articles, and having already secured a number of competent artists," the Overland will in future be, to a greater or less extent, an illustrated magazine. The publishers intend to give pictures only of such places and objects as will have special interest for readers on both sides of the Atlantic. Inasmuch as California is rich in places, and objects, and personages which have special interest for outsiders, no requisite for the success of the new enterprise is wanting, except, first, the competent artists, about whom the publishers seem to be so sanguine; and then competent engravers, who shall not do what a large majority of our Eastern engravers do—spoil the artist's design, namely; and then competent printers, who shall not do as our Eastern printers do—assist the engravers to interpose thick darkness between the public and the artist. Take the best of our Eastern engravers, and much of an improvement as his work is over that of most of his brethren, he still runs the one ploughshare over everything in a way to agonize most artists. This is partly the artists' fault, to be sure, who will not be brought not to expect too much from engraving, nor to work for the block intelligently; but engravers and printers are largely to blame. The September Overland, in which we find this announcement—and which usually comes to hand a little late for notice with the other magazines—will be found pleasant and interesting. Mrs. Yelverton continues her account of the sisterhood among whom she lived while her husband was with his regiment before Sebastopol, and, although it is not to be called exciting, it may be read with pleasure, because of the fortunate subject, to say nothing of the interest attaching to the writer. "Shakes" is a proof of Mr. Bret Harte's popularity; but the imitation, while giving sufficient proof of that writer's imitableness, is but indifferent, and the story is poor. Its publication and the inferiority of the book-reviews show that the editorial work is done with less care than when Mr. Harte was the Overland's editor. Nevertheless, the magazine is, on the whole, and in its essential features, as worthy of attention as at any previous time. Senator Cole writes well about Turk's Island and the salt-makers; and Miss Josephine Clifford's description of her trip to Texas is agreeable reading. Some of the matter is distinctly padding; but "The Parks of London" and "Hobbies and their Riders" will nevertheless be liked a little, and in "Queer Sights and Ways in Peking" there is something new. An article concerning Puget Sound, another about "Captain Hall's Arctic Expedition," another about Brigham Young, and one entitled "An Ornithologist in Mexico," together with some verses, make up the magazine, which has, it will be seen, a varied table of contents, and may properly be commended as not bad reading for the railroad and steamboat. Those who are not tired of the Mormon question will find in the September Harper's a better article than the one in the Overland, though neither is good, both being obscure, and lacking in fulness as well as clearness. So far as we can make out, it yearly becomes plainer that the success of Mormonism is very intimately connected with Brigham Young's continuance in life, and that, whether Young lives or dies, the prospect is good for its burial in the mines which are now rapidly opening in Utah. United States laws and officials, too, as well as the swarms of Gentile miners carried to Utah by the railroad, which has destroyed the isolation of the prophet, are assisting in the ruin of Young's polity, and some of his saints are in open rebellion against him. All signs indicate the speedy downfall of the system. The writer in the Overland is a woman, and, like other female observers in Utah, asserts the unhappiness of the Mormon women. It is, doubtless, too late to say anything to Mrs. S. M. B. Piatt as to her way of making her verses perfectly enigmatical. We defy any one to understand her poem in this Overland.

—John Lyly, or Lilly—whom most of our readers will know for his song of "Cupid and My Campaspe played at cards for kisses"—will be less known to some of them as the clever author of "Euphues, the Anatomy of Wit," and "Euphues and his England," than as the person whom Scott thought he was ridiculing when he depicted the fantastic and pedantically quaint courtier, Sir Piercie Shafton, and whom Shakespeare, it is commonly said, ridicules in his Don Adriano de Armado, in "Love's Labor Lost." A recent English work makes it doubtful if Shakespeare did not, on the contrary, much admire Lyly. Certainly, if imitation, which is held to be the most delicate flattery, because the sincerest, may be taken as evidence of admiration, Shakespeare thought well of Euphues. This is well pointed out by Mr. William Rushton, who, in his "Shakspeare's Euphuism," recently published by Longmans & Co., collates passages in the plays with parallel passages from Lyly's books. Thus, in the advice of Euphues to Philautas, Euphues says, "Be not lavish in thy tongue"; and Polonius says to Laertes in "Hamlet," "Give thy thoughts no tongue." Euphues says, "Be not quarellous for every light occasion; they [the English] never fight without provoking, and once provoked, they never cease." Polonius says, "Beware of entrance to a quarrel; but being in, bear't that the opposed may beware of thee." Shakspeare was too good an Englishman to bestow the praise of never giving over on the French. Euphues says, "It shall there be better to hear what they say than to speak what thou thinkest"; and Polonius says, "Give every man thine ear, but few thy voice." In most of these cases, Shakspeare has clearly bettered his instruction, but as clearly he had it; and it was worth having.

—In all this there is nothing of Sir Piercie Shafton, nor of Armado. We may here remark that a far better critical opinion than that which identifies Lyly with Shakespeare's Don Adriano, makes the Don and likewise his companion in folly, the schoolmaster Holofernes, to be the caricature portraits of the "Resolute" John Florio, dictionary-maker, tutor, and courtier. As courtier he is the Don, as teacher Holofernes; and Shakespeare, it seems probable, brought his foolish figure on the stage less for anything truly valuable to a comedy-maker that he saw in him, than because Florio had seen fit to attack the English theatre. But in other parts of Lyly we may see, not indeed the utmost degree of the fault which Shakespeare satirized, but a degree of it which, when exaggerated by imitators of less brains than Lyly, would hardly be much caricatured in the speeches of the Don. Doubtless Lyly himself was disposed by nature and education to set manner above matter, and his inclination was increased by the rudeness of speech which he observed everywhere about him. Examples of his elaborate quaintness are well given by Dr. R. F. Weymouth, the author of a lecture entitled "On Euphuism"—published in London by Asher & Co.—who, says the Pall Mall Gazette, has discovered and made clear what Morley, Marsh, and Craik have failed to see—namely, that the special character of the antithesis which is a principal feature of Lyly's style, is the combination with it of artful alliteration, so as to make the corresponding word in the same clauses of his sentences begin with the same letter, thus producing "a transverse alliteration rather than longitudinal." For example, take a quotation from the title-page of "Euphues and his England:" "Delightful to be *r*ead and nothing hurtful to be *r*egarded, wherein there is small *o*ffence by *l*ightness given to the *w*ise and less *o*ccasion of *l*ooseness proffered to the *w*anton." Consonance also Lyly affected, as in delight*ful*, hurt*ful*; light*ness*, loose*ness*. Far-fetched allusion was another thing that helped him to his ruin. For further specimens of Shakspeare's indebtedness to Lyly, compare his "Most subject is the fattest soil to weeds," with Lyly's saying that "the fattest ground brings forth nothing but weeds." This, to be sure, might well be a common proverb. But hardly so in this case: Shakespeare says, 'Far from her nest the lapwing cries away"; Lyly, "The lapwing flyeth with a false cry far from their (the young lapwings') nest." "One drop of poison disperseth itself into every vein," says Lyly; Shakespeare has it, "A dram of poison will disperse itself through all the veins"; Lyly, "Women either love entirely or hate deadly"; Shakespeare, "If she did not hate him deadly she would love him dearly." Both Mr. Rushton's and Doctor Weymouth's works will be welcomed—the one more warmly, perhaps, by the strictly Shakspearian scholar, but both by the general student of literature.

—Mr. Rushton's book above mentioned will rouse in some minds the question of how far authors are justified in taking other men's thoughts and expressions and using them as if their own. Saying that "wherever he found anything addressed to William Shakespeare he took it without scruple," or that "Molière took his own goods wherever he found them," is to say the truth, no doubt, but still leaves us without a rule for trying the merits of a case of plagiarism. Take, for instance, Mr. Charles Reade's case. The plot of his recent novel he got, as a correspondent of the Nation has shown, from a forgotten English novel. A correspondent of the Times has shown, that all of Mr. Reade's curious description of a machine for governing the thoughts and feelings of distant persons whom the malignant owners of the machine might wish to torture, he has simply "lifted" from a book written by a real lunatic, who published his crazy dream in London some years ago. No wonder the Athenæum's critic found this part of "A Terrible Temptation" very creditable to Mr. Reade's imaginative power, and almost as if it had been written by a madman. Still another correspondent writes to us, that all that portion of Mr. Reade's novel called "Put Yourself in his Place" which details the breaking of a dam and [the rush of the water down a valley which it devastates in its course, preceded by a wild cry of warning, closely resembles a passage in a novel written years ago by still another author, and republished last year by Harper & Brothers, under a title changed from something else to "A Beggar on Horseback." And so of others of his books. Now, was it right for Mr. Reade to put himself into such a position as to get credit for abilities which he may or may not possess? This is what he did when he eviscerated the madman's book. May we "convey" from everybody except those so rich that we cannot ruin them by our filching? May we take what we like, on condition only that we make a better use of it than the original owner? Something like this last would seem to be the rule; the penalty for violating it perhaps being that, by-and-by, some one comes, points out your borrowings, and shows that, no matter how great you may be, you are no miracle; that there are no independent fountains in the history of the human intellect, but rather a continuous stream, fed by rain-drops and every little brook that evaporation and condensation feed; that the makers of moralities, and the interlude-makers, and the playwrights, and euphuists, and novelists, and a people hungry for drama and a time favorable to its production, must first exist and work and unite before a Shakespeare for instance is possible.

—The speeches at the Scott celebration in Edinburgh were not particularly felicitous, but were fairly good; as good as was to be expected. Sir William Maxwell-Stirling spoke to the toast of the evening in a set oration, too biographical and full of details, but in which was collected some information not very generally known. Thus, he stated that when land is to be sold in any district of the Scott countries [in Great Britain, we presume], the novelist's scenes and characters therewith connected, and even his passing allusions, are carefully chronicled in the advertisements, and duly inventoried in the title-deeds of the estate. On coming to speak of the voluminousness of Scott's works, and the rapidity and ease with which he wrote, the orator remarked that two acute and competent observers, Hazlitt, the critic, and Captain Basil Hall, were inclined to attribute to him something of supernatural power—an assertion which, as oratorical, we may suffer to pass, especially as the orator added that Captain Hall, who kept a copious diary, observed that once, when at Abbotsford, he himself wrote in a day about as much manuscript as Scott considered a fair day's work, and so ceased to marvel. Quality, however, as well as quantity, Captain Hall should have taken into account. As Scott once said to his amanuensis, Willie Laidlaw—who, in his impatience to hear what was coming, would say, "Come, sir, get on, get on"—"Hout, Willie, ye forget I have to invent the story." It is true that much of Scott's English is the English of dictation, and not of careful composition, and that James Ballantyne was a proof-reader out of ten thousand and very serviceable to his great friend, but still neither in matter nor manner were the novels, even as first written, very much like Captain Hall's "copious journals." Sir William went on to speak of Scott's personal character, justly remarking that the long story of his life adds no incident to the quarrels of authors, and doubted if the whole "Biographie Universelle" could furnish a single name which would show so fair, if the life belonging to it were all unrolled year by year, as Scott's has been. We do, in fact, know more about Scott, told by more people of various kinds, than of any other of our authors, unless, by possibility, we are to except Johnson. He concluded by recalling to the minds of his audience that within the lifetime of Scott died Clive and Hastings, the founders of the British Empire in India; Chatham, the great minister; Pitt, "the pilot who weathered the storm," and Fox, his great rival, the English Demosthenes; Nelson, the great admiral, and Wellington; Burke, Canning, and a host of poets, scholars, philosophers, and inventors, and that of all these only two had been thought worthy of national recognition, both Scotchmen, Burns and Scott —a statement naturally received with much cheering. Sir William was followed by the Lord-Justice Clerk, who occupied most of his time in comparing Scotch humor with English, and said, among other things, that Sydney Smith's assertion that a surgical operation was necessary if a joke were to be got into a Scotchman's head, was "a good jest, indeed," coming from a man who had dined with Scott and Wilson, and suggested that the scalpel was necessary only when the joke was an English joke. This retort, by the way, is not a bad specimen of the Scottish jest, which is very apt to have for its characteristic feature more or less brutality of attack on some one of whom it is designed to get the better. A Scotch joke that hurts no one's feelings is comparatively a rare thing. This sardonic and somewhat cruel character of Scotch wit, and the matter-of-fact literalness of the Scotch mind, it was that Smith, whose own humor was delightfully playful and sunny, in all probability had in view when he made his criticism—a criticism fully confirmed by the other great humorist of the period, Charles Lamb. Wilson, to be sure, could be riotously humorous, and his Ettrick Shepherd is certainly a fine humorous creation. But it by no means pleased the Shepherd, we are to remember; and Mrs. Hogg's appreciation of it, and her dislike of that way of treating "Mr. Hogg," were characteristically Scotch, solemn and literal. Then we are to remember, too, how large a part of Wilson's recorded humor and wit—and Burns's too, for that matter—is directed against his political and other enemies. Neither the playfulness and subtleness nor the charity of the English humor, nor the archness, breadth, and grotesqueness of Irish humor, are very large constituent parts of the humor of the more prosaic fellow-subjects of the Irishman and Englishman.

—Sir William Maxwell-Stirling's statement of the fact that of all their distinguished contemporaries, only Scott and Burns, both Scotchmen, were deemed worthy of national commemoration—which is, of course, to be understood of commemoration by centennial banquets—has set the English papers to discussing why it should be that the Scott celebration was so much colder an affair than the Burns celebration, and they put forth various reasons. One says that in politics Scott was a hard Tory, and, in point of religion, was a churchman, and that he thus lost much of the liking of the vast majority of his countrymen. The same writer argues that the prevailing impression made by the story of Scott's life is a melancholy one, he having entirely failed to realize the object of his ambition, and found a county family, and having been killed by his attempts to pay heavy debts incurred in a scheme more romantic than wise. Another favors the opinion that Scott himself was of a melancholy cast of mind, and points out the numerous passages in the novels and the poems where he dwells on death—by preference, to be sure, on the externals of death; as hearses, the appearance of the grave, the trappings and observances of funerals, the mourning of the relatives. It cites many passages, though it omits one of the best—as being poetical and beautiful, as well as very suggestive of the sadness of death—the poem beginning,

> "Proud Maisie in yonder wood > Walking so early,"

and the showing which the writer makes for his case is not unimpressive. Claverhouse, too, with his expressed inability to understand how men should make so much account of life, and the taking of life, is another strong witness for our writer, for certainly that view is not an unmelancholy one. Still, however fond Scott may have been of the Gothic glooms of death, and its outward pomps, it will be difficult to persuade people that his poetry and fiction are not cheerful, the reverse of depressing, and that they do not in this reflect faithfully his own disposition and habit of mind. So it seems to us. A truer explanation than any of these of the fact that Burns calls out a greater degree of enthusiasm than Scott—for that it is a fact must, no doubt, be admitted—we take to be that the enthusiasm for Burns is in large part called out of other people than the more literate and restrained classes who make the majority of Scott's admirers. This the Spectator very well points out. At "Burns Celebrations," so far as we know them in this country, the admirers of the poet assembled to do him honor would, at least, not object very strongly, nor, indeed, think it at all strange, if a good majority of the company present were to go home a little drunk, and singing, "Willie brewed a peck o' maut." It is further to be said that no doubt Burns's strength as well as his weaknesses are nearer to the popular heart, and to the universal heart—appeal more strongly to the affections, than the strength and weaknesses of Scott. To be a great story-teller, and to have a weakness for building a castellated Gothic mansion and founding a county family, is to be further from the popular heart than to have a gift of writing the tenderest songs of simple affection, and the warmest and archest songs of gallantry, and the most singable of headlong bacchanalian songs. To be a master of coarse and stinging satire for hypocritical and pharisaic godliness; to have the humor of "Tam O'Shanter" and the untheological piety of the "Cottar's Saturday Night"; to have at once the kind-heartedness of the "Lines to a Mouse," the somewhat too aggressive independence of "A Man's a Man for a' that," the patriotic fervor of "Scots Wha Ha'e," the healthy pensiveness of sentiment of "Auld Lang Syne," the tender purity of the verses "To Mary in Heaven," and, furthermore, to have habits of drunkenness, of indiscriminate fondness for "the lasses," and of ready good-fellowship, is certainly to be surer of a centennial celebration of one's birthday, and, perhaps, is to deserve it better—for the value of centennial celebrations is not a precisely ascertained matter—than to have been a world-renowned teller of historical romances and popular tales, and a man of pure life and business habits.

—The well-known geographer, H. Kiepert, contributes to the last number of the Berlin Zeitschrift für Erdkunde an article on the exchange of territory by which, in the final peace negotiations, Germany ceded back to France a large part of the Haut-Rhin Department adjoining Belfort, and gained a small portion of the Briey arrondissement adjoining Luxemburg. Incidentally, he has something of interest to say on the question, How should the Germans henceforth denominate the duchy just mentioned, and how their new boundary, the Vosges Mountains? It appears from his discussion of the name that Luxemburg in its earliest form (963) was Lucilinburgh, later (1065) Liutzilenburc, the iu of the first syllable being equivalent to ü, meaning the little town—the adjective being still better preserved in a small railroad station not far from Pfalzburg, viz., Lützelberg. German books were printed at Lutzenburg after 1598, at Lützemburg after 1623; and as late as 1795 the latter was the only official form under both the Spanish and Austrian régimes. The French form Luxembourg is as old as 1451, and it survived the political changes of 1839, which re-established the connections of the duchy with Germany. Herr Kiepert is strongly in favor of at least retaining the ü, if no part else of the ancient name. As for Vogesen, he declares it a monstrous perversion of the original appellation of the Vosges Mountains —seeming to add a German plural in en to the French plural in es. He would lay stress upon the short syllable in the Celtic Roman form Vosăgus or Voseğus, and the German name he pronounces in favor of is either the Wasgauisches Gebirge or simply the Wasgenwald. For his part, he has for years suppressed on his maps the bastard word Vogesen. It dates, by the way, from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and was the creation of false scholarship, not a popular outgrowth.

THE EARLY WRITINGS OF JANE AUSTEN.*

A YEAR or two ago we had occasion to review the memoir of Jane Austen, just then published by her nephew, the Rev. J. E. Austen-Leigh, the present Vicar of Bray. In that work he told us of certain early writings of Miss Austen, which she had thought unworthy of publication, but which were still extant in manuscript. Her numerous admirers, on both sides of the Atlantic—more enthusiastic than numerous—were eagerly curious to see these first attempts of so remarkable a genius, and, by private letter and through the press, their wishes were urged warmly upon her excellent biographer, who has now kindly yielded to them. He has lately published a new edition of the memoir—slightly enlarged—and added to it the fragments in question, together with a short but complete story entitled "Lady Susan." It is not likely that any of the devotees of the Austen faith expected that these juvenile prolusions should be equally perfect with the works she had finished to her own contentment and sent into the world. If they were thus unreasonable, they will have been disappointed by the granting of their prayers. But if they only looked for the first sprightly runnings of her exquisite fancy and the earliest promise of her inimitable artistic touch, they will thank Mr. Austen-Leigh for the gift he has bestowed upon them and upon the world. Their absolute merit is certainly but moderate; but, considered as the first trials of the pencil of so wonderful a painter of the scenes and people of daily life, they certainly possess a very high degree of interest.

* "A Memoir of Jane Austen. By her Nephew, J. Austen-Leigh." Second edition. To this is added "Lady Susan," and fragments of two other unfinished tales, by Miss Austen. London: Bentley.

The suppressed chapter of "Persuasion," containing the denouement of that admirable novel as originally drafted, is altogether the most interesting of these remains. We think it furnishes, in connection with the conclusion which replaces it in the published work, a most satisfactory refutation of the suggestion that this exquisite fiction betrays symptoms of failing mental as well as bodily conditions. In our judgment, there is no part of any of Miss Austin's novels that shows stronger marks of the hand of the consummate artist than the winding up of "Persuasion," and the natural yet unexpected way in which the hero and heroine come out of complications in which they have been entangled, and into the understanding which happily concludes the whole matter. The change from her first plan which is now made known to us shows that, in this last effort of her genius, her imagination was as vivid and her judgment as true as at any previous period of her authorship. As originally planned, the conclusion was briefly this. Admiral Croft meets Anne Elliot the morning after the concert, and prevails on her to call on his wife—reluctantly, from the fear that Captain Wentworth may be with his sister. The Admiral assures her that Mrs. Croft is alone, not considering his brother-in-law as anybody to be excepted. Captain Wentworth is there, and is employed by the Admiral to inform Anne that if the report be true that she is going to marry her cousin, Mr. Elliot, he will cheerfully surrender the lease of Kellynch, as he supposes they would wish to live there. The long-estranged lovers are left together. The first question leads to a denial of any intention of marrying Mr. Elliot, on which hint Captain Wentworth speaks, and all goes well. Any one familiar with the closing chapters of the book as they stand will see how much would have been lost had it ended thus—the visit of the Musgraves to Bath, the scenes at the White Hart, the conversation of Captain Harville and Anne, which led to the renewed offer of Wentworth—and we are sure will feel with us that the near approach of death had thrown no shadow over the brilliant mind of Jane Austen.

We think no one would have augured her great success as a painter of common life from any of the other of these sketches. "Lady Susan," which is hardly a sketch, being a completed picture of small size, is entirely unworthy of Miss Austen's hand. Had it been the last, instead of one of the earliest of her attempts, it might have given color to the suggestion that her mind had suffered as well as her body from the inroads of consumption. It is thoroughly unpleasant in its characters and its details, and worked out with none of the skill that conceals itself which was Miss Austen's eminent gift. Lady Susan is heartless, cruel, tyrannical, coarse, with no redeeming qualities, and there is no life or color in any of the subordinate characters. The unchristened sketch, which Mr. Austin-Leigh calls "The Watsons," from the name of the family of the heroine, contains some glimpses of the talent which developed itself later, but only glimpses, and none that would suggest the promise of its later fulness. The editor infers from the date of the water-mark of the paper of the manuscript that it must have been written early in this century, and, consequently, after "Pride and Prejudice," "Sense and Sensibility," and "Northanger Abbey." We think that Miss Austen must have copied it at that time from an earlier draft, as it is hardly possible that these pale phantoms, with their bald and stilted talk, could have issued from a brain which had created the flesh-and-blood creatures, living, moving, and speaking like men and women of this world, that she has made the companions and friends of her readers for life. She probably perceived how inferior the workmanship of these juvenile productions was to that of the works she had completed, and wisely relegated them to her desk as unworthy to see the light. "The Watsons" contains perhaps a suggestion of Mrs. Elton, possibly of Mr. Woodhouse and of Frank Churchill, but one that only suggests the vast difference between the earliest conception and the finished portraiture. But while we regard these juvenilia of Miss Austen as thus inferior to her finished works, we would not imply that her nephew erred in giving them to the world. The fame of his immortal relative is too well established to be affected by the proof that her genius was of a gradual development, while her good judgment and good sense are shown in her perfect appreciation of the relative merits of her writings. She is not one of those perverse geniuses that persist in thinking the most rickety and worst-conditioned of their literary offspring the strongest and the comeliest of them all. In common with the other admirers of Miss Austen, we desire to thank Mr. Austen-Leigh for the sight he has given us of the first efforts of her infant genius, as a part of his most interesting sketch of her life and character.

Miss Austen's literary fate was an odd one. Though all her novels, excepting "Persuasion" and "Northanger Abbey," were published during her lifetime—"Sense and Sensibility" six years before her death—her fame may almost be said to have been a posthumous one. Her works brought her little of the general notoriety and none of the famous friends which had rewarded the efforts of far inferior and now almost forgotten authoresses. The popular reputation and great acquaintances which their works brought to Hannah More, to Miss Brunton, to the Porters, to Mrs. Opie, as well as to Fanny Burney and Miss Edgeworth, were not hers. She must have been gratified by the review of her first novels in the Quarterly, though she probably never knew that it was written by Walter Scott, one of the earliest and warmest of her admirers. This was the only high tribute to her genius from the literary world; and from the great world that of the Prince Regent—who sent her word that he had a copy of her work at each of his residences, and offered her his permission to dedicate "Emma" to himself—is the only one which we know of her receiving in her lifetime. Ever since her reputation has been growing and spreading, and she has long been recognized by the highest authorities, as well as by widespread popular admiration, as one of the immortals. If she had not at any one time as wide a circle of readers as some of her sensational sisters, we will venture to say that none of them has had so many, on the whole, or of so high a quality. Scott, Archbishop Whately (who also reviewed her), Sir James Mackintosh, Southey, Coleridge, Guizot, Macaulay (who once intended writing her life), Whewell, Sydney Smith, Chief-Justice Marshall, and Judge Story, are a few of the men of the highest eminence on both sides of the Atlantic who delighted in her works and helped to confirm her fame. For fertility of invention, for variety and individuality of characterization, for simplicity and naturalness of her plots, which yet are not discovered till she gives the key, for dramatic development of her characters, for the power of describing without description by incidental hints and touches; in short, for that perfection of artifice which conceals itself and seems nothing but the simplicity of nature and the necessary course of events, there is no story-teller that we know of that surpasses Jane Austen. Her stories never tire, and are as fresh in interest on the fiftieth reading as on the first, and her characters are as much actual entities to us as our own acquaintances, and much more so than most personages in history. Whatever gives us a more intimate knowledge of such an enchantress in her private life, and the method and beginnings of her art, is a favor for which we are grateful, and for which we desire again to acknowledge our obligations to the author and editor of this most interesting book.

THE MUTINEERS OF THE BOUNTY.*

BETWEEN the islands of the Northern and of the Southern Pacific Ocean, in corresponding latitudes, a surprising similarity of climate, flora, fauna, inhabitants, languages, and customs exists. After sailing southward many weeks in a great circle crossing the equator, one may, on stepping ashore in a Southern Pacific group, take up the thread of aboriginal speech with the natives in almost the same dialect as that of the islands which one has left more than three thousand miles behind. From the Ladrones to Easter Island, a distance of nine thousand miles, and from Hawaii to New Zealand, an arc measured at right angles to the foregoing one, and more than half as long, the language and the race of the islanders are substantially the same in all the countless Pacific groups. After the first classification of these islands, into coral and volcanic formations, they may be said to differ hardly otherwise than as the climate varies in different parts of this vast area, which equals in extent that of all the continents of the globe.

Pitcairn's Island, upon which the mutineers of the Bounty landed in 1789, lies but a little further south of the line than the Hawaiian Islands lie to the north of it; and therefore, as we have intimated, repeats, but on a smaller scale, most of the physical features of that group. The climate has the same delicious and uniform temperature—the extremes in either case being 60° and 85° Fahrenheit. The list of indigenous plants is almost the same for either country. Hawaii and Pitcairn's Island had in common, when discovered, the cocoa-nut, the banana, the yam, the sweet-

* "The Mutineers of the Bounty, and their Descendants in Pitcairn and Norfolk Islands. By Lady Belcher." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1871.
"The Eventful History of the Mutiny and Piratical Seizure of H. M. S. Bounty. By Sir John Barrow." London. 1839.
"Narrative of the Mutiny of the Bounty, on a Voyage to the South Seas. By Lieut. W. Bligh, Commander."

potato, the arum esculentum or taro, the cloth mulberry, the candle-nut tree, the ti plant (dracæna terminalis), the nono (morinda citrifolia), the Chinese mulberry, and the pandanus odoratissimus. In compensation for its want of the Hawaiian bread-fruit, Pitcairn's Island had the banyan, which Hawaii lacked. To both countries the water-melon, the potato, lemons, oranges, tobacco, sugar-cane, turmeric, and the ordinary garden vegetables of the temperate zone have been introduced by foreigners. In both countries a profusion of fruit and vegetables supplies an abundant diet at very small expense of labor. The domestic animals were few in number at Pitcairn's Island; goats, pigs, and poultry, which the colonists brought with them from Tahiti, were abundant; but the stalwart islanders, on the arrival of Sir Thomas Staines in 1814, were alarmed at the sight of a cow; while they very intelligently admired a little black terrier, to them an entirely novel sight. "I know that it is a dog," said Edward Young, naïvely, "I have read of such things."

The experiment of this plantation in the Pacific derives a peculiar interest from the fact that the soil and climate of the island—the entire physical environment of the human germ there planted—was nearly the same as that of other islands; while yet that germ remained long undisturbed, and multiplied with hardly any interference of other blood. For twenty years, its very existence was unknown to the world. For sixty years, the strain remained almost absolutely the same as at the first landing upon Pitcairn's Island. It was as if a scientific man had planned and directed this novel experiment in stirpiculture. As a preliminary to pointing out certain little-noticed features of this experiment, it may be necessary to remind the reader of certain points in its history.

The mutiny of the Bounty occurred in April, 1789, after its crew had indulged in half a year's intercourse with the kindly Tahitians. The fugitive company, twenty-seven in number—nine white men, six Polynesian men, and twelve Polynesian women—reached Pitcairn's Island, an uninhabited rock in the South Pacific, late in the same year. Here they lived peaceably until 1791, when mortal quarrels for the possession of the women commenced. There were massacres for two years, when (October, 1793, according to the statement quoted by Sir John Barrow) all of the men were killed except four whites; ten of the women surviving. The women preferred the whites, and took part with them in destroying their own countrymen. From 1793 until the close of the century, when John Adams was left the sole surviving mutineer upon the island, they lived promiscuously with the men, "frequently changing their abode from one house to another" (Barrow). M'Koy died in 1798; in 1799, Quintal perished by the hands of Adams and Young; in 1800, Young died, and left John Adams, then thirty-six years of age, the last man upon Pitcairn's Island.

This year marked a new era in the history of the island. Adams then, according to the later testimony of the islanders, reformed his character and his conduct. The conversion was, as far as we can learn, not less genuine than sudden. He made himself the guardian and teacher of this community of women and children; he introduced the rites of the Church of England among his flock; and when the lads attained the age of twenty, and the girls of eighteen, he solemnized marriages between them. The social transformation was complete. There was never a more innocent, orderly, and virtuous community than this one speedily became. Almost in an instant the turbid solution changed into the clear crystallization of a blameless social life.

Pitcairn's Island held its secret until the grandchildren of the first colonists began to appear. Then—in 1808—Captain Folger of Nantucket discovered its strange history. In 1814, Staines and Pipon, of the Royal Navy, visited it and described its innocence and its rapid growth. Beechey found Pitcairn's Island an uncontaminated paradise in 1825. No foreigner, indeed, was admitted to its settlement until the years between 1823 and 1828, when three Englishmen of good character were permitted to make their homes there. After about a year's residence they married; and their descendants mingled with the Island race. In March, 1830, Captain Waldegrave found the colony numbering seventy-nine souls. Its blood, however, was still the same as at the outset; and they presented for study the strangest phenomena, the most curious material for physiological research and speculation.

The more noticeable points of this case, as we are able to educe them by comparison of the separate accounts, written by no scientific hands, we may now state as follows:

1. The members of the Pitcairn's Island community were related more closely to each other than those of any other community, of equal age and number, of which we have any authentic account. All were descended from a few pairs; the children of Adam and Eve could hardly have bred "in and in" more closely. It is much to be regretted that we have not the genealogical record of each individual in this community. But we have sufficient evidence, 2, of the stability of the cross between the English and the Polynesian race. Could we attain all the facts of the case (an undertaking which we commend to Mr. Darwin—Rev. E. H. Nobbs, of Norfolk Island, could furnish records of parentage and of birth), we are confident that they would throw much light upon the still-vexed questions relating to hybridity. Certain it is that the union of the two has produced a cross that is both remarkably healthy and fertile in itself. We have found no evidence that would explain this fertility, as happens in a large class of hybrids, by the fact of union with the parent stocks.

3. The dominance of the Saxon nature over the savage was illustrated in Pitcairn's Island in some novel ways. That the Englishmen, who induced the islandmen to accompany them into their exile as friends, should have converted them soon into slaves, and finally succeeded in destroying them all, is what we might have expected from our knowledge of the comparative prepotency of the races. Nor is it surprising that the Tahitian women, in the strife of which they were the cause, should have sided with the stronger and more desirable whites. But that nine Englishmen, sexually balanced against eighteen Polynesian men and women, should have impressed their own language and religion upon the descendants of this unequal ancestry, and so much of what was best in their own intellectual and physical character that visitors to the island found the grandchildren of the colony, in spite of their savage dress and surroundings, much more English than Tahitian in character, is a result for which we may elsewhere look in vain among the records of human descent.

4. The elimination, in their seclusion from the competitive struggles of the world, of what we may call the defensive forces of character was strikingly shown in a later period of the Pitcairn's Islanders' history. In 1832, an adventurer, named Joshua Hill, landed upon the island, pretending to come from England as its appointed ruler. He had neither credentials nor commission; yet he was able to establish a most cruel and oppressive rule over this hitherto happy community. He expelled the three Englishmen who had lately come there—among them Mr. Nobbs, who, since the death of John Adams, the reformed mutineer, in 1829, had been the valued pastor and teacher of the little community. It was one man against a hundred; and by force of cunning the single rascal won an easy supremacy. We know that he flogged and beat the white inhabitants at his will; how much further his brutalities went we are not informed; but it was six years before the British Government, in 1838, interposed and removed this wretched old man, the Island incubus. His career might well serve for the text of a discourse upon the helplessness of innocence.

The whites now returned to Pitcairn's Island, and years of uninterrupted prosperity and growth followed. But the community found itself at last too large for the little island, but four square miles in extent, that formed its home. In 1856, after much debate, the people emigrated en masse to Norfolk Island, three thousand miles to the west of Pitcairn's; and there they still remain, excepting two families, who, driven by an insufferable home-sickness, have returned to repeople Pitcairn's Island.

Enough has now been said to indicate the unique nature of this self-determined experiment in human descent. A novel character has appeared as the result. The Norfolk Islanders of to-day are still nearly the same people as when they left Pitcairn's Island. They have increased in number to three hundred; but there have been few marriages among them save with members of their own community. They possess the physical characters of their English and Tahitian ancestry in almost equal part; they have the same light-olive complexion, the slightly flattened nose and full lips, and the elastic and vigorous physique which we have observed among the half-breeds of the Northern Pacific Islands. On the other hand, they have a more than monastic ignorance of the world, and a considerably more than English delicacy of conscience. Sir John Barrow relates that one of the girls having incautiously refused a lover, and relented, languished for years before she could consent to break her vow not to marry him. This weighty case was submitted to a sort of naval court of love, composed of Captain Beechey's officers, who encouraged the girl in vain to act according to her inclination in the matter. Another mental characteristic of this community was lack of humor among its members. The Pitcairn's Islanders were unable to jest or to perceive the point of a joke, and considered that they had been trifled with on discovering that strangers had used words to them in any other than their literal meanings. The same deficient sensibility may be observed in other small and carefully trained communities in the same part of the world, as among the children of the missionaries in many of the Pacific stations. But if the Pitcairners did not understand wit, they always avoided scandal-monging.

Captain Bligh's book is an attempt to exonerate himself from the charge, well proved by all other accounts of the mutiny, of brutality toward his crew. We should say unexampled brutality but for the constant reports in the daily papers, which show too clearly that the cruel treatment of sailors, at least in the merchant service, is still as frequent and shameful as in the time of Bligh. The landsman knows little of the amount and character of this cruelty. Sir John Barrow's book is the most valuable for the student of the history of Pitcairn's Island. He gives some important facts which Lady Belcher, with a squeamishness that is rather American than English, has omitted ; as where she neglects to tell us that twelve Tahitian women were of the party that landed upon Pitcairn's Island. In her book we notice, too, an occasional inaccuracy in the statement of dates, as in those assigned to the landing of the second colonists ; and there is a slip in her criticism of a Polynesian prefix wrongly used in the name "Otaheite." The prefix O does not have in the Polynesian languages, as Lady Belcher says it has, the force of the genitive : it has a peculiar significance which we do not here expound, and is known as the "demonstrative particle." But we cannot expect Lady Belcher to be familiar with the niceties of the grammar of Tahiti. Her work, as a whole, is the most important upon this subject, as it is the only one that brings the history of the colony down to a recent date ; and we can commend it as very interesting reading.

Le Mouvement Socialiste et l'Économie Politique. Par H. Dameth. (Paris, 1869.)—The author of this short work was at one time a socialist, and, as his conversion was the work of his intelligence and not of enthusiasm, he is able to explain in a perfectly lucid manner both his former views and those he now holds. The importance of his subject cannot be denied. It would be more agreeable to avoid thinking of so complicated a question as this of labor, but it presses on for a solution, and what ignorance and fanaticism are capable of making of it this last year has shown. M. Dameth's book is a résumé of a course of lectures delivered by him at Lyons, under the auspices of the Chamber of Commerce and of the Société d'Economie Politique of that city. He himself is the Professor of Political Economy at the Academy of Geneva. His book contains less than one hundred and fifty pages, a brief compendium of which we will try to set before our readers.

According to M. Dameth's analysis, socialism as a theory is, in the first place, a criticism of the existing social order, which convinces the socialist that the rich live at the expense of the poor. To this it is answered that inequality of conditions rises normally and justly from the inequality of forces and the services rendered to society, and from the inequality of the power of saving and preserving. This inequality of conditions, so far from entailing the exploitation of labor by capital, is rather profitable to all as the principle of the formation and preservation of capital, the instrument of general production. The inequality of conditions which arises from legal privileges contrary to the common right, on account of their being established for the advantage of certain social classes or special interests, is, however, a factitious aggrandizement of this natural inequality. The socialist says, "If this inequality is once established, the exploitation necessarily follows." "No," says the political economist, "the fortunes which are amassed take nothing from the poor ; on the contrary, contact with them is more beneficial for the latter than the contact with poverty. As to the abuses, they are to be seen in poverty as well as in opulence. The workman can waste his salary as well as the capitalist his profits. Moreover, fortune surely comes to the most deserving and most economical."

In the second place, the general principles of reform which are advanced by socialism pretend to be the result of the modern democratic spirit. Political economy denies this. Modern democracy has only one valid definition—the reign of right. But the root of all rights is personal liberty. True democracy is, then, the antipodes of despotism, even if it be exercised in the name of the people. Now socialism bases all its reforms on this sort of despotism. Not believing in the natural harmony of interests, it seeks to rectify them by the force of authority ; it demands that the law of supply and demand should be replaced by arbitrary tariffs, to the advantage of some and to the harm of others. It wishes to absorb everything into the hands of the state ; in short, it sacrifices real equality, that of common rights and personal liberty, to the absolute equality of different parts ; it suppresses all individual merit and responsibility.

Socialism bases itself on these two propositions : First, all social suffering is caused by that inequality of conditions which arises from the mutual antagonism of interests. Second, this antagonism can only be destroyed by the complete solidarization of interests ; that is to say, the absorption of the particular by the general interest.

Finally, M. Dameth remarks that the history of Communism, showing its existence in Greece and Rome, among the Jews and at the foundation of Christianity, proves satisfactorily how ancient and deep-rooted a theory it is. Judging from its recent manifestations, the observer might suppose it to be only of modern growth ; in fact, however, it has been for many ages the steady foe of individual development, the unrelenting enemy of the chief means of civilization.

Pioneer Biography. Sketches of the Lives of some of the Early Settlers of Butler County, Ohio. By James McBride, of Hamilton. Vol. II. (Cincinnati : Robert Clarke & Co.)—This well-printed and carefully edited volume will prove helpful to any student of American history for the period included between the years 1790 and 1812. The most interesting of the thirteen biographies it contains are those which relate to the memorable defeat of St. Clair, in November, 1791, and the subsequent victorious campaign of Gen. Wayne, whose men, "it may be said, fought in the last battle of the Revolutionary struggle." This able soldier held the strictly military view of the proper mode of dealing with the Indians, and it was a view which had its justification at that time in the fact that the Indians were encouraged in their hostilities by the British, and therefore were not fit subjects for negotiation calculated for the savage character when left to its own counsels, or for such progress in the settlement of the country as makes resistance madness and clearly madness. "About this time [spring of 1793]," it is stated in the notice of Isaac Paxton, "General Wayne received a letter from the secretary of war, proposing the appointment of commissioners to treat with the Indians ; to which the General replied, that 'he desired to be present at the convention, with twenty-five hundred of his commissioners, with not a Quaker among them,' and added, that if such was the case he felt confident an honorable peace would be the result." The Quaker commissioner may very well appear on the scene when the odds are thirty-nine million to three hundred thousand against the red man, and when, shift his camp as he may, he finds in the morning that the railroad surveyor and the miner have run their lines through it overnight. Humanity towards the Indians in these circumstances, though the plainest duty, is no longer a merit in us, since to make war on them is as cowardly as it is cruel. Nevertheless, it is a moral progress we have made in this matter, and part of the same that has rendered flogging in the army obsolete, and abolished slavery. Wayne's quartermaster could write to the military storekeeper at Pittsburg : "Please send down some whip-cord for cats ; they have no cats to whip the men with."

Colonel Matthew Hueston having been born near Mercersburg, Pa., gives his biographer an excuse for mentioning the origin of a more famous character :

"About three miles in a northwest direction from Mercersburg, there is a wild, romantic gorge in the Cove Mountain. Within this gorge, the old road leads up through a narrow secluded cove or glen, encircled on every side by high and rugged mountains. Here, at the foot of a toilsome ascent in the road, which the old traders called 'The Stony Battery,' some sixty years ago, stood two log-cabins, in one of which a Scotchman of the name of Buchanan dwelt, and in the other had a small store, where he drove a profitable traffic with the Indian traders and frontiermen who came down the mountain pass ; exchanging with them powder, salt, iron, firearms, sugar, blankets, and cloths for the furs and peltries of the hunters and trappers, and the 'old Monongahela whiskey' of the backwoodsmen.

"The old Scotch trader had a son, named James, born here, and cradled amid these wild scenes of nature and the rude din of frontier life. The father prospered in trade, and after a few years removed into the town of Mercersburg, where he assumed a higher rank in business. He opened a respectable store, and was a justice of the peace. He sent his son James to Dickinson College, Carlisle, where he graduated in 1809. He then studied law, and commenced the practice in Lancaster, Pa. We afterwards find him among the most accomplished, eloquent, and distinguished members of the United States Senate, Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of St. James, and, in 1857, President of the United States."

NEW AUTUMN BOOKS.

HURD & HOUGHTON,

13 ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK,

THE RIVERSIDE PRESS, CAMBRIDGE, MASS.,

Will publish this week,

I.

PICTURES OF TRAVEL IN SWEDEN, among the Hartz Mountains, and in Switzerland; with a Visit at Charles Dickens's House. By Hans Christian Andersen. In 1 vol. crown 8vo, cloth, $1 75.

This volume completes the series of Andersen's Writings (10 volumes, $18 75) issued by arrangement with the author.

II.

THE LAST KNIGHT: A Romance Garland. From the German of Anastasius Grün. Translated, with Notes, by John O. Sargent. In 1 vol. 4to, $2 50.

"The Last Knight" is a series of ballads founded on incidents in the life of the Emperor Maximilian I., and forming a national poem which has given the author his chief and deserved celebrity.

III.

THE FABLES OF PILPAY. Copiously illustrated. In 1 vol. 16mo, $1 50.

This edition of Pilpay's Fables, the first issued in America, is uniform with Hurd & Houghton's edition of Æsop.

The ancient and widespread popularity of these Hindû stories will ensure them a cordial reception in their new dress. Fresh attention has been called of late to the remarkable character of these Fables, and the difference between these and Æsop's is in favor of the former, so far as good story-telling is concerned. The engravings were executed by the eminent engraver on wood, Alexander Anderson.

THE SAME. Large-paper edition, one hundred copies only, printed on hand-press, cloth extra. (Nearly ready.)

IV.

STORIES FROM OLD ENGLISH POETRY. By Abby Sage Richardson. Illustrated. 1 vol. 16mo, $1 50.

The stories have been told anew from the most famous and most beautiful of the classic dramas and poems in the English language. Shakespeare, Chaucer, Spenser, and other lesser poets have been drawn from, and there could be no more delightful introduction to the wealth of early English literature than is here given.

V.

FOUR, AND WHAT THEY DID. By Helen C. Weeks, author of "Ainslee," "Grandpa's House," and "White and Red." With Illustrations. In 1 vol. 16mo, $1 25.

Mrs. Weeks needs no introduction to those acquainted with the Ainslee Stories as one of the brightest, most entertaining, and most natural of writers for the young. These stories have their scenes laid chiefly in the West, and will be found very successful in catching the spirit of child-life on the prairies and in new settlements.

VI.

POPULAR EDITION OF MOTHER GOOSE'S Melodies for Children; or, Songs for the Nursery. A complete revised edition, with an account of the Goose or Vergoose Family. Illustrated by eighteen full-page illustrations. By Henry L. Stephens; ten pages of music, by Charles Moulton; and twelve smaller illustrations, by Gaston Fay, In 1 vol. 8vo. Price, in cloth, $1 75.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL. Remember that if a lamp filled with Pratt's Astral Oil is upset and broken, the contents will not explode or take fire. Remember, also, that it is not only the safest oil, but gives the best light. It costs but little more than the dangerous oils, and is safe, reliable, and good.

PETERS ON CHOLERA.

NOTES ON THE

ORIGIN, NATURE, PREVENTION,

AND

TREATMENT OF THE ASIATIC CHOLERA.

BY JOHN C. PETERS, M.D.

Second edition. With an Appendix. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,

23 Murray Street and 27 Warren Street.

☞ Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

ARUNDEL SOCIETY.

This Society was founded in 1848, for promoting the knowledge of Art by copying and publishing

IMPORTANT WORKS OF ANCIENT MASTERS.

Its publications are beautifully executed

CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHS,

Fac-similes of the originals, both in color and drawing, and are manufactured under the superintendence of well-known artists. The following are among the

MOST POPULAR SUBJECTS.

CHRIST AND MARY MAGDALENE IN THE GARDEN. From a fresco by Fra Angelico, in the Convent of St. Mark, at Florence. Size, 15x8½ inches. Price $6 25.

THE ADORATION OF THE KINGS. From a fresco by Pietro Perugino, at Cetta Della Pieve. Size, 22x18½ inches. Price $13 75.

ST. PETER DELIVERED FROM PRISON. From a fresco by Raffaelle, in the Stanza of the Vatican. Size, 28x19 inches. Price $12 50.

THE CORONATION OF THE VIRGIN. From a fresco by Fra Angelico, in the Convent of St. Mark, at Florence. Size, 18x19 inches. Price $10.

THE VIRGIN AND CHILD. From a fresco by Fra Bartolomeo, now placed in the Convent of St. Mark, at Florence. Size, 11x16½ inches. Price $8.

THE ADORATION OF THE LAMB. From the centre-panel of the Altar Piece painted by the brothers Van Eyck, in the Cathedral of St. Bavon, at Ghent. Size, 26x15½ inches. Price $15 75.

The sizes above-given are the actual sizes of each picture, all of them being mounted on a heavy white cardboard, so that when framed the white border can either be left as a margin, or not, at pleasure.

Any of the above pictures will be securely packed, free of charge, and sent by express, on receipt of advertised price.

POTT & AMERY,

Cooper Union, Fourth Avenue, New York.

SLAVE SONGS OF THE UNITED STATES.

A Unique Collection of Original Melodies—words and music—obtained among the negroes of the South; preceded by an account of these Songs, and an Essay on the Negro Dialect, as observed at Port Royal, by Prof. W. F. Allen, of the University of Wisconsin. Cloth, 8vo, price $1 50.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address

Publisher of "THE NATION,"

Box 6732, New York City.

JUST ISSUED.

PRICED CATALOGUE OF RARE

AND

VALUABLE BOOKS

Relating to Shakespeare and the Drama, American History, Biography, Poetry, etc., for sale by

T. H. MORRELL (Agent),

78 Nassau Street, New York,

(Between Fulton and John Streets.)

☞ Catalogue sent free on application.

LONDON BOOKS.

PRICED CATALOGUE, No. 27,

OF

RARE,

STANDARD,

AND

VALUABLE ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS,

Now ready and will be sent free of charge to any address.

A fine lot of ENGRAVINGS just opened.

A. DENHAM & CO.,

IMPORTERS OF ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS,

17 MURRAY STREET

(Near Broadway), New York.

THE "NATION" ABROAD.

Subscriptions and Advertisements for the Nation are received in Europe by the following

AGENTS:

GREAT BRITAIN AND THE COLONIES: George Street, 30 Cornhill, E.C., London.

FRANCE: Bowles Brothers & Co., 12 Rue de la Paix, Paris.

SWITZERLAND: Vérésoff & Garrigues, Place Bel-Air, Geneva.

ITALY: Furse Brothers & Co., 9 Piazza di Spagna, Rome.

THE NATION PRESS.

The Proprietors of THE NATION PRESS give notice that they have established a Book, Pamphlet, Job, and Newspaper Printing-Office in this City, and are prepared to execute at moderate prices, for cash, the best of work in any and all of these branches.

For BOOKS they will furnish Electrotype or Stereotype Plates, as desired, and will guaranty unusual accuracy in their preparation.

J. ROSS & CO., 27 Rose St., New York.

GAZZAM'S TREATISE

ON THE

BANKRUPT LAW.

SECOND EDITION JUST OUT.

For sale at all Law-Book Stores.

BOOK-BUYERS.

Send for Catalogue of INTERESTING, USEFUL, and SCARCE BOOKS added to the Stock in hand of

FRANCIS EMMINS,

80 Nassau Street, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1871.

The Week.

THE Ringtroubles were brought into Court on Thursday last, before Judge Barnard, by a motion on the part of a Mr. Foley, an enraged taxpayer and a member of the Committee of Seventy, for an injunction to restrain the Mayor, Comptroller, and others from issuing any more bonds or paying any more money to certain classes of claimants with whom the Ring is suspected of collusion. It was alleged in the argument that the Ring, having last year procured from the Legislature an act limiting the taxation to two per cent. on the valuation of that year, or, in other words, a sum not exceeding twenty-six millions of dollars, for the State tax, the interest on the debt, and for the City Government, had used the whole of this sum for the expenses of the city government alone, and were raising the rest by the issuing of bonds. This is, in the rough, Mr. Foley's case, and on it Judge Barnard granted a temporary injunction, with an order to show cause why it should not be made permanent, to be argued on Monday last. There was something, we confess, to us very discouraging in the joy with which the Judge's action was received by the newspapers. The order was almost a matter of course, and yet the Times and Tribune both received it with rejoicing, and almost hailed Barnard as our deliverer. Nothing could better illustrate the distance at which we still stand from anything like radical reform, and from a just conception of the nature of the evils which afflict us, than this readiness on the part even of the champions of reform to make a Moses of any scamp, however notorious, who offers to turn good for a brief period and betray his fellows. There has been no more obedient and serviceable tool of the Ring than Judge Barnard, and he has already, on one occasion, within four years, gulled a good many respectable people into the belief that he had really quarrelled with his masters, and was willing to serve the State against them, and under cover of this pretence he came very near securing for himself exclusively the most enormous judicial powers ever conferred upon a single man. We do not say that he is now not going to do right or that he has not really determined to break with the Ring, but we do say that, if the friends of reform have no other dependence than Barnard's repentance, they might as well abandon their task.

The case came on again for argument on Monday, when the Ring was represented by a great array of counsel; but, while the proceedings were pending, the news ran through court and town that a cruel misfortune had overtaken one of its principal members. On that day the committee, composed jointly of Common Councilmen and leading citizens, lately appointed to examine the city finances, were to inspect the Comptroller's accounts, but on Sunday evening, while the faithful watchman at the City Hall was absent at supper, what should Satan do but put somebody up to breaking into Mr. Connolly's office and carrying off a portion of his vouchers? When Mayor Hall received this information, he seemed to have come to the conclusion that the game was up, and he wrote a pathetic letter to the Comptroller, telling him, in substance, that this action on the part of Satan had clearly put an end to his (the Comptroller's) usefulness, and that, as he had no power to remove him, and as it would take a long time to try him on regular charges before the Court of Common Pleas, as the law provides, he would thank him to resign "magnanimously." This modest request from his old confederate the World backed up by a furious editorial article, threatening Connolly with something horrid, as well as we could make out, in the nature of physical suffering, in case he had not complied before Tuesday night. At that date, however, Connolly had informed the Mayor that he should abide the issue of the trial; and it was announced that Tweed thought the Mayor's action "most extraordinary." The situation was complicated by the confirmation of the news received from Washington, that Mrs. Connolly had been putting a million and a half into Government bonds, which seemed to indicate that his outside troubles had invaded Connolly's peaceful home.

At this writing it is difficult to say how the affair will end, or even how it stands. The general impression is that Sweeny has determined to throw Tweed and Connolly overboard, and that Hall has reached the same conclusion. His letter to Connolly on Monday shows, at all events, that the Ring is broken, the mutual confidence of the members destroyed, and that the members may now be pursued singly. What should, or can, be done to them, we do not know, but the belief which we expressed last week and the week before, that a violent death is the only penalty which they would really fear, and which the Tribune twisted in a muddleheaded way into a ridiculous "suggestion that they would be the better of being hanged to a lamp-post," still remains unchanged. We believe that all attempts to make them "disgorge," as it is called, or to inflict on them any punishment which they really dread, will be futile. The Evening Post controverts our assertion that they fear nothing but a violent death, and says we must have been thinking of "ancient Rome or of modern Paris, rather than of New York," when we made it. We do not mind admitting, since the Post has so nearly hit the mark, that the city we really had in our minds was ancient Thebes, the municipal abuses in which were corrected, in the way we have indicated, by an eminent jurist named Lynch, who flourished about 3,000 B.C., but all knowledge of whom—such is fame—is now confined to a few Egyptologists. And that the Tribune and the Evening Post should never have heard of him nor of his procedure is not unnatural in citizens of a country in which no wrong is righted except by sentence of the courts, and in which Egyptological research is still rare. We do not say that Hall and his associates now fear "assassination" or have reason to fear it, and we do not recommend that they be threatened with it, as a great many sensible men think they ought to be; but we do maintain that things have reached such a pass in this city, both socially and politically, that with no other penalty can such knaves be threatened effectively. It is not in the power of any of those who are now pursuing the Ring to take from these men anything which they greatly value. We may depend upon it that their ill-gotten fortunes are by this time thoroughly secured, and that nothing that has happened or is likely to happen will deprive them of the society of anybody for whose society they care. When the Post says, therefore, that they fear "political and pecuniary and social ruin," it is about the same as if it said they feared the day of judgment or a collapse of the sun.

Whatever the termination of the affair, the results which have already been achieved entitle the New York Times to the hearty thanks of every man in the community. There is no instance in the history of journalism of an assault so successful and so courageous and determined by a single newspaper upon so great an evil, and it gives us an idea of what the press might accomplish in driving knaves out of politics, if it were united and untrammelled by party obligations.

Although the nomination for the Presidency will not be settled till next winter in Washington, the sounds of preparation begin to be heard already all over the land. It is safe to say that the whole machinery of the Administration is now busily engaged in making the President's chances of renomination as strong as possible, and, on the other hand, those who are opposed to his renomination are by no means idle either. We last week made a feeble and inadequate attempt to give a summary of the edifying, not to say pious, letter in which Senator Conkling gave in his adhesion to Grant, and his contempt for offices and other spoils. It has since then drawn forth a reply from a well-known Republican politician of this city, Mr. B. F. Mudgett, who talks in a very different vein, and far from treating Mr. Conkling as what his letter seemed to indicate that he was—a Christian patriot—rails at him most unmercifully. What he says is, in substance, that Mr. Conkling has been the firm and steady supporter of corrupt office-seekers in this State, and the opponent of honest ones. He opposed General Merritt's confirmation as naval officer of this port; he advocated the confirmation of James Kelly as postmaster, though he was fresh from working hard for Andrew Johnson, and—Mr. Mudgett might have added—did not know how to spell. The heaviest charge of all is, however, that he brought about the appointment of Mr. Thomas Murphy—vulgarly known as "Tom Murphy"—as collector of this port, and he gives an account of Tom's "record" which we believe to be substantially correct, and which makes his appearance in his present position of extraordinary emolument, responsibility, and patronage one of the strangest events in the history of the Administration. In fact, knowing General Grant's zeal for civil-service reform, we long tried to believe that Tom Murphy, of the Custom-house, was not the bad and notorious old Tom who had so long figured in the politics of this State, but a new and upright Tom, whom the President had discovered, and who was destined to purify the Custom-house and cover the somewhat obscure and tarnished name of Murphy with glory.

It seems, however, that there is no mistake about it, and that Collector Tom Murphy, who is "reforming the civil service," and "infusing economy and efficiency into the collection of the revenue" at this port, is really the Tom Murphy who, during the war, made so much money out of army contracts; who voted with the Democrats in the State Senate in 1866, against the resolution requesting the United States senators to pass the Civil Rights Bill over Johnson's veto; who voted also against a similar request with regard to the extension of equal suffrage to the District of Columbia; who voted with the Tammany Ring for the passage of our present charter; who put the Tax Commission into the hands of Tammany for a share in the patronage, which he got; who was one of Tweed's Commissioners in the "Broadway Widening" swindle, and was by him put on the Tammany School Board; and who, in 1866, supported Hoffman and the Democratic ticket by money and vote, and was therefore repeatedly excluded from Republican Conventions as a "traitor"—which, we are sorry to say, is with Republican Conventions rather a worse thing than a rogue. This is what Mr. Mudgett tells of this eminent man who has been employed by General Grant to collect the revenue of this port; but who is now "reorganizing the party in this city," and using Government offices to prepare the right sort of delegation to the Presidential Convention, and is probably as corrupt a politician as ever wrapped himself in the American flag. His views about the Civil Service Commission and "the constitutional difficulty" would doubtless be very amusing, if they were known.

The two important September elections have been carried, as was expected, by the Republicans. In California, Mr. Booth's majority is between six and seven thousand, which is about two thousand larger than anybody had been anticipating. This result gives the Republicans all three Congressmen, and ensures a Republican successor to Mr. Cole in the Senate, and is the more important from a party point of view because, of the twenty-four Senators who are to retire shortly, the places of some four or five of the Republicans will, in all probability, be filled by Democrats. The Republicans are right, therefore, to fire salutes, and perhaps they do well to set it down as a "triumph for the Administration." So far as can be seen at this distance, the corrupt administration of Governor Haight, the belief in Mr. Booth's honesty, and the new votes of the negroes—a fourth of whom, or about 500, are said to have voted with the Democrats—were what effected the change. The platforms of the parties were all but identical, the Democrats "accepting the Amendments," and the Republicans denouncing the Chinamen. "The contest between the naked issues of Republicanism and Democracy" is, therefore, not so plainly visible as the party press asserts. Still, the gain, whether for the Administration or not, is probably a substantial Republican gain, and will, for the immediate future, affect all the Pacific States and Territories. The negro vote, for example, is as good for next year as for this; and the Republicans will, in view of the approaching Presidential election, be sufficiently on their good behavior to keep the recollection of Democratic maladministration fresh in the public mind. That they will do well to walk carefully in this respect, the success of the "Taxpayers'" candidates in San Francisco sufficiently shows. For the present, at all events, California is out of the list of doubtful States. One reason for thinking that she is likely to remain so is the fact that the Democrats, in this last canvass, had the fatuity to let Mr. S. S. Cox, of this city, attempt the defence of the New York City and County Ring. This before men, some of whom at least remember how San Francisco managed her thieves twenty years ago, and who recollect that one of our Ring judges found it convenient to leave the city at about the time the last vigilance committee began operations.

In Maine the contest was very lukewarm, so much so that the Democratic candidate for the governorship sent a privy circular into every town, to some one of the faithful, telling him that the Republicans were apathetic, and that if the Democrats were secretly warned to get quietly to the polls, they could carry the State. The vote was nevertheless light, though the Republican majority is larger than that of last year. The Democratic gains were made in the ship-building districts, in some of the smaller towns, and in Portland, where the Democratic candidate resides and is popular. The election is without significance, except that its result will naturally have an encouraging effect on the Republicans of Ohio and Pennsylvania. In these States there is some hard work doing, and the probabilities are in favor of a heavy Republican majority in Ohio, and a majority in Pennsylvania. Everywhere it is true, as it has been for the past ten years, that the Democratic party is without able guidance, and that, South and North, wherever it is not divided, it is united in a policy which the country at large condemns. It gives no sign that the Republicans may not, if they choose, indulge themselves next year in the luxury of as good a candidate as they like. It will not require much "availability," nor all the labors and toils of the office-holders, from Mr. Tom Murphy and Colonel J. W. Forney down, nor anything else but an honest platform and a good man on it, to beat either a New Departure Democrat or a Democrat who will not depart afresh.

The Attorney-General, to whom the constitutional difficulty encountered by the Civil Service Commission was referred, has given an opinion on it, in which he reaches somewhat the same conclusion as that set forth by the Nation some weeks ago, though in a roundabout way. His decision is, that the appointments now vested in the courts and heads of departments may be transferred by Congress to the President, and the President may confine his appointments to a class selected by a competitive test prescribed by an Examining Board. But the test is only to "inform the conscience of the appointing power, and cannot be made legally conclusive on that power against its own judgment and will." Under this ruling, therefore, Congress may, if it pleases, give the President all the appointments, and he may, if he pleases, appoint none who have not submitted to a competitive test. If this be sound law, there is not a single qualification now required by statute of Government officers, whether civil or military, which the President or heads of departments may not dispense. They may dispense with the giving of bonds, with the test-oaths, and with citizenship, and may disregard sex or age, for in none of these points can Congress do more than "inform the conscience" of the appointing officer. It is a pity the question cannot in some way be brought before the Supreme Court; at present, our friends the politicians seem, to use one of the old war phrases, to have "got it just where they want it."

There may be found on the editorial page of the last number of Harper's Weekly an excellent specimen of the earlier stage of the dry-rot which is playing so much havoc with our political and commercial morality all over the country, and which has even made no inconsiderable inroads among our religious organizations. A Massachusetts Republican "writes to the editor, regretting some remarks in the Weekly on General Butler," and says:

"The point is not that General Butler is a man of strictest principle and rectitude in every respect, but is he not a man of consistency in the main—for ten years at least—of patriotism, of ability, of loyalty, and of a certain amount of political honesty, if that is not a solecism or Hibernicism?"

The simplicity with which this Republican describes his own disease is very amusing. What is wrong with him is that "the point is not" what it ought to be, and his account of it is very like a man's defending himself against a charge of obliquity of vision by saying that his eyes simply saw in a different way from other people's. This, however, as we have said, is the disease in its earlier stages, and in a patient of unusually good constitution and habits. Among less promising subjects—say the average voter of this city—it assumes a much more virulent form, though the symptoms and the remedy are essentially the same. Our Irish fellow-citizen here is suffering from exactly the same complaint as our "Massachusetts Republican," when he says, "The point is not, is Connolly honest, or has he stolen the public money, but, is he a man of fidelity to the party, to the Catholic faith, and a friend to the poor man's rights on the Sabbath and the liquor question?" In fact, "the point" varies with the voters' training and habits and interests, so that as we get down in the socials trata we can readily bring about a dialogue of this sort:

"Do you know that your candidate has served a term in the penitentiary, and only got out under a pardon last spring?" "Well, an' what if he was? Is it anny bisniss o' yours, or mine aither, where he spint last winthur? An' if the Guvurnur pardoned him, shure he had good raysons for it, and plenty of 'em, I'll go bail. Many a poor fellow gets into throuble the same way, but it isn't for the likes o' you to be throwin' it in his teeth. Sure we all go to the pinitintiary now an' agin. Me candidate, as ye call 'im, nivir turned his back on a friend, anyhow, an' nivir refused a poor man a glass o' whiskey or a bucket o' good coal, and that's why I'm goin' to vote for 'im."

As long as these "abominable principles" are held in Massachusetts, and find expression in these "abominable avowals," it is useless to expect any great striving for purity in less advanced communities.

The French National Assembly has had another excited and protracted discussion, like most others ending in a triumph of the Right. M. Ravinel's motion for the return of the Assembly and the Government to Paris having been referred to a committee, was there rejected, and a substitute adopted, recommending Versailles as the seat of both, and that a permanent seat, if we may judge from our meagre Cable despatches. The reporter of the committee's bill, M. Cézanne, declared its object to be decentralization, and cited the example of the United States and Russia, the capitals of which were not New York—fortunately enough—and Moscow. It was violently combated by Louis Blanc and others of the Left, who declared that Paris, ceasing to be the capital of the nation, would become the capital of riots—like New York. A compromise providing for the continuance of the Assembly at Versailles and the removal of the Ministers to Paris was opposed by the Government—undoubtedly from reasons of everyday expediency—and rejected, whereupon the committee's bill, after several days' debate, was adopted, "as finally amended." What the final amendments were, or what was the attitude of the Executive towards the main question, we are not told. It is, however, very probable that President Thiers was opposed both to a speedy return to Paris and to declaring Versailles the new capital of France, preferring, as in many other cases—and wisely so—a provisional state of affairs, to which the final settlement of the all-overshadowing question as to what is to be the future constitution and government of France would put a natural end.

Almost since the very beginning of his activity as Chief of the Executive, M. Thiers has lived in constant disagreement, at least in regard to most questions of more than temporary interest, with the majority of the Assembly which at Bordeaux placed him at the head of affairs. The prospect of its taking a recess for about two months, as is expected, must therefore be not a little gratifying to him, almost as gratifying as the evacuation by the Germans of the forts north and east of Paris and of the adjoining departments, which is actually to take place within the next few days. Relieved of the presence of the two hostile camps, the versatile old statesman will be in a condition to give a wider scope to his wonderful energy, both in promoting the internal reorganization of the country and partially re-establishing its prestige abroad, and thus gradually to dispose the French and Europe to see, as a Parisian pun has it, la France entière (en Thiers). Negotiations are also reported as being carried on with the plenipotentiaries of Germany for the complete evacuation of the whole of France, of course in the narrowed sense of this word. And rough and harsh as M. Thiers has of late shown himself to his adversaries in the parliamentary arena, he has certainly betrayed no lack of patience and blandness in his dealings with the foreign enemy, towards whom an attitude of proud superiority would have been fatally out of place. And as he fêted General Manteuffel, so he now fêtes Chevalier Nigra, the representative of Italy, though the relations between that country and France are far from being satisfactory. How M. Thiers is going to deal with those vanquished foes, the men and women of the Commune, of whom five more—Rossel and four pétroleuses—have been condemned to death, is still to be seen.

The meeting of the Emperors of Germany and Austro-Hungary at Salzburg has taken place, and the two monarchs are reported to have parted "warm friends." This assertion ought, perhaps, to be taken cum grano, but there can hardly be any doubt that the new interview has strengthened and developed the friendly understanding between the two empires which was attained by their leading statesmen at Gastein, though no formal treaty seems to have been concluded at either place. It is equally certain that the Roumanian question—that is, the repudiation by the Bucharest legislature of the guarantee given by it to the railway bonds of Strousberg & Co. (the Company being mostly Prussian), and probably the anti-German attitude of Roumania in general—formed one of the international topics considered at Gastein and Salzburg, and one of those which could not be disposed of without seriously reviewing the policy of Russia in the East, as well as her relations to Austria. Another topic was the somewhat threatening attitude of France towards Italy—or rather the possibility of France relapsing into her chauvinistic proclivities, as soon as she is freed from the German incubus, and the main result of the negotiations is thus stated by the well "inspired" Neue Preussische Zeitung: "Austria and Germany, repudiating aggressive ideas, will be closely united to repel aggression." That is to say, Germany guarantees the integrity of Austria, including her more and more re-Polonized Galicia, against encroachments on the part of the Czar, and Austria promises to help the speculators on the Spree to their money in Roumania, and to stand by the German Empire in case of a new French war—by preventing Russia from joining France. How this pro-German external policy of Count Beust can be made to agree with the anti-German internal policy pursued at the same time by his emperor's Cisleithanian Cabinet, a not distant future must show. Strange to say, however, both are alike directed against Russia; and the French eagerly scan the signs of diplomacy, to find out how soon the Government of St. Petersburg must be provoked into an alliance, defensive and offensive, with the Government of Versailles. An approaching interview of Gortchâkoff with Thiers at Lausanne is talked of. The Russian communist conspiracy trial is drawing to a close. The revelations are shocking, the sentences pronounced accordingly rigorous.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE RENOMINATION.

THERE is a general and a very widespread impression, which we believe to be well-founded, that the whole machinery of administration is busily employed just now in—to express the idea roughly—making General Grant's chances of renomination as good as possible; that is to say, such favors as the Executive has to bestow it bestows on men who will, in some way or other, help to send Grant delegates to the nominating convention next year; such favors as it is in its power to withdraw, it withdraws from persons now enjoying them who will not undertake in some way to contribute to this result; and all Federal officers have been given to understand that to contribute to this result is, if not the very first, all but the first of their duties. It is quite true that the same state of things has had to be witnessed in the last years of a great many other Presidential terms; and many other Presidents besides General Grant have sought to secure their renomination by the use of their patronage. The peculiarity of General Grant's case is, however, that no other President has ever wielded such enormous patronage, and that no other President was ever before counted on so strongly for hostility to that peculiar form of corruption which consists in the wholesale use of patronage for personal and party ends. The hopes of civil-service reform which were excited when he came into power did not survive his first year of office, and it is only this year that he has made a languid attempt to take the matter up by handing it over to the consideration of a commission, whose labors, let the members be ever so zealous, could not possibly withdraw the Government officials from the political arena before the next Presidential campaign. There are, of course, a good many excuses to be made, and very strong ones, for a President who, in the present state of politics, fails to carry out any such reform as this. To carry it out thoroughly, legislation is necessary, and he cannot legislate. But one thing a President who has the reform at heart can always do, and that is, come as near it as possible in dealing with all matters within his discretion. He can, in making his appointments, select, if not the best men, at least the best men "inside politics"; and if he cannot make them work with a single eye to the public good, he can make the public good their chief concern, and do something to remove the impression which lies at the root of all civil-service difficulty—that Government officers are the servants of the party in power, and not of the nation at large. Consequently, even if General Grant had brought about no formal change in the manner of appointing or promoting or removing officers, he might still have abundantly displayed his zeal in the cause by the character of the politicians he placed in important positions, and by the mode in which he made them do their work. It would, for instance, be both safe and fair to judge any President by the management of the New York Custom-house, the great channel through which so large a proportion of the public revenue flows into the Treasury. Judged by this, however, General Grant stands about as low, with regard to civil-service reform, as any of his predecessors. Nay, we doubt very much whether any President has ever put it into the hands of a politician of as mean an order as the one who now presides over it; or whether it has been ever more openly and systematically worked, not simply for party, but for personal ends—for his own renomination is to the President a personal end.

When we remember that what is going on in the New York Custom-house is going on in greater or less degree in all the custom-houses, assessors' and collectors' offices, and post-offices in the country; and that in addition to this the peculiar position in which the whole of the Southern States have been placed towards the Executive by the Force Bill, furnishes to unscrupulous partisans perhaps the most potent instrument for influencing elections ever established in a free country; and that the man who wields it is himself a candidate for re-election, we get some idea of the tremendous strain which our political system is at this moment undergoing, and will continue to undergo for a year to come. It is casting no marked imputation on General Grant's honesty to say that he ought not to be entrusted with any such power. If any man could be entrusted with such power, it is certain that the history of every nation on the globe would have been totally different. If it is an insult to say that he is unfit for its exercise, the constitutions of the United States and of all states are nothing but a string of insults to everybody charged with the duty of executing them. The very best answer he could make to the charge of abusing it is that he is human.

The operations which precede the formal work of the nominating convention are generally so quiet, and so well concealed from the public gaze, that the real strength of candidates with the politicians is as little known to the general public as the points and condition of race-horses to the great world outside betting circles. But the hum of preparation already begins to make itself heard, and the probabilities are that the harder the work done in official circles to make things safe, the more rapidly will hostility to the Presidential renomination develop itself outside these circles. The mere spectacle of the perfect working of the machinery has a highly irritating effect on rivals, malcontents, and disappointed persons, which is sure to produce irregular outbursts of opposition long before the day fixed for the regular encounter arrives. In Mr. Greeley's formal declaration of war against the practice of renomination, made in an article in the Galaxy, and transferred to the Tribune, and which has been foreshadowed by many of his utterances during his late tour in the West, we have an expression of what many are now thinking, and what a great many will before long begin to say—namely, that the strain of such a ponderous machine as a President preparing for his own renomination is one to which our political fabric cannot any longer be safely subjected. Either he must not be eligible for renomination, or the means of "working for it" must be taken from him. Mr. Greeley thinks he should be declared ineligible, and cites a host of authorities and analogies in favor of his position, for which there is, undoubtedly, a great deal to be said.

But making the President ineligible for renomination would, after all, not meet the great political evil of the day, and would not give us a real civil-service reform. It is true that it would destroy whatever portion of those evils comes from mere Presidential love of power; but love of power on the part of officers is not what most afflicts this commonwealth, but love of money. The President, in trying to remain in the White House for a second term, is influenced, doubtless, by a strong and, though not always noble, certainly not an ignoble passion; but it is a passion from which there is in our day little to fear. The large army of subordinates who are used to enable him to gratify it work for the most part under the influence of a base, practical, and thoroughly ignoble love of gain; and it is from their cheating, and stealing, and idling, and reducing everything connected with the administration of the government to a question of money, and their habit of estimating everything political in dollars and cents, that our political system is most endangered.

Now, these vices would be neither abolished nor checked by confining Presidents to one term of office. Nay, it is not impossible that the restriction, if not accompanied by any process of purification in the lower branches of the public service, would simply result in crowding into four years the bargaining, jobbing, and peculating which are now spread over eight. A President elected for one term would take office under precisely the same obligations to working politicians as a President elected as now for one term, with a chance of two, and he would have to discharge them in precisely the same way—that is, by giving the chiefs large chances of making money, and letting them provide for the small fry in the usual manner. The fact that the President was not a candidate for re-election would, perhaps, prevent him from exacting anything like active exertions to secure the nomination for anybody else, and would, perhaps, make officials, towards the close of his term, indifferent to his wishes. But it would not prevent an officer using his influence to secure somebody's nomination. Moreover, the very fact that an officer knew that his chances of holding office longer than four years were small, or that he had none, would, if he had the making of money in view in taking office, and wished to help his friends to make money, impel him into resorting with double vigor to those improper practices, whatever they are, which now constitute the scandals and disgraces of our civil service. In other words, the eligibility of the President for renomination is not at the bottom of the existing corruption, but our purblind persistence in furnishing him, ready to his hand, and insisting on his using, a body of corrupt and characterless tools, who, were he as pure as the snow, would do much to drag him down to their level, and whom indeed the best man cannot use without debasement. Does any man suppose, for instance, that President Grant can sit in council with Collector Tom Murphy at Long Branch, day by day, over the best means of working the party organization for the benefit of his Administration, without having his political virtue sapped, nay, his very notions of patriotism and public duty obscured?

There is only one way out of this great muddle, and that is, to make the civil service an instrument which a base man cannot use for his personal advantage. If you leave the politicians no places to give away, and deprive them of all power of endangering any man's bread, except for misconduct, a President's desire for re-election would work no more injury to the State than the desire of any candidate to be elected for one term. The rarity with which Presidents have been re-elected shows that there is no injurious tendency in that direction in the minds of the people, and that, work as a man may, a second term is never likely to be anything but the reward of great and striking services; and it would certainly seem hardly politic to take away from the highest officer of the Government the most splendid, and, with a reformed civil service, the most admirable, of all incentives to good administration, even if Mr. Lincoln's case did not reveal the danger of being bound to change at the end of four years. It may sometimes be safe to swap horses when crossing the stream, but who would register a vow to swap horses regularly every year, no matter where he found himself, or what other horse offered?

THE NEW WAR-CLOUD IN EUROPE.

The course things are taking in France, though not exactly unexpected, is apparently contributing to the production of a complication in European politics which, a year ago, nobody looked for. Most people, and ourselves among the number, clearly overestimated the extent of the material loss inflicted on her by the late struggle. We did not suppose that it was possible to make such a display of recuperative force as she has made in the rapidity with which she has been paying off the German indemnity. But we certainly see no reason to revise any of the opinions we have expressed during the past year as to the depth and extent of the moral evils which first made the war possible, and then led to its failure. In fact, the events of every day confirm the impression that it is not in the power of legislation to build France up again, and that it is very doubtful whether this generation will see the work done, or even begun. To most of those who look at French politics uninfluenced by a sentimental liking for Frenchmen, or a sentimental dislike of Germans, there was at the close of the war only one way of restoring France to her old position, and that was a diligent cultivation of the arts of peace, and, as necessary to this, a diligent cultivation of the spirit of peace. It is not from war, but from readiness for war, and constant thinking and talking of war, that civilization suffers most, and that liberty has most to fear; and the best test of the effect of the war on French morals and politics would, most people felt, be furnished by its effect on the French disposition to fight. If the effect of it was either to disgust Frenchmen with soldiering—which was hardly to be expected—or to convince them that the surest road to military supremacy was through education, decentralization, and digging, and delving, and weaving, and spinning, which it was not unreasonable to expect—there could be little doubt of the greatness and glory of the French future.

Now it turns out, as most people fancied, that the Liberal party—that is, the party which has the greatest career opened to it—is, or is to be, a fighting party. It appears that the rallying-cry is to be "Vengeance," and its policy busy preparation for a renewal of the war with Germany. The army, so far from being reduced, is to be enlarged and improved, and the whole thoughts and energy and intellect turned once more, perhaps for half a century, into military channels. Now, this is exactly what happened after Waterloo; and it is not unsafe to conclude that we are about to witness a period in French history by no means unlike that which has elapsed since 1815. That is to say, the government of the day, whatever its form, having the sense of responsibility which usually comes from the actual possession of power, will perhaps be trying to keep the peace, and the opposition, whatever its creed, will be trying to hound it on into hostilities—the hated foe being this time Germany instead of England. The popular poets will be war poets, the popular writers and orators men who show how easy it is to cross the Rhine, and wipe out in the streets of Berlin the insults of 1871. Every government, too, will be tempted into pandering to this feeling by glorification of the army, by the culture of the military spirit, by the subordination of the civil power to the military power, by sternly opposing all administrative chances which seem likely to render the nation less easily handled as a military machine. Gambetta, who has made his appearance once more in the Assembly, and is a fair representative of the thought of all that portion of the French Republicans who are not Socialists, already treats all reforms as, in the main, means of preparing the country to fight the Prussians, and get back Alsace and Lorraine. It is easy to see what the effect of this on the work of reorganizing the Government will be, and how certainly each successive régime will be tempted into strengthening itself, as every régime has been tempted in times past, by threats of war, or preparations for war.

The probable influence of this state of the French mind on European politics already begins to be revealed. France is not strong enough to threaten Germany single-handed, but she is strong enough to be worth taking into alliance by any power which sees reason to fear or hate Germany; and her own feelings and condition already prompt her to offer herself for such an alliance. There were probably few incidents of the war which astonished French politicians so much as the apparent indifference of other powers to the fate which was overtaking her during the autumn of 1870. Some of the more enthusiastic counted on the gratitude of England; but all counted on the fear and jealousy of both England and Russia driving them into hostility to Prussia. England kept out of the fray, however, on what appears to be a well-settled policy of non-intervention; but for the acquiescence of Russia in the German triumphs there seemed, at the time M. Thiers was making his diplomatic tour, no way of accounting, except the personal friendship of the Czar for Frederick William and his dislike of republicanism. It is quite certain that his assurances that he would not meddle removed a mortal load from Bismarck's mind, and released a very large body of troops for operations in France which would, in the absence of such assurances, have been detained as a corps of observation on the eastern Prussian frontier.

It now turns out, however, that Sedan is playing in the Russian mind very much the same part that Sadowa played in the French mind in 1866. The policy of non-intervention begins to be felt at St. Petersburg to have been a mistake, owing to two things—one, the apparent determination of Austria to become what Andrew Johnson would call the "Moses" of the Slaves, and the other, the alliance of Austria and Germany for the regulation of Eastern affairs, beginning with the administration of some wholesome correction to the Roumanians for the sudden and utterly unjustifiable repudiation of a debt. Austria is flattering the Poles and Bohemians to the top of their bent, and there is already talk of the formal coronation of Francis Joseph as king of the three kingdoms of Poland, Bohemia, and Hungary; and the late meeting of the two Emperors at Ischl, and of their ministers at Gastein, although there are dozens of stories about its result, and all of them inaccurate, appears to have certainly ended in a determination to act together in all matters relating to Eastern Europe. There is, in consequence of all this, openly expressed indignation at St. Petersburg, and the official and non-official press has begun openly to abuse Prussia; and although it never does to attach much importance to stories of military movements making their appearance at the same time with stories of diplomatic coolnesses, there prevails at this moment throughout Europe a widespread belief that preparations are going on in Russia, if not also in Germany, for the great struggle which will finally and absolutely settle what the Franco-Prussian war only half-settled—in whose hands the ruling influence on European affairs during the next century is to be lodged. The overthrow of France simply removed one competitor from the field, but France was not a competitor whose chance any sound judge considered strong. The stationariness of her population for the last forty years, the decline in her moral force, the increasing difficulties in the way of establishing a regular government, and the widespread political failure of the class known as the "Latin races," in which she occupied the foremost place, have, since 1861 at least, destroyed nearly all confidence in her future. Her downfall in 1870, therefore, surprised the best observers only by its suddenness. The war raised Germany to the first rank, indeed we may say to the foremost position, among the European powers; but, great as her successes were, they did not wholly remove from her path what we may call the Russian shadow which has rested on it ever since 1815, and which perhaps did more than anything else during long years to blight the hopes of German liberals. It did more than anything else to cheat the German people of the fruits of the great uprising of 1813; and for the next fifty years from no source probably did the paltry, God-denying despotism of the petty German courts derive so strong a support as from St. Petersburg. It was in vain, however, that German liberals tried to persuade France and England and Prussia that the best bulwark they could possibly erect against the Russian aggressiveness, which was the bugbear of European politicians during the whole of the Emperor Nicholas's reign, would be the union of Germany. That union has at last been brought about, strange to say, with the acquiescence, if not the connivance, of Russia, and its first and most natural result is what the German liberals predicted—the assumption by Germany of the right to control the course of events in Eastern Europe. With the appearance on the scene of the new German Empire, the extension of Russian territory south of the Danube becomes, as we ventured to point out a year ago, simply impossible, and Russian weight in the decision of what is called the "Eastern Question" a thing of the past. All the elements which in our day go to constitute political strength—education, mechanical skill, mental and moral vigor, social solidity, the influence of great traditions, the habit of discipline and self-sacrifice, and, last of all, numbers—Germany possesses in a higher degree than any other power in Christendom, except Russia, and it is only in numbers that Russia comes anywhere near her. If we had to doubt which of the two powers would, during the next two centuries at least, play the greater part on the stage of events, it would be to doubt the superiority of civilization over barbarism; and although we must admit that, within her present limits, Poland excluded, Russia has certainly nothing to fear from Germany, it is no less certain that without the consent of Germany she can secure no accession of territory on her southern borders. In other words, it begins to seem as if Russia must either surrender her fanatical hopes of two centuries, or engage in a desperate trial of strength with by far the most formidable rival she has ever encountered. The combination of France and England to check her progress in the Black Sea looks like child's play in the presence of the obstacle which now confronts her on the Danube.

That such a situation as this should be accepted with equanimity by Russia is not to be expected; we might as well "bid the main flood bate his usual height"; and that she should see in French exasperation the providential means of escape from it is most natural; and that so much combustible material should be accumulated without finally producing a conflagration, is hardly to be expected, for the pretensions of the opposing forces are of a nature that scarcely admit of abatement. The spectacle of France assisting Russia, and preventing the restoration of Poland, and of Poles fighting fiercely under the banner of Austria for the recovery of their lost nationality, would be one of the strangest spectacles in history, though hardly stranger to any one familiar with the politics of the last half-century than that of Germany in arms under a single chief, resisting Russian dictation.

A POLITICAL WATERING-PLACE.

Our first acquaintance with Long Branch was made through an engraving in one of our illustrated contemporaries, and certainly our eyes have seldom rested on a more animated and attractive scene than the beach as there depicted. A long reach of sand, bounded on one side by tall cliffs, scaled here and there by commodious stairways, and on the other by the ocean, which broke on it in three ranks of well-drilled "combers," was covered by a crowd of persons of all ages and both sexes, dressed in the height of fashion. The men were all at least six feet high; a great majority shaved their chins, and wore moustaches and neat side-whiskers; while those who retained the full beard wore eye-glasses. Their clothes were of various cuts, but there was none of it which was not costly. We were struck, too, by the tallness of the women, and the extreme richness of their clothing, but not nearly so much so as by the behavior of the children. Every little girl was well-dressed, and was playing with a little boy, also well-dressed, at some game peculiarly adapted to the seaside; and every gentleman—and there were a great many—was lavishing attentions on one or more ladies. A line of text informed us that this was the state of things "at noon," and a more elegant, refined, and lively state of things nobody could wish to see. How so many men got away from their business, and who were their tailors, were questions the most careless observer could hardly help asking himself; but the high character of the journal which described it all made the answer plain enough. There evidently were sides of life in the neighborhood of New York with which we were not familiar.

We have since then waited by the beach many a noon for this fashionable throng to come down and delight our eyes. We have watched the stairways in vain for the crowds of tall young women, with the trim waists, the high-heeled boots, the pretty ankles, the mass of trimmings, and the heavy chignons, who were to be attended by the tall cavaliers, with round hats, cut-away coats, canes, and eye-glasses, and to lounge past us, happy and affluent, and totally indifferent to that curse of American life, business—but we have never seen them. They may have flitted off to Newport, or Saratoga, or Sharon, or Cape May. All we know is that at Long Branch they are not, either at noon or any other time. The beach, in fact, is never crowded; the few ladies one sees on it are hard-worked Jersey wives and daughters, who have come in on excursion trains to get a whiff of salt air, and are plunging through the deep sand, followed either by elderly "providers" carrying shawls and dinner-bags, out of whom care and toil have long ago taken all tendency to flirtation, or else by jolly young farmers or store-boys, whose clothes fit them like sentry-boxes, and whose gambols with the girls call up no reminiscences either of ball-room or opera-box. Even the ocean does not behave as we were led to expect. It frets, and foams, and roars, but it does it irregularly and spasmodically, and often viciously. The breakers in the picture must have been exhibited only once, for the artist's special benefit. The "cliff," too, is disappointing to a reader of illustrated journals. Instead of being a hundred feet high, it is only about fifteen. Instead of being composed of savage rocks, it consists of red Jersey gravel, which the rains wash down, and the ocean year by year eats away. You may go down it by the ladder, but, if active and eager, you can jump down, and the boys occasionally descend on what Frenchmen call their "séant"—a useful and proper term, for which there is no English equivalent.

And yet Long Branch is an interesting and instructive summer resort, and we warn all students of human nature that he who thinks he knows New York, and has not seen Long Branch, deceives himself. In all other watering-places with which we are acquainted, the New York element is diluted by a dash of Boston, or Philadelphia, or Baltimore, or some other city. At Long Branch it is pure. Not that Long Branch, by any means, gives one an idea of what is best in New York life, but it gives us a side of New York life with which no other city has anything to compare, and gives it in a state of extraordinary condensation. Partly owing to its nearness to the city, and partly to the goodness of the means of communication, it has become within three or four years the chosen resort of a class which rules New York politically, which is found nowhere but in New York, and which discovers few or no points of contact with the inhabitants of any other place. It is a class, too, which in any other "summer resort" would be tolerably uncomfortable, but which in going to Long Branch carries its power and privilege and dignity and standards of morals and manners with it. Its life is not on the beach, but on the plateau above, and in the long row of monster hotels which for three miles line the promenade. You may wander at almost any hour of the day along the sands, and see none of those who figure prominently in Long Branch life. The only sign of their existence one gets down there is a glimpse of the liveried hats of their lacqueys, as they shoot along the promenade above.

If one wants to know in what lies the ability by which the political class in New York raise themselves above the rank of common thieves and pimps, and makes their protracted existence possible even in a community of the lowest morals, he cannot consider himself well-informed on that point without going down on one of the boats which now connect the place with the city. He will there see that their claim on the forbearance of society lies in their remarkable skill in transportation. The Company which owns the boats is a concern absolutely without credit. Few persons would take one of its shares as a gift, much less let it have goods on credit. We believe the precautions taken by those who deal with it to secure payment before delivery are remarkable illustrations of human foresight and ingenuity. The president is the most notorious and lewdest swindler of a lewd and swindling age. But he clearly knows what travellers need. How he came to know, it would be hard to say. It is not the result of experience, for his own wants in his early days were few and simple. Nevertheless, he starts punctually; his waiters are clean, well-dressed, attentive; his fare is good and cheap; and he has given up to the dining the most commodious room on board, where one can sit at table as one goes down the bay and look out on shore and sea, and feel the fresh breezes blow, and enjoy the swift rush of the boat through the water. His officers are gorgeously dressed in the costume, as near as may be, of lord-high-admirals. We doubt whether the nautical experience of these "commanders" or "captains" has been varied or extensive; indeed, if we were to make a rough guess in the matter, we should say that their earliest lessons in navigation were received in moments snatched from the duty of mixing drinks for thirsty passengers. But the waters of the bay, between the Battery and Sandy Hook, are well known; the channel, thanks to the Government of our Union, is clearly marked out; and, with the aid of an intelligent pilot and engineer, the higher dignitaries of the ship are left free to adorn the decks and mingle with the passengers in social intercourse. There is music, too, dispensed by a brass band. The musicians are strong, healthy men, and the passengers are strong and healthy, too, so that the strains are seldom either sweet or low, and the whole is headed by what we learn from the advertisements is a "virtuoso," who plays solos on the cornet-a-piston. The boat is roomy and well-ordered throughout. One has to walk with averted eyes past the capacious barber's shop to prevent a young colored man dashing out and whisking him with a broom from head to foot. More wonderful than all, in the train between Sandy Hook and Long Branch, nobody ever wants a seat. We have enquired in vain for an instance. Let the crowd be never so great—and it is sometimes very great—there are empty places. This is a strange story to tell to the American traveller, but it is true.

The company which goes down, and which it is well to observe on the boat before it scatters into the hotels and cottages, would be considered by a Bostonian or Philadelphian "promiscuous." In reality, however, it is homogeneous to an extraordinary degree. It is very seldom that one meets in the United States with six or seven hundred persons whose tastes, habits, ideals, and aspirations are so very like. He would, for instance, probably nowhere on this continent—not even in Montana or New Mexico—find a crowd in which birth or education furnished so little claim to distinction. In that crowded saloon a Revolutionary grandfather would go for nothing; Lowell or Longfellow, Prescott or Macaulay, would be strange or unfamiliar names, which, if they attracted attention at all, would probably be attributed to gentlemen in the dry-goods business. This is partly due to the strong predominance of citizens of German extraction and of the Jewish persuasion, with whom surnames only recently came into use, and whose tastes are not literary, and partly to the fact that the American element is drawn almost entirely from the class known as "sporting," which is usually made up of persons who have never taken kindly to schooling. When the Young American, fresh from his pious country home, sits down on the boat and watches them, he finds himself in the presence of some strange phenomena. For instance, he has probably come up to New York with the notion that not only was gambling sinful and disreputable, but that the keeping of a gambling-house was a criminal and infamous mode of getting a living, and he probably supposes that gambling-house keepers avoid observation, and only take the air under cover of night. Let him take his place by the gangway of the Pilgrim Father, however, any afternoon he pleases in summer, and he will see a jolly-looking, bright-eyed man, with the early corpulence and the pasty complexion that come of late hours and want of exercise, but with a sensual jaw and fat, white hands, glittering with diamonds, saunter on board, in the full light of the afternoon sun, observed of all and courting observation. The crowd falls back respectfully before him as he enters the ship; dozens of voices hail him "Jack" from various parts of the deck and bid him welcome; and dozens of well-dressed passengers rush up to talk to him, the younger ones evidently gratified by a nod from him. He is clearly a great man, and he is clearly, if we may use a vulgar illustration, on his own dunghill. The waiters are all bows and smiles; as he lounges towards the office the "captain" obsequiously and eagerly opens the door to let him fling in his stylish bag. When he seats himself in a cool place, a noisy circle gathers round him, and he every minute has to answer questions, decide controversies, or give his confirmation to a good joke or story before the real laughing over it—and such laughing—can begin. After he has composed himself he orders champagne, and it flows bottle after bottle, with the addition of a small piece of lemon in each glass, a mixture which to us was new, and which we—perhaps wrongly—ascribed to an attempt on the part of New York politicians to preserve in the conviviality of the New World some trace, or tradition, or reminiscence, of the common domestic whiskey-punch from which the Irish ancestors of a great many of them had drawn strength to support "six hundred years of wrong." The Young American from the pious home will probably be surprised to hear that Jack, who sits there in his velvet coat, with his gorgeous shirt-front studded with diamonds, with diamonds in his wristbands, with one of his flabby legs crossed over the other, and elevating into view a tiny, tight patent-leather boot, is the keeper of a notorious gambling-house, well known to the police; that his political influence is enormous; that that easy, indifferent, self-assured manner of his comes from the same sense of superiority to the law which, in fact, gave it to the Montmorencis and Howards two centuries ago; that, in short, he is one of the aristocrats of our new civilization; that the group which surrounds him is largely made up of the men to whom the New York church members commit every year the collection and outlay of their taxes, the education of their children, the care of their prisoners and of their sick and poor, and the administration of their justice to high and low. That Jack should not think meanly of himself our pious youth will the better understand when we tell him that in the group there, under his eyes, quaffing the champagne, we see Republican politicians, hot for the rights of man, and who, though in this part of their life they are cheek-by-jowl with Jack, the New York gambler, in another part of it, a twelvemonth hence, will be found hobnobbing with Sumner and Phillips, or taking a whiff of humanitarian theology in the Boston Music Hall; that in Jack's house, in the winter season, judges of the Supreme Court of the State of New York may almost every night be found; and that it is only a few months since his jovial name appeared attached to a birthday congratulation, addressed to the lewd President of the Company, side by side with that of a prominent member of a prominent Congregational church. If our youth will come down with us to Long Branch, too, he will find that, next to the President of the Company, Jack is the leading local magnate, the patron of local improvements and local amusements, whom all persons interested in the growth of the place love and honor. President Fisk, however, holds the first place in influence and distinction. His team of six horses, and his gorgeous coach filled with frail beauties, carefully selected, are perhaps the most prominent objects on the promenade on fine afternoons. To the outside world he is a Jeremy Diddler of luxurious habits, but to the Long Branch world, and, above all, to the local valetaille—the great army of cooks, waiters, coachmen, expressmen, brakemen, chambermaids—he is "Colonel Fisk," a gentleman of "fine talents and dignified manners," who spends his money like a prince. We have wondered, on seeing the country people who came up on the excursion crowding into the hotel, their children clinging to their hands, to get a peep into the great man's suite of apartments, or collected in groups to stare at him on fine afternoons, as he saunters along the shore leading a lady of the half-world by the hand, what sort of notion the young people would carry back to the farmhouses of the great problem of success in life, and of the ends of striving, in this busy American world.

It is, after all, however, the selection of Long Branch as a summer retreat by President Grant, and not its selection by the city gamblers and politicians, which has of late given it most of its fame in the rest of the Union; but it must be said for him that he contributes nothing to the brilliancy of its seasons. The plateau on which his cottage stands is cut off by a creek or inlet from that on which the hotels stand and the visitors swarm; and if the Outs would let the Ins alone, his summer would be as quiet and his breezes as pure as any weary man could desire. The lesson of the great gold panic of two years ago has apparently not been lost on him, for the high dignitaries of the Narragansett S. S. Co., we suspect, enjoy little of his company, and have few opportunities of giving him advice as to the best manner of "tiding the country over" the hard times. But Black Care sits behind him in his light wagon, nevertheless, for he seldom closes his avenue gate without seeing half-a-dozen office-seekers' hacks hitched to some portion of his premises, and half-a-dozen gentlemen waiting in his piazza, to let him know what disposition should be made of that Hoboken tidewaitership or Oshkosh post-office, if he means to save the country and the party from going to the dogs. Some of them come, literally, from the ends of the earth, for there is no corner of this vast continent in which the destinies of humanity may not be favorably affected by the use of one or two posts worth about twelve hundred dollars a year, or in which there is not some patriot who is frantically struggling to uphold the flag in the midst of a band of demoniacal copperheads and rebels, whom it will only need a very little encouragement from the Chief Magistrate to enable him to cow and disperse. Nobody can think of his long "conferences"—this is what they call their talks—with them without pitying him; and yet it is hard for anybody who ever admired him to see him go past in his wagon, brown, fat, and grim, without bearing him a grudge. For, no matter what we may think of his administration, the Grant over whom we threw up our caps in April, 1865, has vanished into history. The silent soldier whose struggles on a hundred fields so many millions watched with sleepless, hungry eyes, and whom so many of us feasted as a hero, exists no more. Struggle against the feeling as we may, the gentleman who has trotted past us, though he looks like a man whom any of us would be glad to have by his side on a desperate day, when our business was to stand or die, is after all no longer the Grant of our dreams and songs, but a middle-aged politician on whom the cares of state hang heavily, and its paltriest cares heaviest of all. The shining fame of Vicksburg and Chattanooga and Richmond can, of course, never die out; but it is only the student who will hereafter see it. It has no rays for the work of "reorganizing the party in this city," or lighting every hungry adventurer to his proper share of custom-house spoil. In this we are all wronged—and not we of this generation only, but our children and our children's children.

But "we will not think of themes like these." A few steps bring us down to the beach, where the high bank shuts out all sights and sounds of the base and busy world behind, and we are in the presence of the ocean, and one may say alone with the ocean, as one is on few parts of the American coast. As to Long Branch, the ocean is indeed immense, and savage, and loud resounding. The beat of the surf on ever so many straight miles of beach, roars like distant thunder, and as the fog rolls up from the east it fills the mind with a vague reminiscence of "that immortal sea which brought us hither," and on which all of us, assessors and collectors, standard-bearers, champions, and committees on resolutions, will one day drift to the repose which no custom-house can ever give.

Correspondence.

MR. BOUTWELL AND THE NEW LOAN.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: At the risk of being deemed officious, I beg to assure you of the very high estimation in which I hold your article, entitled "The Bottom of the Great City Difficulty." It is the first time I have ever seen in print a recognition of the fallacy which is the underlying cause of the failure, partial or complete, which has attended, and will ever attend, all attempts to administer the affairs of cities upon so-called Democratic or Republican political principles. Universal suffrage applied to business is nonsense, as we have found to our cost, and we shall never fully emancipate ourselves from the vulgar tyranny which oppresses us till we fully appreciate the fact.

May I be allowed to say a word upon another subject, which touches upon my own special vocation? In the same number of your paper, you strike off with, I think, a keen insight into character, some of your objections to the "Honorable the Secretary of the Treasury," as a man, and manager of the national finances. I agree with you in every position except that taken in your number four; if in it you mean to state that the Government could not raise $1,500,000,000 at 5 per cent. In my opinion, the Secretary ought long since to have placed his $500,000,000 Five per cent. loan. His failure to do so is owing to two blunders, both due to his want of knowledge and capacity as a Minister of Finance; first, as you state, "to his failure to make any efforts for a return to specie payments"—not understanding that the one thing that is now alone required to place our national credit in the foremost rank is the honest redemption of Government promises; next, to his misconception as to the times and circumstances which would justify a popular appeal to the masses for money. In trying to imitate Jay Cooke, who imitated Louis Napoleon, he simply exhibited the parrot's power, heedless alike of the absence or the presence of the elements which made the originals successful.

The experience of the world should have taught him, that to place loans at a low rate of interest in the calm, sober times of peace, when capital is accumulated at the great monetary centres, and not diffused and stagnant in the hands of the million, as it is when industries and commerce are paralyzed by war or civil commotions, has always required the intervention of old, experienced, wealthy bankers, whose initiative has uniformly been necessary to the inspiration of confidence in the host of smaller dealers and capitalists who become the final distributors of the loan. To appoint, as the Secretary did, great numbers of the lesser banks and bankers and brokers his agents, and to appeal to the public at the same time, was only an effort to make water run up-hill; he was forced at last to throw himself bodily into the arms of Jay Cooke, making the best terms he could—and they were pretty good terms for Jay Cooke.

As to his 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds, if, instead of coercing and threatening the banks to induce them to exchange 6 per cent. securities for 4 or 4½ per cent. new bonds, he had offered them a just and fair equivalent in the reduction of taxation, he could have made an exchange for the whole amount of 6 per cents now held by the banks.—Very respectfully,

J. L. Worth.

New York, Sept. 9, 1871.

Notes.

Messrs. Lee & Shepard have in preparation attractive editions of "Reynard the Fox," from the Low German original, and of "Robinson Crusoe," "The Pilgrim's Progress," and "Gulliver"; also, Dean Alford's "New Testament Commentary for English Readers," and "Greek Testament"; "Types and Pens," by a practical proof-reader; two more of Madame Schwarz's novels; and "The Baron von Adelstein," by Francis H. Underwood.——Three works by Henri Taine will shortly be published by Messrs. Holt & Williams, viz., his "English Literature," translated by H. Van Laun; "Philosophy of Greek Art," translated by John Durand; and "On Intelligence," translated by T. D. Haye. They have also in preparation a new library edition of Coleridge's "Biographia Literaria"; Aytoun and Martin's "Poems and Ballads of Goethe"; "The Sakuntala," from the Sanskrit of Kalidasa, with an introduction by Prof. Whitney; and "The Mystery of Orcival," from the French.——Nearly uniform with the "red-line" editions of Longfellow, Tennyson, and Whittier which are published by Messrs. Osgood & Co. will be Messrs. Appletons' red-line edition of Bryant. The difference will be in the size of type, which in the Bryant will be larger than in the others. The same firm announce a cheaper edition—price six dollars—of "Dana's Household Book of Poetry," still probably the best work of its kind; an illustrated reprint of Captain Burton's adaptation of "Vikram and the Vampire; or, Tales of Hindoo Deviltry"—a book which we hope will be given to many thousand boys this Christmas; and a medical book which may be of use to the unmedical reader—namely, "Emergencies, and how to Treat Them," which aims to tell what should be done for the treatment, among other things, of accidents and cases of poisoning.

—For some time past the Boston Journal has been publishing a series of papers written by an old-time politician, of a better school than a large school of the politicians of to-day, in which he has given a mass of recollections which it would be worth while for some publisher to gather into a book. Setting aside the question of the success of the book as a business venture, it would be worth while to have it for the purpose of bringing home to the imaginations of this generation the aspect of politics thirty and forty and fifty years ago. Many a man shed tears in the street when the news came, in 1844, that New York had gone Democratic, and Polk had beaten Clay—Harry Clay, the Mill-Boy of the Slashes, the Sage of Ashland. This writer of whom we speak gives, by the bye, a good account of the scene in the old Courier office, we believe it was, in Boston, when the express came from Albany to the jubilant Whigs that New York had gone for Polk. It is difficult to see how Mr. B. F. Hallett could have survived his joy on that occasion. There would not be many tears shed next fall, we imagine, by either Democrats or Republicans, over the defeat of either of the candidates. And though we have Gen. Banks still, and Mr. H. C. Deming, and others of their kin, the Pograms of these days produce, we take it, nothing like the effect which eloquence such as the late Mr. Burlingame's, for instance, was safe to produce twenty-five years ago; and they themselves appear to know it ever since the "hole in the sky" and other impeachment oratory. So, too, of the personal following and personal magnetism of political leaders—the Henry Clays, Daniel Websters, Stephen A. Douglases, and Martin Van Burens of our ante-rebellion days. We do not repeat them, and this though the country is full of successful generals of deserved reputation. A party might to-day venture to throw away the "availability" doctrine with far less fear of imperilling its success than the politicians could have felt in the more immature years of a quarter or a half century ago.

—Our readers deserve protection against Mr. A. B. Way, of Alliance, Ohio, as much as the readers of the religious journals of that State, so we make no apology for printing what the secular press would call "a first-class notice" of that person, from the pen of Mr. F. M. Green, also of Alliance. Under the general heading of "A. B. Way—Beware of Him," Mr. Green gives notice "to the churches of Christ everywhere, and to Christian people generally, that the above-mentioned person is utterly unworthy of your confidence as a man or a Christian. During the past year, to go back no further, his conduct has been most ungodly." Although he had been for some years a resident of Alliance, and a preacher among the disciples of Christ in Stark and adjoining counties, the grand jury of Stark nevertheless found it necessary last June to indict Mr. Way for forgery. Mr. Way admitted that he had been concerned in some forgeries; but he immediately left the neighborhood, and it is the fact that his whereabouts cannot be ascertained, and the further fact that when he mentioned the forgeries he "signified his intention to go to preaching again," which makes it desirable that the public should be warned against him. Mr. Green prescribes for him a kind of treatment which it might be well to apply to Mr. Butler's Baptist friend, the Rev. Dr. Marvin, of Boston, and certain others of the same city whom we could name if it were necessary: "Let the brethren everywhere pray that he may yet be saved, but in no-wise countenance him." We should hope not. Still, in justice to Mr. Way, it should be remembered by everybody who has any of his "paper" that it is not stated that he is unsound on any point of doctrine.

—Mr. Kinsley Twining, of Cambridge, Mass., appears to be a clergyman of a different variety from that exemplified by the Rev. Dr. Marvin. He takes occasion to read the latter a sharp lecture on his recent advocacy of Butler—an advocacy which must be characterized as very profligate or else a piece of ignorance which is highly culpable in a man who has charged himself with the daily business of teaching men and women how, by righteousness of life, they may attain the blessedness of an eternity in the presence of a just God. Mr. Twining sends Mr. Marvin, through the Boston Advertiser, a letter which may or may not do him good, but which is at all events profitable for general instruction and reproof, and is capable of doing good in other places as well as in Boston. He begins by rebuking Dr. Marvin for venturing to pledge "the Christian men of Massachusetts" to support the candidacy of such a person as Butler, for such a reason as that, if he were elected, he would "enforce the prohibitory law." This, says Mr. Twining, is to pledge the Christians of Massachusetts to an immoral position. "What I complain of," he says, "is that you should have so low an opinion of the Christian public as to suppose that, for the sake of this one purely prudential consideration, they are willing to give their suffrages for a man who, whatever he may be in himself, stands before the public as a man unfit to be trusted." "You are a friend of reform," he goes on; "so am I; but reform in one direction is not to be carried on by the sacrifice of all that is good in other respects. . . Social reform," he goes on, "implies always a wide growth of character. Other virtues must be kept moving pari passu with those of temperance. You cannot conquer drunkenness while conscience is left to crumble in other respects. You must sustain the morals, the religion, the civilization of the people, otherwise there will be no basis to uphold and support their temperance. You come forward with some leading question of the moment, and elevate it not only to a great but to an exclusive importance. You make it the main question, and because your man is supposed to be sound on the main question of the moment, you expect us to condone his unsoundness on other matters which are not main questions of the moment, for the one simple reason [here is a point well put] that they are main questions for all time. If you can discover a more demoralizing course of action than this, I can only say that I hope you will not see reason for pledging Christian people to support it." Here is another saying, worthy to be accepted in all the churches and newspaper offices: "There is no virtue in this world that is worthy of the name, and fit to be trusted, except that which is embodied in good men." He closes as follows (and as Mr. Green, of Alliance, says, "Christian papers please copy"): "I do not set a lower estimate than others on the ravages of intemperance, but the corruption of a people's civil and political conscience is something far more to be dreaded. At such a time as this, prohibitory laws and everything else pertaining to social virtue would seem to depend on the issue of the question whether there remains enough of love of honesty and of the fear of God in the people to rise against questionable and doubtful politicians, and fill their once honorable offices with men of sound, broad, and known integrity. Can you inflict a severer blow on the temperance cause than to give it at such a time an attitude of indifference to this momentous subject? At a time when so many of what you might call 'the world's people' are making a brave and noble battle to save the nation from civil and political corruption, it would, indeed, be hard should they be deserted in the fray by their natural allies in the Christian church. They might then, perhaps, be pardoned some railing against such shepherds, should ministers of the Gospel go about corrupting their flocks with that devil's plea, 'A knave who will execute the law, rather than a Christian who will not.'"

—For some reason not stated, but probably because the religious factions in Ireland make so much more political trouble than anywhere else in the civilized world, the English census authorities, who ask Englishmen and Scotchmen no questions about their creed, are careful to ascertain the strength of the various denominations in Ireland. From the last census we take the following figures, which have a special interest for the people of the United States, who, up to the year 1871, have received from the British Islands immigrants to the great number of 3,857,850—a population greater than that which framed the Constitution, and established itself a nation. The whole number of inhabitants in Ireland, April 3, 1871, was 5,402,759. Of these, we may say—speaking roundly—that three-quarters return themselves, or are returned, as Roman Catholics, while the fourth quarter is composed of Anglicans (683,295), Presbyterians (503,461), Methodists (41,815), Independents (4,485), Friends (3,834), persons who are classed as "of various other Christian persuasions" (19,035), and Jews, who number only 258. The class belonging to "other Christian persuasions" is the only class which has increased since 1861, and in that class the Census Commissioners include mendicants, temporary lodgers, and travellers. The percentage of increase in their case is but slight, however, amounting only to one and twenty-six hundredths. In every other class there has been a decrease, the percentage being as follows: Among the Roman Catholics it has amounted to a little more than eight; among the members of the once Established Church, about one and a half; among the various dissenting bodies, very nearly four. The 258 Jews of 1861 had, by 1871, decreased more than thirty-four per cent. In one of the four provinces the Anglicans and Protestants outnumber the Roman Catholic; Ulster has of the latter not quite nine hundred thousand (894,525), and of the former 935,873.

—The siege of Paris was, first and last, full of romances, and among them the adventures of the Venus of Milo, as disclosed in the Journal Officiel by M. Théophile Gautier, must be reckoned not least interesting. This statue—the one art-treasure, as M. Gautier says, of which every European museum envied France the possession; the goddess which the Parisians were determined should not become a Prussienne—had the honor of being singled out for removal from the Louvre, though the building was protected against all ordinary casualties. With a happy unconsciousness of what was to follow the surrender, and anxious to conceal the inimitable antique only from Prussian confiscation or destruction, the guardians of the Venus carefully deposited it in a secret receptacle in the Prefecture of Police, well swathed, encased in an iron chest, and hidden by a double wall of masonry. This building naturally fell under the torch of the Commune in its last hours, and the statue was almost miraculously preserved amid the ruins by a stream of water which bathed the enclosure. The damp to which the figure had been exposed, however, caused a separation of the upper and lower portions at their joining, when it appeared that the former, at the last setting up, had been tilted forward, out of its original position, by means of wedges. According to the Academy, this discovery favors the discarded "interpretation of the figure as victress at the Judgment of Paris," inasmuch as "a more erect attitude of the body would be more consonant with the action of holding aloft the apple, and would do away with the necessity of supposing a weight sustained by the arms to account for and balance the forward stoop."

—The now abundant French publications relating to the war include the following titles of more than average interest: Delaunay's "Histoire de la Campagne de France;" Auguste Deschamp's "Histoire de la Chute de l'Empire"; Virmaitre's "La Commune à Paris"; "Documents pour l'Histoire Contemporaine"; General Chanzy's "La Deuxième Armée de la Loire," with which may be compared "Mémoires sur l'Armée de Chanzy"; and General Faidherbe's "Campagne de l'Armée du Nord en 1870–71." The pamphlet which stands fourth on the list contains a despatch from Drouyn de Lhuys to Count Goltz, the Prussian Minister to Paris, dated Vichy, August 3, 1866. This is probably the first French document on record touching the claims of France for compensation after the territorial aggrandizement of Prussia by the war with Austria. It shows that Napoleon's secretary of foreign affairs was completely deceived as to the willingness of the Berlin Cabinet to make the compensations in question, having been led by Benedetti to suppose that Bismarck, to whom the matter had been broached early in July, recognized the justice of the claim, and only sought a plausible mode of satisfying it. The snub which these great expectations received when the claims were formally presented by Benedetti immediately on the King's return to Berlin, might have opened the Emperor's eyes to the decay of French diplomacy.

—General Chanzy's narrative is said to be rather dry reading, and it would be difficult, indeed, to be eloquent over the deeds of the Second Army of the Loire and be strictly truthful in describing its rout. Its commander, as may be imagined, has set himself to write a panegyric in place of history; but as this is not just what France needs, and as some Frenchmen have the sense to perceive it, the work has not escaped criticism—that of the Constitutionnel being perhaps as frank as any:

"In my view," says the writer, Jules Richard, "there is one thing worse than surrender, and that is the unwillingness to confess the surrender. A people that has not known how to conquer, should at least understand how to play the rôle of the vanquished, and one of the greatest proofs of the demoralization of the French lies in the very fact that they cannot look their misfortune in the face and draw a lesson from it. At this moment there is not in all France a small shopkeeper or mechanic who is not convinced that the war might have been continued and King William's moustache burnt off him. . . And then the history of France and especially of the Republic has been so strangely written that the French cannot be blamed for being ignorant of their former defeats. The historians have told them that they were always victorious. It has been justly remarked that our generals understood not a word of geography; as justly might it be asserted that our statesmen understand nothing of history. . . If M. Thiers would deserve well of his fatherland, . . let him order of some worthy man—for instance, of Col. Stoffel—a small popular work with the title: 'What Prussia did after Jena?' Let this book be printed at the public expense and given to all school-children who have earned a prize or a promotion. That would be better than for ever repeating: 'Honor is saved.' No; honor is not saved. No, there is no solace for our misfortune; no, we are not only beaten, but ingloriously beaten to boot."

—Gen. Faidherbe, a more enthusiastic friend and admirer of Gambetta than is General Chanzy, might be expected accordingly to be somewhat more unscrupulous in his version of history, by which French victories are to appear the inevitable results of French fighting. He has, however, reckoned without his host, inasmuch as Gen. Von Goeben, his opponent in the North, still lives, and has, in the Militär Wochenblatt, vanquished him a second time in a very summary manner. Von Goeben selects but one of Faidherbe's misrepresentations, that relating to the battles before Bapaume, on the 2d and 3d of January. After setting forth the weakness of the German forces, and the importance of avoiding any engagement which should endanger the reduction of Péronne, then in progress, he shows that the two French army corps only succeeded in capturing the villages held as outposts by the German Eighth Army Corps, and could neither shake nor outflank its main positions. When they retired to their fortresses on the 4th, they had suffered an admitted loss of 53 officers and 2,056 men, a number of officers, together with 500 men, having been captured unwounded. The German corps, on the other hand, lost but 47 officers and 996 men, in killed, wounded, and missing, and 128 horses; and Péronne capitulated on the 10th. Faidherbe, seeking to prove the cowardice of his adversaries, adduces an order of Gen. Von Goeben, directing the troop commanders to point out to him the officers who had fled from the fight at Bapaume, that he might have them cashiered. A neater turn to a falsehood is seldom given than this one receives. The order in question, says Von Goeben, was actually Faidherbe's own, but by mistake was telegraphed to an English journal in Von Goeben's name, while, at the same time, the French journals were publishing the original order properly credited to the "victor" at Bapaume.

BALAUSTION'S ADVENTURE.*

THE general public will, perhaps, be more pleased with this poem than the particular public professing the Browning cultus. But it is perfectly Browningesque in all its essential features; and it is at the same time rather easier of comprehension than most of its author's works, so that it may well enough, while gratifying the disciples, serve as a kind of initiatory exercise for the profane, and so please and profit more persons than could reasonably be expected to like a new poem by Mr. Browning. The writing of it appears to have been a task imposed upon him by a lady, the Countess Cowper, to whom he dedicates the volume. This he does, by the way, with a compliment so florid as, perhaps, will make some readers a little uneasy at the outset. "If I mention the simple truth," he says, "that this poem absolutely owes its existence to you—who not only suggested, but imposed on me as a task, what has proved the most delightful of May-month amusements—I shall seem honest, indeed, but hardly prudent; for how good and beautiful ought such a poem to be! Euripides might fear little" [the poem is a sort of paraphrase, with comments, of the "Alcestis" of Euripides]—"Euripides might fear little; but I also have an interest in the performance; and what wonder if I beg you to suffer that it make, in another and far easier sense, its nearest possible approach to those Greek qualities of goodness and beauty, by laying itself gratefully at your feet?" The poetical and chivalric Elizabethan compliment, which had only to be beautifully paid, and which the complimented person must live up to as well as he could, it being none of the poet's lookout to do more than make a noble invention, undoubtedly was a fine thing in its way. Whether it can be made to breathe our more prosaic atmosphere—or our differently poetic atmosphere—and wear an air of less than very dubious sincerity of admiration, seems doubtful. Passing on to the poem, however, we find that the task laid upon the poet would seem to have been to tell the story of Alcestis in something like the way—not to be irreverent—in which Thackeray tells the story of the life led by Ivanhoe, after Rowena had led him to the altar. It is a way with which Mr. Browning is familiar. Being primarily a psychologist, of a subtlety that makes him almost a demonstrator of morbid psychology, he is always pleased to take a story where ninety-nine story-tellers out of a hundred would leave it, or have left it, and to turn it over and over and over, and peer into it, and lay bare all the intricate filaments of motive which, whether or not they often are at the bottom of action, reveal themselves to the eye trained in introspective contemplation. Supposing that he was compelled to choose for the exercise of his peculiar gift some one of the Greek writers of antiquity, doubtless Mr. Browning made his best choice when he took Euripides—

> "Our Euripides the Human.
> With his droppings of warm tears," as he is called by Mrs. Browning in her unpleasant manner. With the religious struggles of the elder poet, the modern one, who is fond of brooding over spiritual things and spinning theories more or less satisfactory, doubtless sympathizes. And that arbitrary treatment of the legends he works in which is characteristic of Euripides; his habit of long and irrelevant philosophizing suggested only by the matters in hand, and not growing out of it; his subtilizing dialogue—even further wrong than his bandying of frigid proverbial wisdom from interlocutor to interlocutor—all this probably brings him closer to Mr. Browning's heart than either of his great forerunners. On the other hand, as is hinted by Mrs. Browning's praise of Euripides, his system of depending for tragical effect on the pity and other purely human emotions of his hearers, rather than of setting before them some severer, more moralizing type of loftiness or beauty, doubtless fits him better for presentation to the modern reader. To tell the story of the weak-souled, selfish Admetus of Euripides—not of the hospitable Admetus whose flocks Apollo herded, and whom the god learned to love, and whom the hero, Hercules, made comrade and friend; and the story of the Alcestis who perceives all her husband's selfishness, and knows the full extent of her self-sacrifice—not of the Alcestis who, in the early fable, with its happy end, is the simple type of tender and dutiful wifely affection and cheerful self-surrender—to tell the later and sophisticated form of the legend as Euripides told it, and then to add to this twice-told tale a suggested version of it, differing from both the others, and which is got by > ". . . . Sounding in the soul," after the regular Browning method,

> "To depths below the deepest, reaching good
> In evil, that makes evil good again"— this is what Mr. Browning here does. And as we have said, it is done in his well-known interesting way—a way which seems to us, we confess, very much more interesting than poetical; and more interesting at first than afterwards, when it has become tedious; and when it has been seen to be acute to excess; and when, were it not for the author's thoughtfulness, and especially for the obscurity of style in which he clothes his involution of thought, it would be manifestly seen to be in its essence nearly as enervating morally and intellectually to those who are fondest of it, as it is fatiguing to those who care least for it.

* "Balaustion's Adventure. Including a Transcript from Euripides. By Robert Browning." Boston; James R. Osgood & Co., 1871.

For use in the frame-work which he makes for the setting of his "transcript of Euripides," Mr. Browning invents a young Greek girl, a Rhodian, whom also he christens, giving her the name Balaustion, which means the wild-pomegranate-flower, and which is given her for the reasons, good enough, whether or not particularly cogent, which are herein set forth:

". . . . Here she stands,
Balaustion! Strangers greet the lyric girl!
Euripides? Babai! what a word there 'scaped
Your teeth's enclosure, quoth my grandsire's song!
Why, fast as snow in Thrace, the voyage through,
Has she been falling thick in flakes of him!
Frequent as figs at Kaunos, Kaunians said.
Balaustion, stand forth and confirm my speech!
Now it was some whole passion of a play;
Now, peradventure, but a honey-drop
That slipt its comb i' the chorus. If there rose
A star, before I could determine steer
Southward or northward—if a cloud surprised
Heaven, ere I fairly hollaed 'Furl the sail!'—
She had at finger's end both cloud and star;
Some thought that perched there, tame and tuneable,
Fitted with wings; and still, as off it flew,
'So sang Euripides,' she said, 'so sang
The meteoric poet of air and sea,
Planets and the pale populace of heaven,
The mind of man, and all that's made to soar!'
And so, although she has some other name,
We only call her Wild-pomegranate-flower,
Balaustion; since, where'er the red bloom burns
I' the dull dark verdure of the bounteous tree,
Dethroning, in the Rosy Isle, the rose,
You shall find food, drink, odor, all at once;
Cool leaves to bind about an aching brow,
And, never much away, the nightingale."

Balaustion, the daughter of a Rhodian father and an Athenian mother, is an enthusiast in her love for Athens, and a worshipping admirer of Euripides, whose poetry, as we have seen, she knows by heart. When Nicias has made his disastrous campaign against the Syracusans, and the allies of Athens are deserting her, the Rhodians also go over to Sparta; but Balaustion, she tells us,

"Never disloyal to the life and light
Of the whole world worth calling world at all," beseeches her countrymen not to desert the Athenians, and so far prevails as to induce some of her kinsmen to fly from Rhodes to Kaunos, where they take ship for Athens. A storm drives them from their course far to the westward, and, when the storm is over, they find hanging on their quarter a Locrian pirate. Pulling hard, they make a port which turns out to be the island port of Syracuse.

"Even Ortugia's self—oh, luckless we!
For here was Sicily and Syracuse:
We ran upon the lion from the wolf."

A Syracusan galley boards them, and orders them out of the harbor, the commander having heard the girl singing—

"That song of ours which saved at Salamis," and suspecting from the word of Æschylus that the ship's company were for Athens, and against the League. The Rhodians turn to go:

". . . . And we were just about
To turn and face the foe, as some tired bird
Barbarians pelt at, drive with shouts away
From shelter in what rocks, however rude,
She makes for, to escape the kindled eye,
Split beak, crook'd claw, o' the creature, cormorant,
Or ossifrage, that, hardly baffled, hangs
Afloat i' the foam, to take her if she turn.
So were we at destruction's very edge,
When those o' the galley, as they had discussed
A point, a question raised by somebody,
A matter mooted in a moment—'Wait!'
Cried they (and wait we did, you may be sure),
'That song was veritable Aischulos,
Familiar to the mouth of man and boy,
Old glory: how about Euripides?
The newer and not yet so famous bard,
He that was born upon the battle-day
While that song and the salpinx sounded him
Into the world, first sound, at Salamis—
Might you know any of his verses too?'
Now, some one of the gods inspired this speech."

Balaustion, as the Captain has already informed us, and as he now tells the Syracusans, is perfectly at home in Euripides, and offers to give them "the main of a whole play, from first to last"—even the play of Alcestis, which not only is excellent for "its beauty and the way it makes you weep," but also has much honor for Syracuse's own god, Hercules—or, rather, Heracles, for in spelling his Greek names Mr. Browning forsakes English, except in the case of Syracuse. The Syracusans make holiday on hearing this announcement, and Balaustion, being set upon the steps of the Temple of Hercules, paraphrases the tragedy, to the great joy of all her auditors, for—

". . . . Greeks are Greeks, and hearts are hearts, And poetry is power"— except, indeed, one auditor—

". . . . A brisk little somebody,
Critic and whippersnapper, in a rage
To set things right—"

whom, however, as the public is satisfied, and as Balaustion does not care for him, nobody need mind much in the general joy.

Balaustion soon disappears from the scene, and is married at Athens to a youth whom her talents have charmed, or, rather, she soon becomes Mr. Browning, if, indeed, she ever was anything else; and the play is related according to the plan that we have described, the text of Euripides being in many passages closely followed, and in many cases the translation being a free paraphrase, with a large infusion of the modern poet. The resultant poem is not to our mind a pleasing one—not so pleasing as many of the similar poems which, in the skilful, and acute, and sometimes profound writings of its distinguished author, so well answer the end of engaging us in an elaborate analysis of mental processes, and so imperfectly answer the end of delighting us. It is less pleasing than they, because in it Mr. Browning appears to us as violating what we may call the sacredness that should hedge about a great poem. He might better have been subtle and profound over creations of his own, as he so well and easily knows how to be, and have left alone, untouched by familiar and altering hands, the story which, as Euripides told it, has now for two thousand years and more been among the treasures of mankind. Still he has a plea in justification, which he thus makes:

". . . . 'Tis the poet speaks:
But if I, too, should try and speak at times,
Leading your love to where my love, perchance,
Climbed earlier, found a nest before you knew—
Why, bear with the poor climber, for love's sake!
Look at Baccheion's beauty opposite,
The temple with the pillars at the porch!
See you not something beside masonry?
What if my words wind in and out the stone
As yonder ivy, the god's parasite?
Though they leap all the way the pillar leads,
Festoon about the marble, foot to frieze,
And serpentiningly enrich the roof,
Toy with some few bees and a bird or two—
What then? The column holds the cornice up!"

For the rest, we may remark, for the information of some of our readers, that the "Kaunian painter strong as Herakles," of whom Mr. Browning speaks as having painted the picture of Hercules wrestling with Death, the life of Alcestis being the prize, is Mr. F. Leighton. The demigod is in the act of forcing Death to his knees, and Death, who is not represented as a skeleton, but clothed with shrunken and livid flesh, glares balefully from beneath his hood at his victorious adversary.

ALEXANDER JAMES DALLAS.*

It is a sort of fashion in this country to speak of the history of the early part of this century—we might, perhaps, say of the first third of it—as wanting in picturesque and even in substantial interest. And we do not except from the years to which this summary judgment is meted out those of the War of 1812. The present generation concerns itself little with the doubtful successes on land of that conflict, and not much more with its brilliant achievements on the ocean, and not at all with its inglorious result—a peace haughtily vouchsafed to us by England, without a single wrong redressed which was the pretext of hostilities, and with a material curtailment of the ancient rights of our fishermen. That period is just at the awkward distance from us which has neither the personal interest of the events of our own days, nor the dignity and romance of times remote enough for the imagination to make their facts the materials for its enchantments. Probably the period of the Rebellion of Forty-five excited no particular emotion in the minds of the men of "Sixty Years Since," before Scott had thrown the witchery of his genius about it. Indeed, it was not a particularly interesting time—of dull men and of events without great results, relieved only by that madcap expedition. Our "Seventy Years Since"—which Scott should have made the second title of Waverley, as his story lay seventy years before its publication—was a much more pregnant time than that, and its interest much truer, as being the youthful season when the nation was passing from the gristle of colonial infancy into the bone and sinew of the full manhood of the present day.

* "Life and Writings of Alexander James Dallas. By his Son, George Mifflin Dallas." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1871.

The gentleman whose Life and Works come up in review before us to-day belonged entirely to that forming period of our national life. For near thirty years he was a prominent person before the public of his time, and well known by reputation to all its members. In common with more eminent contemporaries, the long night of forgetfulness had settled down over his name, and few persons under forty probably attached much, if any, idea to it when it was brought to their notice by this publication. It was, therefore, a natural and filial piety that prompted the late Mr. George M. Dallas and his daughter to furnish this memorial and to secure such share of remembrance for him as he can be shown to deserve. The Life is well-written, and in good taste. Nothing more is claimed for its subject than is fairly made out in his favor, and the circumstance that it is comprised within the modest limits of less than a hundred and fifty pages will procure for it many more readers than if it had been spread over four times as many. The biographer has set a good example to all his tribe in the moderation of his statements, and in knowing when he had said enough. The rest of the handsome volume is filled up with poetical writings of Mr. Dallas, and letters to and from political friends. We have not been able to give these addenda the attention which would justify an opinion about them; but it is always well done to collect fugitive writings of this kind, which often are of material use to the writer of the history of the period, and who might miss them in their state of dispersion. The volume has also the excellent virtue of a good index, the want of which in a biographical and historical work a writer in the last North American Review judiciously suggests should be made a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Mr. Dallas was descended from a good Scotch family, well connected in England, of which his son has the good taste to say very little, much less than is apt to be said in American biography, with less provocation to such vanities. By marriage he was nearly connected with the Byron family, his sister having—as we understand almost the only obscure sentence in the book—married the uncle of the poet and the father of his successor, the late lord. Mr. Robert Dallas, who had the good taste to discern the merit of "Childe Harold," and who was the immediate cause of Byron's publishing it instead of the "Hints from Horace," and to whom he made a present of the "Corsair," we take to have been Mr. Dallas's elder brother, though he says nothing of these circumstances. He was the author of some long-forgotten novels, and a valuable contributor to the biography of Lord Byron published after the poet's death. A good many of the earlier letters of Byron's in "Moore's Life," were written to him. Alexander Dallas was born in 1759, in Jamaica, whither his father had emigrated to practise his profession of medicine, but was brought home to England, in childhood, for education. At the school at Kensington, where he went, he had the distinction of being noticed for his proficiency and promise by two no less illustrious persons than Dr. Franklin and Dr. Johnson, the latter of whom made him a present of a set of the "Rambler." His father dying while he was yet a lad, leaving his estate much embarrassed, he was early obliged to provide for himself. Beginning to study law, he had to resort to a merchant's counting-room for immediate support. Finally, however, at twenty-one, provided, by way of outfit, with a wife of sixteen, and three thousand dollars, he came to America to seek his fortune, and established himself in Philadelphia. His life, though a successful, was not an eventful one. Supporting himself for two years as a clerk in the office of the commissioner for settling the accounts of the Quartermaster's and Commissary Departments—left in confusion at the peace of 1783—he was then admitted to the bar, where he soon acquired a respectable practice, which afterwards grew into a large one.

He was commendably industrious in whatever employments offered themselves to his hand. Amongst others, it seems he was at one time engaged in the superintendence of our ancient friend, the delight of our childhood, the Columbian Magazine, in whose pages we made our first (and only) acquaintance with extracts from the epic strains of Dr. Dwight and the patriotic prolusions of the lighter muse of Colonel Humphreys. A more permanent and more valuable fruit of his industry is to be found in the four volumes of "Reports of Cases in the Pennsylvania Courts before and after the Revolution," known to the profession as "Dallas's Reports," and, we believe, the pioneers of the long array of American Reports which, clothed in "congenial calf," look down from the shelves of law libraries. At the constitution of the State government of Pennsylvania, Mr. Dallas was appointed Secretary of the Commonwealth, which office he held for nearly ten years. During this period he accompanied Governor Mifflin, as his aide-de-camp, on the armed expedition for the suppression of the Whiskey Insurrection, of which his letters here given contain a lively and picturesque description—quite the best that we remember to have seen. During these early years of his career he took an active part in the establishment of the theatre in Philadelphia, in the face of a strong opposition, almost as powerful as that which arrested and held to bail the actors in a "Moral Lecture," entitled the "School for Scandal," in Boston a few years later. He had had the good fortune to see Garrick in the last years of his histrionic life, and was to the end of his own life a devoted lover of the drama, resorting habitually to the playhouse for relaxation after serious work.

Mr. Dallas came forward in life at the time when the passions of men were still running high after the storms of the Revolution, and it was a doubtful problem on what rock they might wreck the newly-launched nation. The impulse which our struggle and our success had given to revolutionary ideas in Europe reacted on America, and helped to heighten and deepen the excitement of men's minds. When this effervescence crystallized into the shapes of the Federal and Democratic parties, Mr. Dallas gravitated to the latter. During the administration of Washington, and especially during its second term, he was one of the cabal consisting of Fréneau, Bache, Callender, Duane, McKean, Gallatin, and others who carried on the bitterest and most malignant warfare against the President and his measures. Washington was known in their meetings only as Montezuma, and the attacks on the character of Mr. Lincoln at the beginning of his administration were not more diabolically virulent than those aimed at Washington in the papers inspired by this clique. He himself characterized them only too mildly in calling them "outrages on common decency." He was accused—among other things, of which assassination was one—of want of military capacity and personal courage, charged with imbecility of character and pecuniary dishonesty, and of wearing "the mask of patriotism to conceal the foulest designs against the liberties of the people!" These men, being able as well as unscrupulous, helped very materially in the downfall of the Federal party, assisted, indeed, by its own divisions and jealousies at the close of the administration of John Adams, and they brought on the country the accession of Jefferson. From that event dates the dynasty of slavery disguised as Democracy, and the succession of misfortunes and disgraces that attended its reign, and which at last could be broken up only by the bloodiest civil war of modern times.

Mr. Dallas received from Mr. Jefferson the lucrative office of District Attorney for Pennsylvania, which was particularly adapted to his wishes, as it was consistent with the practice of his profession, in which he had taken a high rank. He was not ambitious of political promotion, and seriously reluctant to undertake the office of Secretary of the Treasury in 1814, a time when the finances of the country were in an almost hopeless state of entanglement, in consequence of the war of 1812, and the mischievous policy which preceded and led to it. In this post he did good service in regulating the treasury, providing a tariff for revenue, and a national bank as the agent for its collection, custody, and distribution. Having accomplished this work he resigned his office, and returned to the practice of his profession, the profits of which, previously to his going into the Cabinet, amounted to the great sum, for those days, of $20,000 a year, equivalent, probably, to at least three times that amount now. We presume, however, that a good proportion of this income was derived from his fees as District Attorney. He recovered his practice at once, but did not live long to follow it, as he was taken suddenly ill while arguing a case at Trenton, and died almost immediately on reaching his house in Philadelphia, January 16, 1817. Mr. Dallas is described as a man of eminently good looks, engaging manners, and agreeable conversation, domestic in his habits, and of a cheerful and hospitable temper. Time had probably softened the strength of the disapprobation of his earlier political course felt by the eminent Federalists who formed so distinguished a portion of Philadelphia society, though it was never entirely obliterated. But, on the morrow of his death, the editor of a leading Federal paper, we presume Mr. Robert Walsh, bore this testimony to his character while repeating his own disapprobation of Mr. Dallas's public conduct: "As a husband, a parent, and a friend, he was confessedly most amiable and exemplary. But it was by the sweet amenity of his disposition, his open hospitality, and the general courtesy of his deportment that he conciliated, even in the worst times of party contention, so large a portion of the community, that his death has now covered as with a pall the spirits of the city." His son judged wisely in rounding his narrative of Mr Dallas's life with these words of a political opponent, so well calculated to leave a kindly impression of his character on the reader's mind. The book well merits a place in public libraries and the collections of individuals who are curious in American history and biography.

PATTERSON'S "MAGYARS."*

THERE are few countries in the world abounding in more varied and attractive features, both in geographical and ethnological respects, than Hungary; and few have been made subjects of more exhaustive study by English travellers than that realm which, in the wider sense of its name, includes Transylvania, Croatia, Slavonia, and the Military Frontier-land. The three best English works on the subject are Paget's "Hungary and Transylvania," which embraces almost the entire geographical ground, and presents a faithful picture of Hungarian life in the interesting period of national reawakening which preceded the struggle of 1848–1849; Boner's "Transylvania," which very fully describes that south-eastern division of the domain of "the Crown of St. Stephen," by far the most picturesque of all its constituent parts; and the book before us, which is not a description of the checkered country in its entirety or of its main geographical division—Hungary proper—and of the polyglot multitude of people inhabiting it, but a special study on its central nationality—the Magyars—its central regions, which that nationality chiefly occupies, and the institutions introduced, gradually developed, often fought for, and lately revindicated by that nationality. Mr. Patterson has, it is true, no little to say about the Slavic populations of the country—Slovacks in the northwest, Ruthenians in the northeast, Serbs and Croats along the southern border; about its more sporadic inhabitants, such as Germans, Jews, Armenians, and Gypsies; and a great deal about Transylvania and its Saxons and Wallachs, or Roumans; but he speaks of all these only in their necessary connections with his main topic, the Magyars. Thus the character of the Slovack or Ruthenian is but incidentally touched upon; that of their languages entirely ignored; and the romantic valleys, peaks, forests, and mountain lakes of the Carpathian regions they occupy—the themes of many another traveller—left wholly undescribed; while everything peculiarly Magyar is dwelt upon at full length and—let us add—with profound knowledge, the fruit of repeated and protracted sojourns in the country, of a perfect familiarity with the Magyar language, and of conscientious research and enquiry.

In spite of the comparative narrowness of the subject, and in spite of the mass of foreign terms and phrases—especially Magyar—with which his descriptions are overloaded, Mr. Patterson's book will be found highly interesting from beginning to end, though the general reader, as the author himself remarks, "may perhaps complain of having so much politics forced upon him"—a complaint thus correctly met: "But a book on Hungary which contained no political discussions would be like a critique on the play of Hamlet which took no notice of the madness of its hero." There is some irony in this, such as may not entirely please the Hungarian readers of the work—and it has found many—but Mr. Patterson is far from insinuating that, because the Magyar mind is too exclusively absorbed with politics, Magyar politics is something like the dreams and the talk of a madman. This would be an assertion such as not even Katkoff, in the Moscow News, or Rieger, in a meeting of Czech Panslavists, would venture to assert in our day. Nor does he, on the other hand, enter too much into details concerning political affairs and men; for it is not so much the questions themselves as the way in which the Maygars in general are inclined to look at them, and to deal with them, that he is bent on illustrating. The main points of the political situation, however, he to makes quite clear, beginning with an introductory statement, which we will endeavor to condense.

Austro-Hungary, as constituted in 1867, consists of two closely allied and equally sovereign monarchies, of which one is the Kingdom of Hungary, and the other the Empire of Austria or Cisleithania (from the Leitha, a small frontier stream). In wealth, population, and civilization, the latter or western half is decidedly superior. It is, however, both geographically and nationally less compact, stretching, as it does, from the shores of the Lake of Constance to the frontiers of Bessarabia, and being inhabited by populations differing more widely in degrees of civilization than those of the eastern half, and bound together by fewer ties of material and ideal interests. The Hungarian division alone has a common history reaching back for several centuries. Besides, the centre of gravity of the Magyars, the dominant nationality in the Hungarian kingdom, falls within the bounds of the united empire, whereas that of the Germans, the dominant nationality in Cisleithania, falls without those bounds. The lesser compactness of the Cisleithan half is reflected in the composition of its sovereign legislature, the Reichsrath. The main branch of that assembly is composed of the representatives of the several provinces, or "crown-lands"—kingdoms, duchies, marquisates, etc.—elected by their respective diets. The diet of the Kingdom of Bohemia sends fifty-four deputies; that of the Marquisate of Moravia, twenty-two; that of the Archduchy of Lower Austria, eighteen; that of Upper Austria, ten; and so on to the smallest crown-land. In the eastern half there is no such complicated arrangement. The Hungarian diet is at once Reichsrath and provincial assembly for the whole of Hungary and Transylvania; the only portion of the Hungarian realm endowed with a separate legislature and internal autonomy being the small allied kingdom of Croatia and Slavonia. The two sovereign parliaments, viz., the Austrian Reichsrath and the Hungarian Diet, exercise their control over common government by means of "Delegations." At every annual session each parliament selects an equal number of its members to form a delegation, which has the power of granting or refusing the supplies demanded by the common ministry—that is, for the army and the diplomatic service. The two delegations sit alternately in Vienna and Pesth, deliberating separately, communicating through written messages, and meeting together only in case of protracted disagreement between their respective majorities, and only in order to vote by joint ballot, without debate. Considering everything, it is evident that the balance of advantages in the union of the two monarchies is slightly in favor of Hungary, and that its chances of escaping dismemberment are greater than those of Cisleithania.

Of the manifold nationalities which inhabit Hungary—about fifteen millions in all, if we take that geographical name in its widest sense—the Magyars are the leading, not merely on account of their numbers, they alone numbering about six millions, while no other singly reaches half that number, except we reckon the various Slavic populations collectively—but because they occupy the central, the most fertile, and most accessible portions of the country; because they include the bulk of the educated and wealthy classes, having constantly attracted and absorbed the ablest and most ambitious of their neighbors; and chiefly because they have formed the state, ruled it, kept it together, and made its history, from the times of Arpád, who invaded it ten centuries ago, to those of Kossuth, Deák, and Andrássy. "The only non-Aryan nation that has been subjected to the discipline of Latin Christianity, and, in a modified form, to that of the feudal system," they present a mixture of national features partly Oriental and partly European, which, in their ensemble, have rarely failed to please the foreign observer, but some of which have frequently enough exposed the hospitable masters of "Felix....Hungaria, cui dona data sunt varia," to more or less deserved censure and ridicule. In analyzing and depicting these various traits—occasionally after Hungarian humorists—Mr. Patterson is very successful, and most so when describing the Magyar peasant, as well as some peculiarly Magyar characters, now gradually vanishing from the scene, such as the old "county assessor" or country squire—formerly an important political personage—or the rural dandy and outlaw. In these descriptions he is often very amusing, but even in the chapters devoted to such serious, apparently dry topics as the "Great Hungarian Plain," the "Reforms of 1848 and 1866," "The Nationalities," "Hungarian Protestantism," or "The Hungarian Language," he never ceases entirely to be entertaining. He often intersperses his own delineations with quotations from Magyar writers. He thus completes his picture of the great central plain by translating in prose Petöfi's poem, entitled "Little Cumania"—a part of that plain—from which we extract the following:

"It is burning midsummer; the sun climbs upward; his beams, like flame-rain, flood the wilderness with a scorching deluge. . . . . The wilderness is around me, a wide, long wilderness; I, too, see far away, even thither where the down-bending sky melts together with the earth.

"Across rich meadows passes the road; there the herd repose; the heat is sultry, nor do they now feed from the fat pasture. By the side of the hurdle-fence slumbers the herdsman on his outstretched mantle; his dogs, too, are lazy, nor even look after the traveller.

"Here, on the level ground, creeps along a water-course, nor does a wave of it move; only then does it splash when, perchance, some fishing-bird strikes it with its wing. Its channel is of fair sand; one can look right down to its yellow bed, on the parti-colored troop of sluggish leeches and nimble insects.

"Beside its brim, among the dark-green rushes, here and there a crane extends its neck; among them the mother of the storklings strikes her long beak into the water, gives a great gulp, and then raises her head and gazes daintily around; on the banks of the stream unnumbered peewits utter wailing cries.

"There stands sadly a great ágas; once it might have been a well-crane; beside it is the trough, but broken down and overgrown with moss. As it were in a trance, this well-crane gazes on the distant mirage; I know not why it should gaze thereon; to be sure it hath seen the like often enough already.

* "The Magyars: their Country and Institutions. By Arthur J. Patterson, Foreign Member of the Kisfaludy Society. With Maps." Two volumes. London: Smith, Elder & Co. (New York: Scribner, Welford & Co.) 1869.

"There is the mirage on the edge of the horizon; failing aught else it raises on high a worn-out, old wayside inn, and holds it above the earth. Meanwhile, the pasture has become scantier, at last all trace of it vanishes; yellow sandhills rise, which the whirlwind builds up and throws down.

"At long distances single farmhouses appear, with ricks and stacks; above them caws the crow, here and there a surly watch-dog makes his rounds. A multitude of ploughed fields stretch irregularly around; above them the blessed wheat droops, the heavy grain draws down the ears.

"Amidst the green wheat open red poppies and blue cornflowers, with here and there a wild-rose, like some bleeding star. Evening draws nigh, the white clouds grow golden: beautiful clouds! every one of them moves above us like a fairy tale.

"At last behold the town—in its midst the church with its great solemn tower; at the end of the street stand in a confused group the windmills with their broad vanes. How I love to stand before the windmills! I watch their vanes as they turn unceasingly their somersaults."

Books for Girls. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," and others.—Little Sunshine's Holiday: A Picture from Life. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1871.)—Remembering the two books which Mrs. Craik has already translated from the French for the benefit of young girls, we should not have taken the responsibility of promising the special readers for whom her new series is undertaken any very great amusement from her selections. Her own work is rather better than Madame De Witt's, having the sort of human interest which always attaches to what she does. But pride, even when it is what Mrs. Craik calls her own "solemn and thankful pride" in the fact that she has "written books for twenty-four years" and had them translated into many languages, is always pretty sure to go before a fall of some kind—and we can but think that although she "has a little girl of her own," she has fallen into an error concerning her ability to amuse children. As she herself says somewhat unfortunately in her prefatory address, that "requires first that utmost art, ars celare artem," and even at her best Mrs. Craik was never an artist, but only a woman who, very much in love with love, wrote not unpleasantly about it. "Little Sunshine's Holiday" grown-up people may take some pleasure in, smiling now with and at the writer of it; but the little folks, so far as our experience goes, find it decidedly dull. Sunny's own goodness it is possible to put up with, but her mamma's ponderous pride and gratitude over it are something very funny. One dislikes to be too ill-naturedly amused by it, either, since it is rather hard to say whether it is Sunny or Sunny's mamma—whom the reader is evidently expected to identify with Mrs. Craik herself—who is really the most pleasantly childish. Goodness of heart is a quality which is likely to remain with her even if she steadily persists in writing didactic love stories for twenty-five years to come. And her pride in having a "little girl" and a "papa" for her, all to herself, is a by no means disagreeable foible. Still, one could wish her a little more reticent over her domestic bliss, and a trifle more modest about her abilities to do all sorts of what one might call domestic literary business. Her opening address to mothers and daughters is really the most objectionable part of her book—which, though we must consider it a failure as far as it is intended for children, is not bad as an unconscious study of the effects which attaining to wifehood and maternity after a lifetime spent in pondering over their possible blessedness, may produce in a woman too essentially womanly and good-hearted to be carried away by the prevailing manias of her sex.

Shoemakers' Village. By Henry Holbeach. (New York: Geo. Routledge & Sons. 1871.)—This is a very clever and interesting, but not particularly suggestive study of character and manners in an English village. The author, who, on the title-page of another of his works, describes himself as a "student of life and philosophy," gives us, in the present story, some unique and altogether pleasant results of his studies in the first direction, but has added hardly enough "philosophy" to enable us to see that he had in view any other end than that of amusing his readers and himself by the exercise of his unmistakable artistic talent. But to amuse without offending is a result so seldom attained by "students of life" that Mr. Holbeach very fairly deserves to be congratulated on having so successfully achieved it. His book is almost plotless, and yet is a story; his characters are very vividly painted, very closely analyzed, and yet develop into nothing which is not very fully implied in almost their first presentation to the reader; there is hardly enough incident in the whole volume to furnish a chapter of the ordinary sensation novel, and the dénouement is sudden, unexpected, and, we should add, disagreeable, if the enjoyment we derived from the work had not been so entirely emotionless. Why Mr. Holbeach should cold-bloodedly choose to drown in a mud-puddle so innocent, charming, and lifelike a creature as Cherry White, and, in doing so, deprive his work of any semblance of a moral or a purpose, is perhaps more surprising than actively displeasing. With plenty of artistic ability, he seems to be really more of a student than an artist, and to be lacking in the instinct of completeness. But his sketches, even when they present low and sordid natures, but particularly when they describe his "child-woman," Cherry, show either very close observation or unusual delicacy of intuition, and make his plotless, motiveless story very well worth reading.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Agassiz (Elizabeth C. and Alex.), Seaside Studies in Natural History, 2d ed.	(J. R Osgood & Co.)
Aldornere: a Pennsylvanian Idyll	(John Penington & Son)
Ames (Mrs. M. C.), Eirene: a Woman's Right, swd	(G. P. Putnam & Sons)	$0 75
Andersen (H. C.), Pictures of Travel	(Hurd & Houghton)	1 75
Appletons' Hand-Book of American Travel, Western Tour	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Black (W.), A Daughter of Heth, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	50
Bryant (W. C.), Homer's Odyssey, translated, Vol. I.	(J. R. Osgood & Co.)	5 00
Bulwer-Lytton (Sir E.), King Arthur: a Poem	(Harper & Bros.)
Combe (Dr. A.), The Management of Infancy	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Dickens (C.), Martin Chuzzlewit	" "	75
Elder (Dr. W.), Questions of the Day, Economic and Social	(H. C. Baird)	3 00
Essex Institute Historical Collections, Vol. XI., Part 1, swd	(Salem)
Fables of Pilpay	(Hurd & Houghton)	1 50
Grün (A.), The Last Knight	" "	2 50
Hamilton (Dr. J. H.), Parker's Exercises in English Composition	(Oakley, Mason & Co.)	1 00

THE GREAT CENTENNIAL EDITION OF SCOTT'S NOVELS.

Just Published by

PORTER & COATES

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.

By SIR WALTER SCOTT, Bart.

Illustrated with Fine Steel-plate Engravings.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

A NEW "CENTENNIAL MEMORIAL" Edition, prepared with great care, printed on fine paper, illustrated with more than one hundred illustrations, on steel and wood, by the most celebrated English and Scottish artists, bound in a new and appropriate style of fine cloth, with emblematic stamps, and fac-simile of the celebrated author's autograph in gold on the side. Complete with all the author's latest introductions, notes, and revisions. In 23 vols. crown 8vo.

All the merits to be desired in a good copy of "Waverley Novels" we claim to be obtained in the PORTER & COATES Edition. For convenience of size, beauty of paper, typography, legibility of type, elegance of illustrations, copiousness of notes, neatness and compactness of appearance, in short, for completeness and desirability in every respect, no edition in the market surpasses it.

We therefore advise every reader, every head of the family—1st. To buy a set of "Waverley Novels. 2d. To get a thoroughly good edition, so that you need never have to purchase another. 3d. To examine "Porter & Coates's Centennial" edition, and buy it in preference to any other.

The Centennial edition is published in 23 vols. crown 8vo, fine cloth, emblematically and neatly stamped in gold. Price $35. The same in half-calf, gilt and marbled edges, $70.

PORTER & COATES, Publishers,

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

BY JOHN FORSTER.

Fifth English Edition. Illustrated with Portraits and numerous Engravings on Wood.

2 vols. small 8vo, cloth, $7 50.

Imported in quantities and for sale by

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

BOSTON.

THE PROPRIETORS of an influential weekly publication in New York will pay a good salary for either a part or the whole of the services of an experienced writer on political economy and finance.

Address, for two weeks, "FINANCE," care Publisher of THE NATION.

WANTED—A Teacher of Mathematics and Natural Science in the Willoughby Collegiate Institute, Willoughby, O. Apply at once, in person if if possible, to L. O. LEE, Principal.

Will be Published on the 16th.

CIRCULATION, 130,000 copies.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR OCTOBER, 1871.

CONTENTS:

DOLORES.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—"The Fishers in their Boats, mending their Nets with murmurous Song and Noise." "'Steady, thou freshening Breeze,' her dark Eyes say." "Ye may not bring her from that rocky Coast, the stranded Ship."

NEW YORK CITY POST-OFFICE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Collecting Letters. The old Post-Office at 29 William Street. Old Post-Office in Garden Street. Colonel Dodd. Ruins of Merchants' Exchange, Wall Street. The Rotunda, City Hall Park. New York Post Office in the Dutch Church. The Rat-ification. Interior of the Post Office in the Dutch Church. The Ladies' Window. Postmaster's Office. Delivering Letters.

THE YALE COLLEGE EXPEDITION OF 1870.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—First Trip: near the Forks of the Platte. "Bad Lands" (Mauvaises Terres), on Black Fork. March over the "Bad Lands." Indian Graves. Second Trip: Wyoming, Nebraska, and Colorado. Snakes. The petrified Turtle. A Prairie Fire. Third Trip: Wyoming, Utah, and Colorado. A great Scare.

REINDEER, DOGS, AND SNOW-SHOES.—Siberian Travel and Exploration. (Concluded.)
ILLUSTRATIONS.—View in Markova. Korak Yourt. Korak Beau. Korak Belle. Samulka in Summer Costume. Capturing the Walrus. The Wade beached by the Ice. Dismantling the Wreck. Headquarters at Markova, Northeastern Siberia. Ivan Ermechkoff. Down the Anadyr. Oochostika.

BORDER REMINISCENCES. By Randolph B. Marcy, U.S.A.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—General Up-to-Snuff. "Would ye like fur to jine th' Army, Miss H——?" "Halt thar!" "No, yer don't!"

TEDDY'S TRIUMPH.

DOWN THE EASTERN SHORE. By Bayard Taylor.

HANNAH JANE. By Petroleum V. Nasby.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—"At her Old Home in Piketon, Parson Avery made us One." "When they all crowd around me, stately Dames and brilliant Belles." "She made herself most willingly a household Drudge and Slave." "I was her Altar, and her love the Sacrificial Flame."

THE AMERICAN BARON. By the Author of "The Dodge Club," etc.
Chapter XXX. A Desperate Plan.
Chapter XXXI. Discovered.
Chapter XXXII. Under Arrest.
Chapter XXXIII. The Demon Wife
ILLUSTRATIONS.—"He held his pistol close to the Head, and fired." "What did you come for?" "For her." Under Guard.

THE CONQUEST OF IRELAND.

POSTAGE STAMPS AND THEIR ORIGIN.
With ninety-nine Illustrations.

FAINT HEART.

A BABY BROOK.

BY-GONE CELEBRITIES OF BOND STREET, London. By R. H. Horne.

ANNE FURNESS. By the Author of "Mabel's Progress," etc.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.

EDITOR'S SCIENTIFIC RECORD.

EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

Each number of Harper's Magazine contains from fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter than a single Number of any other monthly periodical in the world.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

Magazine, One Copy for One Year.....$4 00
Weekly, One Copy for One Year..... 4 00
Bazar One Copy for One Year..... 4 00

Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, and Harper's Bazar, for one year, $10; or any two for $7.

NOW READY.

PARIS UNDER THE COMMUNE;
OR,
THE SEVENTY-THREE DAYS OF THE SECOND SIEGE.

With upwards of 100 Illustrations, Sketches taken on the spot, Portraits from the Original Photographs, and Beautiful Map of Paris, showing the Damaged and Burnt Localities,
Etc., etc., etc.

BY JOHN LEIGHTON, F.S.A.

Square crown 8vo, attractively bound in cloth extra, gilt top, $4.

To the law-abiding and English-speaking races, the great drama of the Commune must be intensely interesting—a drama not without its moral—and one that the French people believe, in their optimism, has been played on their soil for the benefit of the human race. Be it so! And maythe scenes enacted upon the theatre of Paris prove of benefit to all—for the dénouement has been terrible enough, and the whole most costly. The illustrations in the work include views of all prominent localities, Palaces and Monuments, Portraits of Eminent Communists, Generals, and Statesmen; Sketches on the spot of contemporaneous events, etc., etc., rendering it of great interest to the general reader, as well as of Permanent Historical value.

Early orders solicited from the Trade.

Copies sent by mail to any address on the receipt of the price.

SCRIBNER, WELFORD & CO.,
654 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, BAZAR,

$4 PER YEAR EACH.

$10 a Year for the Three.

$7 for any Two.

An Extra Copy of either gratis for every five Subscribers at $4 each in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE sent by mail on receipt of six cents in postage stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

THE "NATION" ABROAD.

Subscriptions and Advertisements for the Nation are received in Europe by the following

AGENTS:

GREAT BRITAIN AND THE COLONIES: George Street, 30 Cornhill, E.C., London.

FRANCE: Bowles Brothers & Co., 12 Rue de la Paix, Paris.

SWITZERLAND: Vérésoff & Garrigues, Place Bel-Air, Geneva.

ITALY: Furse Brothers & Co., 9 Piazza di Spagna, Rome.

BOOK-BUYERS.

Send for Catalogue of INTERESTING, USEFUL, and SCARCE BOOKS added to the Stock in hand of

FRANCIS EMMINS,
80 Nassau Street, New York.

YALE AND HARVARD USE
WHITNEY'S GERMAN COURSE,
OTTO'S FRENCH COURSE.

HOLT & WILLIAMS,
PUBLISHERS,
No. 25 Bond Street, New York.

The Publishers issue a very large assortment of works in the same department.

☞ A Descriptive Catalogue will be sent gratis to any one referring to this advertisement.

FRANCE AND HEREDITARY MONARCHY.

BY HON. JOHN BIGELOW.

8vo, muslin, price $1 25.

CONTENTS:

CHAPTER I.

The Secondary French Revolution of 1871—Why the Thiers Dynasty is Resisted.

CHAPTER II.

The Transmission of Executive Power by Inheritance a Failure in France.

CHAPTER III.

The Transmission of Executive Power by Inheritance in England—Is it a Success?

CHAPTER IV.

Choice of Sovereigns by Popular Election—Its Results in America.

CHAPTER V.

The Advantages of Popular over Hereditary Sovereignty in France.

Copies sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, by

CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO.,
654 Broadway, New York.

JUST ISSUED.

PRICED CATALOGUE OF RARE AND VALUABLE BOOKS

Relating to Shakespeare and the Drama, American History, Biography, Poetry, etc., for sale by

T. H. MORRELL (Agent),
78 Nassau Street, New York,
(Between Fulton and John Streets.)

☞ Catalogue sent free on application.

GAZZAM'S TREATISE
ON THE
BANKRUPT LAW.
SECOND EDITION JUST OUT.

For sale at all Law-Book Stores.

HENRY K. VAN SICLEN,
BIBLIOPOLE,
133 NASSAU STREET,
Catalogues sent on application.

Special attention given to orders by letter.

NOW READY.

New Edition of Mrs. Ames's Popular Story (at last complete),

EIRENE: "A WOMAN'S RIGHT."

A STORY OF NEW ENGLAND.

BY MRS. M. C. AMES.

8vo, paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1 25.

A part of this work was published in "Putnam's Magazine."

The New York "Independent" said of the early chapters: "Here is at last something that promises to be a genuine American novel, racy of the soil, and yet of such high universal interest as to claim adoption into the general literature of the English language." The "Evening Post" said that "the sketch of Busyville has never been exceeded as a description of life in a New England town."

ALSO READY for the readers of "Putnam's Magazine," the Supplement to the number for November, 1870, containing the concluding chapters of Eirene. 8vo, paper, 35 cents.

I.

A HISTORY OF ENGLAND, from the Earliest Period to A.D. 1871. With special reference to the Progress of the People in Civilization, Literature, and the Arts. By B. J. Lossing. Small 8vo With three Maps. Cloth extra, $2 50; half-calf, $4 50; School edition, $2 25. Specimen copies of this edition sent to teachers for examination on receipt of half the advertised price.

This comprehensive volume is intended for popular use and the family library, as well as for students. It claims to be more complete in its records of political events in British history than any other volume of its size—while it aims particularly to trace the progress of society in all that relates to Domestic Life, to Practical Improvements, and to Literature, Science, and Art.

II.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF JOHN P. Kennedy, author of "Swallow Barn," etc., late Secretary of the Navy, etc. Edited by H. T. Tuckerman. In 1 vol. 12mo, $2.

III.

STIMULANTS AND NARCOTICS, Medically, Philosophically, and Morally Considered. By George M. Beard, M.D. 12mo, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cts.

IV.

THOMAS CAMPBELL'S POETICAL WORKS. First complete edition, with a copious Life of Campbell (100 pages). By Epes Sargent. With Portrait. 12mo, pp. 479, cloth extra, $2; extra gilt edges, $2 50; half-calf, $4; being the first volume of the new Knickerbocker Edition of Standard Poets.

NEW EDITION OF

I.

TILL THE DOCTOR COMES, AND HOW TO Help Him. By George H. Pope, M.D. Revised, with Additions, by a New York Physician. A Popular Guide in all cases of Accident and Sudden Illness. 12mo, paper, 30 cents; cloth, 60 cents.

"A most valuable little manual."
"A perfect gem."
"Should have a place in every household."

II.

THE LIFE OF MADAME DE STAEL. By Amely Bölte. Translated from the German. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

"Worthy a place in every library, and will be generally read."—Auburn Advertiser.

"A valuable contribution to literature."—Cincinnati Chronicle.

III.

CORTES AND THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO. By Arthur Helps, author of "Spanish Conquests in America," "Friends in Council," etc. Two vols. in one, 12mo, $2; half-calf, $4.

"One of the most romantic and fascinating pages in history."—Toledo Index.

For sale by all Booksellers, and sent prepaid on receipt of price, by

G. P. PUTNAM & SONS,

Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL. Pratt's Astral Oil is used in all families where a perfectly safe and reliable article is appreciated. The "American Agriculturist" says: "We would not use any other oil, if it cost $5 per gall."

LATEST PUBLICATIONS

OF

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

BOSTON.

LECTURES ON THE STUDY AND PRACtice of the Law. Delivered in the Law School of Harvard University. By Emory Washburn, LL.D. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.

TREATISE ON THE CONSTITUTIONAL Limitations which rest upon the Legislative Power of the States of the American Union. By Thomas M. Cooley, one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of Michigan. With considerable Additions, giving the Results of Recent Cases. Second Edition. 8vo, sheep, $7 50.

UNITED STATES DIGEST of the Decisions of the Courts of Common Law and Admiralty in the United States. Vol. XXVIII. Royal 8vo, $6 50.

UNITED STATES STATUTES AT LARGE. Vol. XVI. Comprising the Statutes passed by the Forty-first Congress. Royal 8vo, $6 50.

REDFIELD AND BIGELOW'S LEADING and Select American Cases in the Law of Bills of Exchange, Promissory Notes, and Checks; arranged according to subjects. With Notes and References. By Isaac F. Redfield and M. M. Bigelow. 8vo, $7 50.

DE GEX, MACNAGHTEN, AND GORDON'S Reports. Vol. I. 8vo, $5.

MACNAGHTEN AND GORDON'S REports. 3 vols. 8vo, $15.

HOUSE OF LORDS CASES. 1846–65. 11 vols. 8vo, $65.

SPON'S DICTIONARY

OF

ENGINEERING,

CIVIL, MECHANICAL, MILITARY, AND NAVAL,

With Technical Terms, in French, German, Italian, and Spanish.

EDITED BY OLIVER BYRNE.

Now publishing, in numbers at 50 cents each.

Fifty-four numbers now ready.

Supplied in divisions of twelve parts each, in cloth binding, at $5 each.

ALSO,

Two volumes now completed, containing parts 1 to 48, in fine half-calf, at $10 per volume.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,

23 Murray Street and 27 Warren Street.

LONDON BOOKS.

PRICED CATALOGUE, No. 27,

OF

RARE,

STANDARD,

AND

VALUABLE ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS,

Now ready and will be sent free of charge to any address.

A fine lot of ENGRAVINGS just opened.

A. DENHAM & CO.,

IMPORTERS OF ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS,

17 MURRAY STREET

(Near Broadway), New York.

WOOLWORTH, AINSWORTH & CO.,

51, 53 & 55 JOHN STREET, NEW YORK.

111 STATE STREET, CHICAGO,

Have just Published,

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT:

Its Officers and their Duties.

BY RANSOM H. GILLET,

Solicitor and Register in the U. S. Treasury, and Solicitor for the United States in the Court of Claims.

12mo, cloth, 444 pp., $2.

"Its object is to enable the rising generation to understand the structure of our Government, what officers are employed in its practical operation, and their general duties. Such knowledge will be highly useful to all, and especially to the American citizen when giving direction to our public affairs."

For sale by all Booksellers, or mailed on receipt of price.

THE FOURTH THOUSAND.

DR. McCOSH'S LECTURES.

CHRISTIANITY AND POSITIVISM.

A Series of Lectures to the Times. By James McCosh, D.D., LL.D., President of Princeton College.

12mo, $1 75.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of the price. Published by

ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS,

530 Broadway, N. Y.

DR. McCOSH'S OTHER WORKS.

1. The Method of Divine Government, 8vo $2 50.
2. Typical Forms. 8vo, $2 50.
3. Intuitions of the Mind. 8vo, $3.
4. Defence of Fundamental Truth. $3.
5. Logic. $1 50.

CASSELL'S POPULAR EDUCATOR.

COMPLETE IN SIX VOLUMES.

PRICE, $15.

"We have gone over its pages with sentiments of real wonder. We know no work like it. It has occupied and filled up a field of education vast and most important to the community."—Dublin University Magazine.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,

596 Broadway, New York.

In one vol. 16mo, limp cloth, $1.

GILMAN'S FIRST STEPS IN ENGLISH LITERATURE.

"Mr. Gilman has prepared a valuable work. I do not know where an equal amount of valuable literary information combined with judicious criticism can be found in so brief a space."—From Homer B. Sprague, Principal of Adelphi Academy, Brooklyn, N. Y.

HURD & HOUGHTON, New York.

THE RIVERSIDE PRESS, Cambridge.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1871.

The Week.

THE history of the municipal imbroglio here during the week has been highly interesting. When we last went to press, Connolly, the Comptroller, finding from Hall's demand that he should resign that the other confederates were preparing to throw him overboard, refused to be made a scapegoat, or, in the lofty language of the City Hall, "a vicarious sacrifice"; and, reminding the Mayor that all that he had done he (the Mayor) had sanctioned, he announced his determination to stay where he was, Hall at the same time acknowledging that he had no power to remove him. Connolly then consulted his old friend and patron, Mr. Havemeyer, as to what he should do next, and this gentleman recommended him, while holding on to the office to avoid the "vicarious sacrifice" aforesaid, to appoint a deputy possessing the public confidence, and not suspected of complicity with the Ring, and give him possession of the office and papers. In this way he would, if guilty of malfeasance, make the best atonement in his power to the outraged community; if not guilty, he would best help to satisfy the public mind, or bring the real offenders to justice. This advice Connolly took, a provision in the Ring charter—which they inserted to enable Connolly to go to Europe this summer—enabling him not only to appoint a deputy for a fixed period, but to clothe him with all his own powers. Mr. A. H. Green, who was for many years Comptroller of the Central Park in its best days, and in whom the public has full confidence, was then installed as deputy until February next, one month after the meeting of the Legislature, and the office and its contents handed over to him. He had it strongly guarded through Sunday and Sunday night, to prevent Satan repeating his attempt on the vouchers; and all is now ready for a thorough exposure, supposing that there has, during the last fortnight, been no foul play with the books and papers.

When Hall, the Mayor, received information of Connolly's move, he must have been a good deal troubled in mind, as it showed that the "vicarious sacrifice" plan had totally miscarried. A worse thing than Connolly's staying in the office had happened. Connolly himself would probably not turn State's evidence, and might, perhaps, be trusted not to supply documentary proofs of Hall's complicity in his misdeeds. Had he transferred the office to another tool of the Ring, too, all might still be well; but the letting in of an outsider, an honest man, and one selected by the reformers who had been so long thundering at the gates, had in it the seeds of a tremendous disaster, and had to be promptly met. Accordingly, he invented the theory that the appointment of a deputy, with full powers, was equivalent to a resignation, or a "relinquishment of his office," and he, accordingly, to make assurance doubly sure, removed him, which the unhappy man had, three or four days previously, declared he had no power to do. The expedient was clearly desperate, but so was the case. In his place he put General McClellan, who has no special fitness for it. There has been a good deal of "engineering" in the Comptroller's office, but it has been neither civil nor military, and the General is not supposed to possess any special knowledge of accounts and of law, which is what the person who is to hold the office during the next five months needs above all things; but he has, as might have been expected, refused.

There have been two great defalcations—or rather two great defalcations have come to light—during the week in the Federal service, one that of Major Hodges, a Washington paymaster, to the amount of half a million dollars, and the other that of John W. Norton, the assistant-postmaster in this city. Hodges's shortcomings began six or seven years go, and were due to the old cause—unsuccessful stock speculations—and they have at last been revealed by his own confession—a very painful story. There is now an acrimonious controversy going on between the Paymaster's Department and the Treasury, as to which is to blame for his not having been found out sooner, each being naturally anxious to shift the responsibility on to the other. It appears that the United States Treasurer, General Spinner, in 1866, wrote a letter to the Paymaster-General, declaring if each paymaster were instructed to report to the Treasury the balance remaining to his credit at the end of each week, designating the place of such deposit, "the present system" (by which paymasters kept their accounts with the Treasury) "might be made to work safely." The Paymaster-General accordingly did issue a circular giving the required instructions, and the paymasters did make their reports to the Treasury accordingly. It now turns out, however, that the Treasury officials have not been in the habit of examining the reports, or comparing them with the balances reported by the sub-treasurers or other depositaries. The Paymaster-General maintains that, had they done so, they would have discovered Hodges's defalcations long ago; the Treasury, on the other hand, declares that the comparison of the reports would have furnished no check, first, because the balance on deposit would always be less than the balance reported by the paymaster by the amount of his outstanding checks; and, secondly, because a dishonest paymaster would always make his report tally with the report of the depositary of his funds; and they add that it is taking a mean advantage of the Treasurer to cite now against him his letter of 1866. The case, however, appears to be tolerably plain. The Treasurer recommended, in 1866, as "safe" to the Paymaster-General a check on the paymasters which the Paymaster-General at once adopted, and the execution of which was, on its face, to be committed to the Treasury. The Treasurer, however, appears to have paid no attention to it, although of his own devising, on the ground that, even if he had used it, frauds might still be committed, which is an argument of greater or less force against the use of all checks whatever, and resembles strikingly that of the sentinel who, being caught sleeping at his post, defended himself by saying that even if he had been awake he could not have seen a thing. The duty of the Treasurer was to have tried his invention, and as soon as he had found out that he was mistaken as to its "safety," to have reported the fact to the Paymaster-General, and it was the duty of both Treasurer and Paymaster-General then to have gone to work and, between them, have devised some check or other which would have rendered it impossible for a paymaster to conceal such frauds as Hodges's for so many years. We observe that an attempt is made also to cast some of the blame on Andrew Johnson, Hodges's frauds having begun during his administration. The amount of wickedness for which that old reprobate is said to be responsible increases daily, and we wish he could be brought to justice. We should not be surprised to hear that he was the primary cause of Hall and Connolly.

The Norton defalcation in the Post Office is not so serious, though it is no trifle—one hundred and fifty thousand dollars or thereabouts, all of which, however, is likely to be made good, owing to the efforts of his bondsmen, among whom Horace Greeley figures, and his own surrender of his property. What has become of the money nobody knows, apparently not even he himself; it has probably, as is the way with money, vanished into the "ewigkeit." Hodges, being a military man, and liable to trial by court-martial, will undoubtedly be punished heavily for his crime, and is now in close confinement, and Norton, we venture to predict, will not, particularly as there will be no loss; and he is now riding about like any other citizen. Many a civil functionary of the Government has, during the last twenty years, misappropriated its funds, but we have yet to hear of one who was brought to justice for doing so. If anybody knows of such a case, we shall be glad if he will send us an account of it. In fact, the practice of the Government seems to be to treat the embezzlement of its money as the contraction of a debt, the non-payment of which involves the loss of the debtor's place, but nothing more. In 1859, the postmaster of this city embezzled two hundred thousand dollars, and went quietly to Havana till the affair blew over. On his return in 1867, he was entertained at dinner here by a large number of old friends and admirers, including the Chief-Justice of the Superior Court.

The World has discovered that a bad Federal official, in Washington, has been making free with the public money, and its condition since justifies the gravest apprehensions of its friends. Its heart is nearly broken. Every little while it bursts into uncontrollable fits of weeping, and despairs of the country. And Connolly, the Comptroller, it thinks, is a very indelicate person to stay in his office, for Judge Barnard has said in public, from the bench, that Connolly's office has been mismanaged. As for Mr. Tweed, and Mr. Sweeny, and Mr. Hall, it thinks "the present charter is badly constructed as an administrative machine." And this from a paper which might be the foremost representative of its party in this country.

There is no sign, as yet, that the fight in this State between the two wings of the Republican party is going to come to an end, and each side works industriously to befog the public mind, and we imagine with a good deal of success. The plain English of it all would seem to be that one committee has captured Mr. Greeley with his desire for office, and his perhaps stronger desire that the party should recognize his great services to it, and with him covers some most undoubted Tammany Republicanism and rascality. On the other side is the Tom Murphy crew, loaded down with Tom himself, and for a screen they have Grant, for whose renomination they are "working" hard. Behind these two city antagonists range themselves in the State at large the Fenton faction and the Conkling faction — the Fenton-Greeley men being anti-Grant, and the Conkling-Murphy men loudly for him. The countrymen are probably safe for Greeley, but the fight will be hard, and how to advise any one to take sides we confess we do not know. We do not know that the renomination of Grant is of vital importance; we do not know that Mr. Murphy's crew and Mr. Conkling are any worse than Mr. Greeley's crew of very badly mixed Republicans with Mr. Fenton behind them. One would far rather be even a Massachusetts Republican, even at this rather disgraceful crisis, than a New York one. There an honest man has an easy duty to his State, at all events, however impossible of performance he may find his duty to his party. Here to know what to do one finds practically impossible. Mr. Conkling, we see, that quiet man, "no brawler," did not carry the election for delegate in his own district, so what does he do but march off with his followers and organize another meeting, and we shall have him at Syracuse "contesting," and making row enough for half a dozen Donnybrooks.

We observe that the Cincinnati Commercial has been calling attention to the case of Mr. Tom Murphy, of this Custom-house, and says a number of unpleasant things of him which are true, and which we have already laid before our readers. The New York Tribune also returns to him, and adds something to our stock of knowledge of him. Since the war he has been in open and constant affiliation with the Ring in this city, and the effect, on the minds of decent people, of his appointment to the collectorship of the port, in place of a New York merchant, Mr. Moses Grinnell, was well expressed by Mr. William E. Dodge in his testimony before the Congressional Investigating Committee last winter. No man in this community stands higher than Mr. Dodge, and here is what he said:

"The fact that the Administration was represented here by such a venal, corrupt machine as the Custom-house has taken the heart out of all the German Republicans. I scarcely know an intelligent Republican who voted at the last election in New York. The whole conduct of things has been on that basis, and just as long as all offices under the Government are political gifts, just so long we shall get worse and worse, and go to the dogs. The appointment of Mr. Murphy was considered extraordinary. I know nothing against him, except that he is a man without any experience, and actually without any position here; probably the last man that would have been thought of by any merchant. Knowing that he knew nothing about it, and was kept there for political purposes, the merchants have kept away, and felt as if it would hurt their self-respect to meddle with the matter."

The President does not need the report or advice of any Civil Service Commission to do a little civil-service reform on his own account. He ought to begin with Murphy, who is a public scandal and disgrace. Harper's Weekly says there can be no reform except through party organization. So say we; but any party which undertakes to reform must be itself pure—certainly purer than the Republican party in this city. To go before the Tammany Democrats as a purifying agency with Tom Murphy and his Custom-house on our backs, is perfectly ridiculous.

Butler is at last frightening the Massachusetts Republicans. His platform performances were not very alarming, but, besides lying and blackguarding, he has been busily at work seeing to the election of delegates to the Worcester Convention, and now announces that of 204 already elected, he has secured 104, "all thoroughgoing, out-spoken men"; and he declares that he is sure of the nomination, "unless there are tricks, frauds, and conspiracies against him." His progress has certainly been sufficiently great to cause the retirement of Mr. Jewell, and to force the managers to get Senators Sumner and Wilson to come out declaring that they would rather not see him nominated. This declaration could not have been extracted from either of these gentlemen in 1868, when Butler was beginning his career in Massachusetts politics. Mr. Sumner then refused to say a word against him, Mr. Boutwell spoke in his behalf, and the Republican Committee helped him to the best of its ability. If there be justice in heaven, they ought now to have Butler for Governor, whether they want him or not. No community or party has a right to train up an animal of that sort, and let him loose on the country at large, and then complain of his doing a little tearing and rending around the old homestead. To have a notorious "liar and blackguard" for chief magistrate of their State would be a fit and logical conclusion, and the only fit and logical conclusion, to the course of the party and its press towards this man for the last five years. We observe that the Rev. Kinsley Twining has been obliged to give the Reverend Doctor Marvin another castigation on Butler's account in the Boston Advertiser. If Mr. Twining thinks he can hammer the elements of morals into a Butlerite temperance editor and "minister of the Gospel," we, as experts, tell him he is mistaken. The work for Christian men to do in Doctor Marvin's case is not to try to convert him, but, if he has a church, and young people are attending it, to try and get them to leave it. The old folks, who have for years shared his worship of unclean idols, may be left to their fate.

The names have been announced of the lawyers who will act as counsel for the United States before the Geneva arbitrators. They are Caleb Cushing, of Massachusetts, and William M. Meredith, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Cushing has long been known as one of the ablest lawyers in the country, and though his old-time political enemies—we believe he has none now—used to believe that he was good enough, or bad enough, as a lawyer to make him exceedingly bad as a statesman, they will not be disposed to deny that the interests of the United States are likely to be safe in his hands. He has very well outlived the old rancors of the days when he "Tylerized," and the later days when he was for "the Constitution as it is" and the Fugitive Slave Law, and against the negro. Partly this is due to his likeable personal qualities, partly to respect for his abilities, and partly to the fact that, strict Democrat as he had been after leaving the Whigs, he did not, at the outbreak of the rebellion, put himself on the side of the secessionists. By the bar, Mr. Cushing—who was, perhaps, as able an Attorney-General as the United States has had—is esteemed as among the first half-dozen lawyers in the country. He has served repeatedly in the Massachusetts Legislature, in Congress, on the bench of the Massachusetts Supreme Court, and in the Cabinet. He is now seventy-one years old. Of Mr. Meredith less is known. He is reputed a man of brilliant abilities, which, however, owing to his impaired health, have not of late been in conspicuous exercise. He is rather an older man than Mr. Cushing, having been called to the bar as long ago as 1817, when Mr.

Cushing was a sophomore in Harvard. It looks as if, from first to last, the English negotiations business were to be a very creditable chapter in the history of the State Department.

Wall Street has again attracted something like its former share of the public thought and attention. Very much to the disgust of the merchants and of the unwary believers in the Syndicate, some of the speculative fraternity have borrowed the bulk of the gold at the disposal of the mercantile community, and refuse to lend it except at very high rates. As many of the large bond dealers and others believed that the reported negotiation of the new five per cent. loan for cash would tend to lower the premium on gold, they have, in the language of Wall Street, sold short, or sold what they have not got, and have to pay heavy rates for borrowing it. The men who get up combinations for such purposes have been often denounced in these columns. It is at best but a disreputable business. But it is rather amusing to see the exaggerated promptitude with which spontaneous indignation overwhelms these guilty wretches so soon as their tricks affect injuriously certain privileged interests, certain exceptional persons. It is safe to say that, up to the present time, this gold clique has not to any material extent interfered with the legitimate operations of commerce, and their operations, combined with the natural tendency of the market, have scarcely sufficed to advance the premium two per cent. from the lowest prices of last month. But if we are to believe the inspired financial columns of many journals, another Black Friday is in immediate prospect, and already a judge has instructed the Grand Jury to enquire into these usurious performances. It is impossible to foretell what a certain class of manipulators in Wall Street may not do. But so far the outcry about the gold conspiracy is somewhat suspicious, and a trifle premature.

The reckless bank management to which we have in vain sought to direct attention for several months past is at last producing results that make the situation intelligible even to the unthinking. Never have the banks been so expanded as they are now, yet scarcely ever have they done business upon so small a reserve. A very slight outward drain of coin or greenbacks, such as would be perfectly natural at this season of the year, would suffice in one week to force contraction upon the banks to an extent productive of the severest financial complications. There are three interests that now control the banks of this city—the Treasury with the Syndicate, the great negotiators of railroad loans, and the great speculative cliques, chiefly consisting of the directors, trustees, and officers of leading railroad lines. All these interests have required that money should be easy, and easy it has been, but at an expense to the safety of the financial and commercial community which has not yet been calculated. And with all the easy money market, the three great interests controlling it are virtually failures. The Secretary of the Treasury has announced that he will redeem a large amount of five-twenty bonds at par in gold, yet the bonds are selling in this market at below that price. In Europe a large amount of the new five per cents are reported to have been subscribed for at par in excess of the sum offered, but the bonds are to-day selling at a discount in every European market. The great railroad loan agents fill the press with column after column of displayed advertisements and editorial comments, announcing the startling rapidity with which their bonds are being bought; yet it is notorious that these bonds are openly offered for sale by private holders at a price from five to ten per cent. below the quoted prices, without finding takers. The railroad stocks owned by the cliques, in spite of puffing, and watering, and manipulating of every description, are beginning to decline sharply, and are keeping the steadily diminishing number of Wall Street operators in a state of great anxiety.

General business is active, but irregular and a little unsettled. Country trade is good, but somewhat spasmodic. Produce of almost every description has been firmer, though fluctuating. Cotton is higher, the receipts of the season so far confirming the least favorable reports of the growing crop. Breadstuffs are firm, under unquestionable deficiencies in European harvests, and not too brilliant reports of our own Prices would perhaps have advanced still higher were it not for the scarcity of vessels to carry the produce abroad. Real estate dull and unsettled. Coal is moderately firm, with only a slight reduction of wages at last settling-day.

On Wednesday, September 13—so the Cable informed us on the same date—the President of the French Republic sent a long message to the National Assembly, in which he told the now "constituent" legislators of France that they had well earned—by what, we are not told—the right to go home and rest themselves, leaving to him the pleasant duty of "incessantly working for the reorganization of the country." To this, which may be all correct, the same authority adds the following curious piece of information: "He frankly asks the deputies to ascertain from their constituents at home whether the country wishes for reconstruction, based on the glorious traditions of a thousand years, or for the abandonment of the ship of state to a torrent leading to an unknown future—in brief, whether the people want a monarchy or a republic." Now, this is rather neatly and poetically expressed, and may possibly contain a sensible suggestion as to the best way of employing the legislative recess; but we doubt the whole story. M. Thiers has been, since his election as Chief of the Executive in February last, the passionate champion, not of a speedy reorganization on the basis of monarchical traditions—which, in modern France, are unfortunately of three antagonistic kinds, Bourbonistic, Napoleonic, and Orleanistic—but of an attempt to lift up fallen France, the victim of all kinds of "glorious traditions," by the combined efforts of all parties, and by a fair trial of her provisional institutions—that is, the Republican status quo. Not a word in all preceding reports hints at the likelihood or possibility of M. Thiers veering around so abruptly, and so coolly breaking his repeatedly plighted promise not to betray the Republic. On the contrary, we find that, but a few days ago, he, on the occasion of solemn congratulations, expressed the hope that, "with the moral and material recovery of the country, its present form of government would become a peaceful and glorious reality." Whether prompted mainly by motives of wise patriotism or of personal ambition, M. Thiers means to be, for a time, at least, President of the French Republic.

On the same day, the Assembly adopted a bill providing for the prorogation of its sessions from the 17th of September to the 4th of December. During this recess, a Committee of Control, consisting of twenty-five deputies, is to supervise the action of the Government. It is composed of eleven members of the Right, eight of the Left, and six "Moderates" (of the Centre?), a composition which must well enough suit the Government, and may have been the result of a new parliamentary compromise suggested by it. Altogether, M. Thiers does not seem at all inclined to apply his famous constitutional maxim, "The king reigns, but governs not," to his own position as chief of the state, in which he exercises his functions "under the authority of the Assembly," and is responsible to it no less than his ministers. Thus we see him personally urging in committee the adoption of the new treaty concluded by MM. Rémusat and Pouyer-Quertier with Count Arnim, according to which, in compensation for special customs privileges to be granted by France to the provinces lately torn from her, the Germans bind themselves immediately to evacuate the departments of Aisne, Aube, Côte d'Or, and Jura, and to reduce their army of occupation to fifty thousand men. Yielding to M. Thiers's arguments, the committee reported favorably on the treaty, and in time for the Assembly to decide on it in the last hour before the prorogation. It was adopted against a very small minority, but, unfortunately, with some alterations in the text which, according to the last despatches, the plenipotentiaries of Germany refuse to accept. Should they finally yield, then M. Thiers would, at the opening of what we may call his new term, be able to announce to the country a series of acts of deliverance surpassing anything that could reasonably be expected, even before the insurrection of Paris completed the prostration and disorganization of vanquished France. The gradual disarmament of the National Guard in pursuance of the late law passed by the Assembly, is said to be progressing satisfactorily, even in Lyons.

MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT.

THE solution of the problem how to govern great cities, and notably this city, which we proposed three weeks ago—namely, the adoption in legislation of the theory that a modern city is not a political community, but a joint-stock association—has brought us a considerable number of communications, mostly laudatory. A similar plan—of which, however, we had never heard before—was urged on the attention of the last Constitutional Convention by Mr. Charles Moran, of this city, whose conclusions are much the same as ours, though reached by a somewhat different process. Our plan has, however, been made the subject of adverse criticism by the New York World and the Staats-Zeitung—whose editor, Mr. Ottendorfer, is playing a prominent and distinguished part in the attempt at reform which we are now witnessing. We are unable to quote in full what they say, but in summing up the argument of the Staats-Zeitung, which is substantially the same as the principal argument of the World, we think we shall give a fair idea of it. It pronounces the Nation's plan "unpractical, dangerous, and pernicious," for the following reasons:

It rests upon an erroneous idea of the nature and function of municipal government, as well as on a misconception of the forces of human nature, as displayed in political life. It is a deplorable error to suppose that the only interest the citizens of New York have in the conduct of their municipal affairs consists in an upright and economic administration of the property of the city. There are many other riches besides taxable property whose acquisition, distribution, and enjoyment to a great extent depend on the way in which the city's affairs are managed, and in which non-taxpayers have as deep and lively an interest as the wealthiest; and to shut them out from all share in this management would be to deprive them of the opportunity of making their influence felt on the development of business life, of social relations, and of the thousand expressions of citizen life. To make up for this privation by pointing them to the field of national and State politics, would be what the preacher does when he consoles his flock for this world's hardships by directing their thoughts on future bliss—a course which exactly suits despots and the supporters of despotism, inasmuch as it causes an abandonment of attempts to make this life tolerable; and just so would their sense of freedom and their pleasure in public life, and even their understanding for it, be weakened, if our citizens were not permitted to test their interests and sharpen their insight into the development of those relations with which they are in daily contact, and whose development in great measure belongs in the domain of municipal government. The basis of our institutions lies in free municipal government, without which these are merely an edifice of phrases. Nor can New York be declared an exception, and that what is applicable to her need not be applied to other parts of the country. To her a not inconsiderable portion of the population of the whole country brings a part of its life, and she stands in many respects the model upon which the eyes of the whole Union are turned. The Nation's plan would convert her citizens into a horde of nomads in the pursuit of gain, and the poison they would thus imbibe would not only dull their self-consciousness as free citizens, and make them incapable of performing their duties as members of a free state, but would have the same lamentable effect on the character of the people at large, aided by the present desire for centralization. Still, in the present circumstances, the Nation's plan is likely to find adherents. Some features of it might be advantageously borrowed. The writer then propounds the plan of having a board of auditors, with no power to make appointments or give contracts, and chosen not only by direct taxpayers, but, if you please, by taxpayers in proportion to the amount of taxes they pay; and without whose approval no money could be paid from the city treasury. This would leave uninjured the self-consciousness and feeling of responsibility of the citizens.

The World also takes the ground that our plan implies "a narrow and inadequate view of municipal life"; but, as might have been expected, takes itself a narrower view of municipal life than its German contemporary, and merely mentions the schools, the public health, the water supply, and the police as matters with which a city government must deal, but in which residents, though not house-owners, have just as much interest as house-owners. Now, we think we can honestly say that our ideal municipal life is as picturesque and rich as anybody's. There is really hardly any limit to the extent to which human comfort and culture might be promoted by such a municipality as New York might be were men other than they are, and the times other than they are; that is, we have as yet only a faint notion of the extent to which a million of intelligent, and virtuous, and industrious men and women, living in the same city, might contribute to the general happiness by co-operative well-doing. We grant, too, that in striving at reform of any kind, it does not do to take too despondent a view of the possibilities of the case, and that no striving can be very profitable in the long run which is not inspired by a really high aim. Our ideal ought to be as high and broad as the facts will bear, but no higher or broader. We may, indeed, strain the facts, but if we break loose from them and kick them off the platform, we cease to be politicians, and become poets or sentimentalists, or crack-brained blatherskites, as our mental powers shall determine.

Antiquity and the Middle Ages have bequeathed to the modern world a set of notions about the value of the city as a political community which the facts of ancient and mediæval experience fully justified. But the free and successful municipalities of the ancient and mediæval world were all small, and their citizens were united by bonds of race, religion, and corporation, the strength of which we cannot even understand, and to which we would never submit. Moreover, their population, if it increased at all, increased very slowly, and almost wholly by births within the walls. Accessions from without were discouraged and rarely came. Better materials for a political community could not exist, and they were cemented into a strong and harmonious unity by constant danger from without. In short, the males were all soldiers, who constantly and frequently saw active service in the field together. Moreover, not only were they well fitted to manage their own affairs, but they had to manage them. Either the inhabitants were undisputed possessors of the sovereignty, or the general government was incompetent to afford them protection, and was intent on robbing them, or was too far removed, owing to the imperfection of means of communication, to supervise their affairs, or have any competent judgment about them. Whenever extraordinary circumstances, as in the case of ancient Rome, either made great additions to the population, or destroyed its homogeneousness, the municipality lost its political character wholly, and became merely an administrative machine. Nevertheless, the histories of Athens, and Thebes, and Sparta, and Florence, and Bruges, and Ghent, and Strasburg were so splendid and picturesque, and did so much for civilization and liberty, and contributed so many valuable political ideas to the common stock, that it is not wonderful that they should not only have made a powerful impression on the imagination of literary men, and poets, and artists, but have furnished a model on which political thinkers in our time are constantly dwelling, and which they are intent on reproducing. Their hopes have been enormously stimulated, too, by the reaction against the theologian's low view of human nature which set in after the French Revolution, rapidly took possession of the civilized world, and has finally in our day developed into a sort of mania, which is spreading among the working-classes, and if not checked will seriously endanger civilization itself. The theologians would have it that men were constantly inclining to do evil, and were naturally selfish and deceitful; the modern humanitarian will have it that nothing but the vileness and oppressiveness of existing social and political institutions hinders people from constantly doing good; and that, if you only arrange society properly, everybody will go out and work like a beaver, or as much as is good for him, in order to share his earnings with his neighbors; and that crimes are caused mainly by the existence of police and jails. To persons who look at the world in this way, of course nothing seems easier than to build up and carry on a well-ordered municipality. Call the people together, ask them what they want, and do what they tell you, and you have forthwith a beautiful city, in which the administrative machinery goes like clockwork, and "none but the best men" are elected to office.

Now, the reason why the city government problem in our time presents so many difficulties, and the reason why the ancient and mediæval experience is of little or no use to us, is that there has been a great change in the state of facts, and this change in the facts renders necessary a corresponding change in our theories and our aims, and gives a slightly poetical character—we do not say this contemptuously—to such speculations as those of the Staats-Zeitung. Your municipal life, in our day, no matter what your ideal may be, must be what the circumstances of modern society and the existing condition of human nature will permit it to be; and though you may try ever so much by new charters, amendments to charters, popular uprisings, and "Citizens' Associations," and "Reform Councils," to make it something else, and something better, you will not succeed. You will find yourself for ever rolling the stone up the hill, and seeing it regularly roll down after you have got it to the top.

In the first place, all successful municipal self-government of which we have any knowledge has been carried on by small, homogeneous communities, animated by a very strong sense of fellowship and identity of interest. This is true of the Greek cities, of the mediæval cities, of the English cities, and of the New England and other American towns. In all these the voters have not only been united by the closest of all ties, those created by community of race, religion, and history; but their numbers have been sufficiently small to make mutual acquaintance possible, and give tremendous force to public opinion. We are now trying to apply this same system to the government of enormous masses of men, gathered, under the influence of steam travel, from all parts of the world, differing widely in race, language, manners, traditions, religion, and resembling the municipalities of the literary men and the poets in nothing except condensation of a great number of dwellings on a small space of ground. But not only are they not held together by the ties we have named; not only does the city not stand to them in the place of country and religion, as it did to the ancient Greeks; not only is there nothing among them to exercise the cohesive force of the mediæval guild or the New England church, but they are actually pulverized, to a degree never witnessed in the history of the human race, by the individualism and impatience of routine, and monotony, and control which both our government and education have, for the last century, been steadily fostering. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that the house of every New-Yorker is constantly for sale, and his trunk packed, and that you could not annoy him more than by attempting to regulate his conduct by a standard not of his own making. This is true of the householders; but outside the householders there is a vast and, let us add, ignorant boarding-house, tenement-house, and hotel population, whose attachment to the place or to their neighbors is still weaker, and who feel little more responsibility for this city than for Boston or Philadelphia, being, on the whole, nearly as likely to live next year in any one of these as in the others.

When you set yourself to work to devise a local government for such a community, the first thing to be done—its heterogeneousness being one of the elements of the problem which we cannot get rid of—is to look for the fact, whatever it be, that creates a feeling of community of interest strong enough to produce common action among the largest portion of the population. If New York were peopled exclusively by Irishmen, that fact would be community of race and religion; if it were peopled exclusively by Germans, it would be community of language and race and social usages; if it were American, it would be community of religion and political habits and traditions; but, being peopled by contributions from all nations, the only fact which creates, in the midst of this confused mass, a real municipality, is the fact of common liability to direct taxation. This liability does create among a large body of the inhabitants of our large cities a strong feeling of community of interest; in New York, nothing else does; and on this fact, therefore, and on nothing else that we know of, can we build up a respectable municipal government. If we were to try for a hundred years to build one upon the basis of mere numbers, as now—no matter what our ideal might be—we should never construct anything better than a board of four or five hardened cheats, like the gang whom we are trying to drive out. It is not in human nature, not even in cultivated human nature, to care much what becomes of other people's money, and you will never persuade such a population as our non-taxpayers—or, what is the same thing for our purpose, those who think themselves non-taxpayers—that the money which is raised for the government of this city is not other people's money.

Here we come to the question which the World has raised, whether this common liability to direct taxation is a respectable basis for a municipal government? It seems to think not; but we know of none more so. It is, in fact, a very large part of the basis of all government. No government has ever been long good which did not consider the citizen mainly as a taxpayer, and no man was ever a good citizen who did not make the collection and the disposition of the taxes his chief political concern. The manner of raising and spending revenue for public purposes plays, in short, the same part in national life which the getting and spending of income plays in individual life, and the former exercises much the same influence on national character as the latter on individual character. As Burke has well said, "The revenue of the state is the state. In fact, all depends on it, whether for support or reformation. . . . Through the revenue alone can the body politic ever act in its true genius and character, and therefore it will display just as much of its collective virtue, and as much of that virtue which may characterize those who move it, and are, as it were, its life and guiding principle, as it is possessed of a just revenue." We spoke in our former article of creating the municipality of New York out of house-owners, which supplied the World with a sneer at the suggestion of a municipal government "based on real estate"; but we used the term house-owners as merely a synonym for taxpayers, for few others in New York now pay direct taxes. But the collection of direct taxes from as large a number of persons as possible, say all householders and occupants of floors—that is, making the municipality include as large a proportion of the population as possible, would be an essential feature of our plan; for it does, in fact, rest on the theory that all persons in this city, not reached by direct taxation, do constitute, to all intents and purposes, a true proletariat, and do exercise the same pernicious influence on politics, and would, if allowed to take as large a share in the free government of any state in the world as they take in the government of this city, ruin that government utterly in a very short space of time. If the same proportion, for instance, of the population of the United States should ever come to be exempt from the tax-gatherer's direct application for money, the overthrow of free institutions on this continent would not be far off, no matter how picturesque our political ideal might be. As to the practicability of our scheme, there cannot be anything so very hopeless about it when the Staats-Zeitung would be prepared to set up a board of audit elected by taxpayers empowered to stop all excessive expenditures. We should be content, for the present, and as a stepping-stone to something better, with Mr. Charles Nordhoff's plan of a responsible mayor, elected on a general ticket; or with a personal representation charter, such as we have ourselves advocated, which would enable us to thrust a few honest men in among the thieves to let us know what they were about; but we believe the final solution of the problem to be municipalities composed of taxpayers and none others, with limited and strictly non-political powers. That will come sooner or later; and we must say we hardly think it necessary to show that the municipal life of New York, if the city were governed by such a body as its taxpayers, would not suffer in richness or largeness by the exclusion of the barbarous hordes of adventurers who give Tweed and Connolly their strength, and who will, we believe, enable both these scoundrels to defy the law.

Practically, at this moment, the taxes are voted, and the men who are to expend them appointed, by persons who either do not pay them, or who fancy they do not, which, for practical purposes, is about the same thing. The cost of paving a street, for instance, though paid entirely by the persons living on it, is in practice fixed, and the workmen selected, by a parcel of grogshop-keepers in distant wards. There are numerous streets in this city—all the streets which are really kept in good order—the sweeping and watering of which, and the watching at night, are provided for by voluntary contributions from the inhabitants of them, although they pay heavy taxes to the municipality for rendering the same services, which, however, the municipality does not render. A government of taxpayers, limited in its functions to paving, lighting, cleansing, to sanitary police, and compelled to discharge these duties properly, whatever the present objections to it on constitutional grounds, has nothing in it contrary to the genius of American institutions. It would subject nobody to laws he had not helped to make, while it would deliver a great body of persons from the payment of taxes which they have not voted. It would commit municipal concerns to the charge of the persons really interested in them, and would thus bring about what, under the theory that the city is a political community which every resident has a natural right to manage, can never be brought about—its delivery from politics. The World thinks our comparison of the city to a railroad company unfortunate, because so many railroads are badly managed; but what does it think would be the management of our railroads if every man who took a ride on one in the course of the year was entitled to vote at elections of its directors? Moreover, it has to be remembered that stockholders do not pass their lives in the trains. If they did, we should have better accommodation. The idea of making directors ride on the cowcatcher as a safeguard against accidents is barbarous, but it touches the root of the difficulty in all cases of mismanagement of corporations.

MR. GLADSTONE'S UNPOPULARITY.

Mr. Gladstone has appeared in the provinces, as is the custom of the English ministers during the Parliamentary recess, and is engaged in giving a series of popular explanations of his doings and his policy to country audiences, who draw them out by one device or another. He is, no doubt, glad to get away from the capital, and get into contact with the public of the North, who look on him with a good deal more indulgence and admiration than that of London, and with whom he has far more points of contact and of sympathy. For there has grown up within the last thirty, and more particularly within the last twenty years, a difference between London and the Northern provinces, of very great importance in English politics, but of which few foreigners are aware. Mr. Gladstone touched upon it lightly the other day in his address to his son's constituents at Whitby, when he spoke of the striking contrast in the criticisms of himself and his administration by the London press and by that of the great towns of the North. The fact is, though London continues to be the social and commercial and official capital of England, Manchester has become the political capital—that is, the city which prepares and puts in circulation the prevailing opinion of the English people on all the great questions of the day; and we are only reproducing a fact familiar to all observers of English politics, as well as to English politicians, when we say that one gets a much better idea by reading the Manchester Examiner or Guardian of the course English sentiment is running, or likely to run, on any given question, than by reading the Times or any other London paper which professes—as the best London papers do not—to express public opinion, rather than help to form it by criticism. To take a familiar and recent instance: The Greek massacres, a year ago, excited the most tremendous indignation in London, owing to the fact that two of the victims were well connected and well known in London society; and, if the London press had been allowed to have its way, Athens would have been occupied, and Greece scoured by English gendarmerie. The press of the North, however, took the matter comparatively coolly, showing that, lamentable as the tragedy was, there was no real disposition on the part of the English people to treat it as a great political event, and accordingly the Government confined itself to a protest, and a hitherto barren demand for enquiry. It would, of course, be absurd to say that the London papers do not possess enormous influence, and do not form, on the whole, by far the ablest portion of the British press. What we mean is, that when there comes on one of those crises, so common in English politics, in which class-feeling is roused on one side or the other, it is far safer to take the opinion of Northern editors as to what the final issue will be than that of those of the metropolis.

This distinction between London and the provinces, too, is likely to increase rather than diminish, as the aristocratic hold on the Government grows weaker. Its growth has been remarkably illustrated in the history of the last session of Parliament, and especially by that most important incident of it—the solution of the question of the abolition of purchase in the army, by cancelling the royal warrant which legalized the practice. The purchase system was emphatically a London question—that is, the question of the plutocratic and aristocratic classes, who make London their headquarters, and who, through their enormous social influence, exercised through a thousand channels, color, if not mould, the political sentiment of the city. The desperate opposition made to the measure in the House of Commons by the set of men facetiously called "the colonels" in the English papers—that is, military men and their friends and relatives—had the support and sympathy of London society, though the change was too plainly a much-needed reform to meet with disfavor from the London press. But then the London press shared, more or less, the hostility excited in London society by the revolutionary temper displayed by the ministry in pressing it, and was, consequently, by no means disposed to view with the favor or indifference of the Northern press the thoroughly revolutionary process by which Mr. Gladstone made his way out of the difficulty. We say revolutionary process, because, although the cancelling of the royal warrant was in itself perfectly legitimate, cancelling it by way of evading a decision of Parliament, after Parliament had been formally applied to for a decision, was undoubtedly revolutionary, particularly when, as Mr. Gladstone acknowledged, it was done in obedience to what he considered a higher authority than Parliament—"public opinion." There was a very unpleasant resemblance, in all this, to Louis Napoleon's plan of appealing to the people by a plébiscite whenever he disagreed with the legislature; the London press and London society saw it, and were very savage over it; but the provinces have either looked on calmly or exultingly.

In London, too, there is no question, Mr. Gladstone has declined in popularity. He has given mortal offence, on various points, to the public of the clubs and the drawing-rooms. He has struck, or threatens to strike, heavy blows at the influence of wealth and rank on politics, and has diffused great uneasiness through English "society," properly so called, by a certain exaltation of temper which makes it a little difficult for an average Englishman to form an opinion as to what he will do next. His reforms, whether planned, attempted, or executed, are all of a very radical kind, and strike deeper into the soil of English prejudices and habits than anything which has preceded them. It is no wonder that their author should be acquiring in the eyes of a portion of the English public the reputation of being a "dangerous man"—about the worst thing which, in the eyes of Englishmen, can be said of a politician.

Mr. Gladstone, too, has reached that point of progress in a radical direction to which every radical reformer comes sooner or later, and over which none but men of great resolution and clear-headedness pass in safety. It is the point at which weaker "champions" either go crazy and plunge into maniacal excesses, or run away into obscurity in sheer fright over their own doings. He has passed one measure, the abolition of the Irish Church, which, whatever may be said as to the difference in the circumstances of the two cases, leaves the English Church establishment no stronger hold on life than is furnished by the habitual English respect for vested interests. He has, however, struck a heavy blow at this respect by the way in which he has got rid of purchase in the army. Not only has he abolished it without the consent of Parliament, but he has imposed on Parliament the alternative of compensating those who now hold commissions, and have $50,000,000 invested in them, or letting it alone. He has passed an educational system which, whatever its faults, bids fair to democratize the country districts of the South, or, in other words, to overthrow conservatism in its last strongholds, and he has made and announces his intention of repeating a vigorous attempt to introduce the ballot at elections. It is not possible for any man to do these things in a country like England, close on the heels of a measure establishing all but universal suffrage, and at a period of great social ferment, without exciting both extravagant expectations on one side, and fierce hostility on the other, and, if Mr. Gladstone keeps his head during the coming two years, he will do better than most initiators of great revolutions.

He has, too, a vein of sentiment, not to say sentimentality, in his composition which Englishmen of all classes are apt to find very irritating. If he were not an educated man, he would probably have been a blatherskite. It is not that he takes a very lofty or romantic view of his duty—Englishmen are familiar enough with that, and there is, probably, no country in which characters like Bayard's, or Sydney's, or Outram's, or Havelock's have more admirers; and it is not that he is swayed in his political course by sentimental considerations, because the same thing may be said of Mr. Bright, who, however much he may be disliked, has never excited the irritated hostility with which Mr. Gladstone is regarded. But Mr. Bright is not, and never has been, a party politician, liking power and place, and working hard for it, and he has always been able to clothe his sentiment in a fiery and majestic eloquence, to which, great an orator as he is, Mr. Gladstone can lay no claim. Accordingly, Mr. Bright, who used to be called a demagogue by the conservative papers, is now called a "tribune," while Mr. Gladstone, who began his career as a "statesman," is closing it as a "demagogue" or "canting demagogue." The reason is—and we believe this is true of every parliamentary country, and as true of America as of England—that suspicion or distrust of men in power is not only a necessary feature of party politics, but becomes at last a habit of the national mind. Incessant watchfulness and incessant criticism on the part of the public are, in fact, essential conditions of the successful working of constitutional governments; consequently, all claims to confidence or support put forward by a politician which do not admit of examination by ordinary tests, are apt to be treated by a considerable portion of the public as pieces of imposture, and resented accordingly. Professions, or suggestions, or assumptions of superior purity of motive, or superior disinterestedness, or superior piety, when produced in defense of a policy or measure by its authors, are apt to be, and, we think, on the whole rightly, received with popular incredulity. We doubt, for instance, if any public man has, even in this country, succeeded in covering up very serious defects or shortcomings in his political course, or strengthening any new position, or retaining his hold on power, by "getting religion," or offering any other easily-made indication of a superior condition of heart. Mr. Gladstone, whom we believe to be as single-minded and pure-hearted a man as lives, and who, we have no doubt, does carry into politics a higher class of motives than usually animates politicians, doubtless suffers from a state of things the effects of which are, on the whole, good. People will hear a man telling them, or letting them understand, that he thinks himself holier than most of them; but if he gives, or seems to give, this as a reason why they should make him or keep him First Lord of the Treasury, Senator, or Governor, they are apt to laugh, become profane, and finally hostile.

MERCANTILE CLAIMS UNDER THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON—MR. RUSSELL GURNEY.

[FROM AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT.]

LONDON, Sept. 7.

YOUR readers may have seen an article in the Times which proclaimed in a tone of well-deserved though of rather full-flavored eulogy the merits of the eminent persons who have undertaken to deal in behalf of England with what are popularly called the "Alabama claims." An unfortunate omission made the leader of less interest to Americans than it might otherwise have been, for the writer, while heaping deserved praise on the Lord Chief-Justice and Sir Roundell Palmer, who will never be seen on the other side of the Atlantic, omitted to notice the position and character, both of which well deserve attention, of the commissioner on whose labors the practical success of the Treaty of Washington will in a great measure depend, and who must shortly become personally known to all the leading statesmen and lawyers of America. This gentleman is Mr. Russell Gurney, the Recorder of London, and the English commissioner for the final settlement of all claims under the treaty, made either by Englishmen or Americans, which do not arise from the acts of the Alabama or of ships of the same character. The true reason, it may be suspected, why Mr. Russell Gurney's name did not appear in the list of worthies enumerated by the Times, is that nine out of ten of the English public fancy that the treaty deals wholly with the Alabama claims, and have not the least conception that some of its most important provisions have reference to claims of a totally different character. This delusion may appear absurd enough to Americans, but of its existence there is not the least doubt, and it led the Times not to notice the one person about whom Americans would naturally care to know something. As Mr. Russell Gurney occupies a peculiar position, and his appointment is in some respects highly characteristic of the present state of English politics, your readers will perhaps allow me to supply them with the information which they will not obtain from our leading newspaper.

Mr. Russell Gurney is Recorder of London. The recordership itself is one of those anomalous positions which could not exist anywhere but in England. The recorder is appointed, not by the Government, but by the city authorities, and is, in this point of view, a merely local judge, standing in theory in the same position as the recorder or judge of any of the numerous local courts which are to be found in different English boroughs. But the greatness of London, combined with the intricate provisions of the acts constituting what is known to lawyers as "the Central Criminal Court," and to everybody else as the "Old Bailey," has placed the Recorder of London in a very peculiar position. Though looked at in one point of view he is a local judge, looked at in another he stands in a situation very nearly equal to that occupied by the judges of the superior courts, many of whose functions he, as a matter of fact, discharges. The city of London is a mass of anomalies, and, as foes would say, of abuses, but it must be admitted that they have appointed to the recordership eminent persons, well fitted to fill a judicial office, and that no appointment has ever given more satisfaction, either to the legal profession or to the public, than that of the present recorder. It is no exaggeration to say that he is, as well from knowledge of law as for the admirable conduct of his court, among the five or six best of the English judges, and in every respect markedly superior to some of those who occupy the highest posts on the common-law bench. It is, in fact, generally believed, though I am not able to guarantee the truth of the rumor, that Mr. Russell Gurney might, had he chosen, have passed from the recordership to the bench, but preferred to remain in his present sphere. Such a preference is perfectly intelligible. The emoluments of the recordership are not much less than those of a judgeship. The social status of the Recorder of London is hardly inferior to that of a judge, and a recorder has one great though very curious advantage not possessed by his brothers on the bench. He can, without sacrificing his recordership, be a member of Parliament, and this advantage is one of which Mr. Russell Gurney has for some years made practical use.

The fact that a man can hold a high judicial position, and still retain his connection with politics, is, according to modern ideas, in the strictest sense anomalous. But, like some other English anomalies, it has worked well, and both the public and Mr. Russell Gurney himself have gained much from the peculiarity of his situation. It is hardly worth while to say that his judicial character has been in no way influenced by his political sympathies, for the same, it is to be hoped, might be said of any English lawyer who should in any way find his judicial duties and political feelings come into conflict. But it is worth remarking that his character as a judge has had a very favorable influence on his political career. Many lawyers have found it perfectly easy to be impartial and just when on the bench, but have seemed to dismiss their sense of justice and equity the moment they have divested themselves of their robes, and certainly some of the least scrupulous party leaders have been peers who, while unscrupulous as partisans, have exercised judicial functions with universal admiration. The Recorder of London has never, whilst in the House of Commons, forgotten the virtues of a judge. His many friends feel, and his foes, if he has any, admit, that his distinguishing characteristic is a high sense of justice. He is known to be a strict adherent of the Conservative party, but no one can point to a single expression used by him, in or out of Parliament, unbecoming judicial moderation. Moreover, though in a party sense a Conservative, he has, influenced no doubt by the love of justice, become associated with the promotion of reforms some of which would seem most naturally to come from a Liberal of rather an advanced type. He, for instance, two years ago, protected, by a short and efficient act, the funds of trades-unions from embezzlement and misappropriation, and during the last session was the main instrument in giving some slight protection to the property of married women. The Married Women's Property Act, as actually passed, does not go very far in the way of reform, but the bill as originally drawn, before its provisions were altered by the House of Lords, carried out almost all that the most ardent advocates of a woman's right to her own property demand. This measure had, of course, nothing to do with female franchise, but, unless I am much mistaken, the Recorder is one of those Conservatives, of whom there is a considerable body with us, who have supported the claims of women to vote upon the laws by which they are ruled.

A gentleman thus conspicuous as well by his Conservative sympathies and connections as by his sympathy with all measures calculated to remove practical injustice, naturally possesses a weight with Liberals and Conservatives alike which could not be obtained by any mere partisan, and this weight is greatly increased through the respect universally entertained for him as a lawyer and as a judge. Hence men of all parties are inclined to refer to his arbitration all those important questions for the decision of which even politicians feel other qualities are wanted than mere zeal for party. Thus some years ago, when the suppression of the riots in Jamaica made an enquiry into the steps taken by Governor Eyre absolutely essential, the Liberal Government, then in power, appointed the Recorder one of the Commissioners for carrying out this difficult investigation, and the appointment was, we believe, universally approved. So again, now that the great thing desired is the fair settlement of all disputes between us and America, the Government have most naturally turned to Mr. Russell Gurney for aid. To the Ministry itself the appointment is creditable, and is another instance of the care with which—whatever their faults in other respects—they have conducted the American negotiations. But it must, in fairness, be added that, if the appointment is creditable to the Government, the acceptance of it is a proof of the patriotism and public zeal which have always distinguished the Recorder. The work in which he will be engaged will necessarily be intricate, wearisome, and difficult to bring to a satisfactory termination. It is, further, labor which cannot lead to any result so showy, or which will attract so much popular attention, as the conclusion of what are called the Alabama claims; nor is it easy to see how, in the situation of Mr. Russell Gurney, the work can lead to any adequate reward. His reputation is fully made, and his position is one which could not be exchanged with advantage for many of the posts in the gift of an English administration. The work in this case must be its own reward, and that, to a person of a patriotic spirit, may, it is hoped, be a considerable recompense. Mr. Russell Gurney and his colleagues have an opportunity of finally closing a whole body of claims which, whether well founded or not, have, no doubt, done much to keep alive ill-will between two countries which ought never to have been brought into a position of antagonism. The spirit with which both the American and English Governments have carried on the recent negotiations gives every reason to suppose that the Commissioners will succeed in giving satisfaction to all men of common sense and common fairness on both sides the Atlantic. The one wish prevalent in England is to have all fair grounds of dispute removed. This wish is shared both by the people and the Government, and the Ministry could have given no greater proof of the fairness of their intentions than by appointing as Commissioner a man who, though an opponent of the Government, is the fairest and most judicially-minded member of the House of Commons.

THE PERSONAL GOVERNMENT OF THIERS.

PARIS, August 30, 1871.

I HAVE never believed much in what M. Thiers has chosen to call "the compact of Bordeaux," not only because I do not believe in a hybrid government, which is at once a republic without republicans and a monarchy without a monarch; but also because, knowing M. Thiers, I was convinced that he would never remain within the bounds of his own contract. There is a certain continuity in the development of every human character. Read the "History of the French Revolution" by Thiers, his "History of the Consulate and the Empire," his speeches in 1840, when he was ready to wage war against the whole of Europe, all his pamphlets, all his essays, and you will see running through everything an innate love of force and, under a semblance of liberalism, a real instinct of despotism. It was Thiers who made a god of Napoleon the First, and, if he was not the prime minister of Napoleon the Third, it was because Napoleon the Third would never condescend to employ him. In 1849, Thiers already wanted, as he does now, to be the President of the French Republic; he and Prince Louis were rivals. A Belgian diplomatist of great eminence once asked the Prince, who had then become an Emperor, "Why don't you employ Thiers?" "I shall have him," was the reply, "whenever I choose." However, by a strange antipathy which was remarkable in a man so much devoid of human passions, Napoleon the Third never offered the ministry to Thiers. When Ollivier became premier, M. Thiers thought that he would soon become his successor. He invited all his friends to join what was then called the "liberal Empire," expecting for himself that the feeble hands of Émile Ollivier would soon drop into his the reins of government. But the fatal war with Germany disturbed all his calculations. Thiers opposed the war not as unjust or immoral, but merely because France was not ready, nor strong enough. This opposition to the war, founded simply on expediency, was enough to convince the country of M. Thiers's wisdom, and twenty-nine departments elected him as a deputy. He has ever since considered himself more as the representative of the nation than as the servant of the Assembly. One of his prefects told me two days ago, after having uttered all sorts of complaints against the Chamber: "I consider myself as the prefect of M. Thiers, not as the prefect of the Assembly." "Very well," said I, "but is not M. Thiers himself the delegate of the Assembly?" "Not in the least; M. Thiers is the first political man of the country." This will give you an idea of the actual condition of things: every agent of the executive is ready to ignore the existence of a Chamber which has chosen M. Thiers as the chief of the executive power.

There is such a tendency in the French mind towards personal government that many people are quite ready to forget the existence of the Assembly and to look upon M. Thiers as a providential man, un homme nécessaire, who ought to be trusted with all the essential attributes of sovereignty, and, more than that, who ought never to be resisted even legally: whose will ought for the moment to concentrate and to embody the wills of all Frenchmen. M. Thiers himself believes sincerely the same thing; he allows himself and is allowed by his clients to repeat every day that he has saved France from the horrors of external war and of civil war, of the invasion and of the Commune; he is the savior of France and of society. He considers his campaign against Paris as one of the greatest triumphs of past and modern ages; he looks upon the lamentable peace at Frankfort with admiration. Why should he bear the control of seven hundred gentlemen, who are merely squires, merchants, proprietors, magistrates, country gentlemen? Do they understand war better than he does? They thought it necessary to disarm the National Guards where they are not yet disarmed; what right have they to do this if he thinks that there must still be battalions of citizen-soldiers? To be sure, all the mobiles have been disarmed, the Nationals of Paris have been, but must we not have in Lyons, as at Bordeaux and some other places, a civic force to defend the threatened Republic? General Chanzy, who is a real soldier, does not believe in the citizen-soldiers; in fact, he shows in his report that he believes them to be neither good soldiers nor good citizens; but General Chanzy has no right to interfere with the plans of the Government. M. Thiers, and M. Thiers only, knows when it will be time to disarm the Federals of Lyons; and so he informed the Assembly. For the second time he accused the Chamber of want of courage; he did not disguise his contempt for the majority, and did his very best to disgrace the only legal power that remains in France. His want of dignity was only equalled by his want of patriotism; for what can be less patriotic than to diminish the authority and the prestige of a sovereign assembly which was elected by France in the hour of her greatest peril? M. Thiers behaved like an "enfant terrible" who breaks his own toys, and the "terribleness" of a second childhood is far worse than that of the first.

The Chamber, offended as it was, did not, however, take him at his word; it did not accept the resignation which he contemptuously offered; even then, it accepted a compromise. But this time it did not quite look like a whipped spaniel at the feet of its master. The Chamber compromised once more in the interest of the country, but everybody said that this was the supreme sacrifice which it made to the senile vanity of its leader. The day before, there was a great chance of the Rivet proposition being adopted; all parties were ready to accept the "prorogation" of M. Thiers for three years. After the conjugal scene of Thursday, the members of the majority felt less inclined to give M. Thiers so long a lease of power. The report on the Rivet proposition was read on Monday before the Chamber. M. Vitet, the reporter and well-known writer, is a personal friend of M. Thiers of long standing; but throughout his report there was a spirit of distrust of M. Thiers; the rights of the Chambers are vindicated, and its constituent powers asserted, though M. Thiers had given all his agents the signal for an agitation with a view to dissolution. There is no doubt that had the powers of M. Thiers been extended for three years, the prestige of the present Chamber would at once have vanished, the dissolution would have soon been pronounced, and new elections would have taken place for a Constituent Assembly. As Montalembert once told me; "In France, it is better to ask not for whom the electors vote, but under whom they vote." Under M. Thiers, the elections would, without doubt, have been what I can only call Thiersian; and the first act of the new Chamber would have been to name M. Thiers President of the Republic for his lifetime.

Before this letter reaches you, you will have long known the termination of the present crisis. At the present moment everything is uncertain. If the Chamber votes the prorogation on the terms of M. Vitet, that is, sine die, leaving M. Thiers's powers dependent on a vote of the Assembly, M. Thiers will only have gained a name for another name, and in reality his power will be morally diminished, even if the Chamber condescends to express once more its confidence in the "illustrious statesman who has rendered such services to the country." This phrase has been now so much used that there is no longer any meaning left in it. It seems likely to me—but even conjecture is unsafe when passion rules, not reason—that at the last moment the quarrel of M. Thiers and of the Assembly will again end in some sort of compromise. Thiers will once more threaten to resign, he will once more try the powers of his subtle and fluent eloquence, the Chamber will once more be tempted to show its magnanimity, the wire-pullers will work in the bureaux, in the lobbies, in the political clubs of Versailles; and, after a week's confusion, we shall have a President of the Republic without a republic. The Radicals who now support M. Thiers will attack him as soon as he has a regular title; the Monarchists will remind him every day that he is only President of a provisional republic; he will be obliged to do all the dirty work which he has left undone so long, to transport and execute the Communist leaders, to disarm the National Guards, to levy the new taxes, to negotiate with M. d'Arnim, just arrived at Versailles, not the most amiable of negotiators. With less personal ambition and more sincerity of purpose, M. Thiers could have made for himself a far better position. Meanwhile the country looks with amazement on these scenes at Versailles, and hardly understands their meaning. "If this is parliamentary government, give me something else." Such is already the sentiment of many quiet and good citizens. And it must be confessed that if this was parliamentary government, such a government would not be desirable. But it is not: it is only a hypocritical personal government, without organized parties having avowed platforms or desires, without constitutional restraints, without sufficient checks in the press or in the manifestations of public opinion by means of public meetings—the Chamber is a convention which has abdicated virtually into the hands of one man.

Notes.

MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co. announce the completion of seven volumes of their revised edition of Chambers's Encyclopædia.——The illustrated holiday books announced by Messrs. J. R. Osgood & Co. are all new editions of the publications of this house, except the collection of poetry for the young, selected, edited, and furnished with an introductory essay, by John G. Whittier, and called "Child Life"; and "Edwin Booth in Twelve Dramatic Characters," which will consist of a biographical and critical sketch of the actor by William Winter, and portraits in costume, from life, by W. J. Hennessy, engraved by W. J. Linton—a quarto volume. The rest of the list embraces Longfellow's Poems, in one volume; a red-line edition of Bret Harte's Poems; also, his "Luck of Roaring Camp and Other Sketches"—a large quarto; Charles Dudley Warner's "My Summer in a Garden"—small quarto; Mrs. Stowe's "Oldtime Fireside Stories"; and Mr. J. T. Trowbridge's humorous "Coupon Bonds, and Other Stories." From among the illustrated juvenile works we name these two: Mrs. A. M. Diaz's "William Henry and His Friends," already well known to the readers of Our Young Folks, and "How to Do It," a behavior-book, by Rev. Edward E. Hale. Two new books for the young, by Mrs. Stowe, are announced, without titles.——After a suspension of eight years, Mr. Geo. P. Philes revives the Philobiblion, with Mr. J. W. Bouton for publisher. It is to appear on the 15th of each month, in quarto form, making a volume of 500 pages annually, handsomely printed. The subscription is four dollars. Its descriptive title is "A Monthly Bibliographical and Literary Journal, containing Critical Notices of and Extracts from Rare, Curious, and Valuable Old Books." Current literature, however, is to receive a share of attention in the shape of announcements of new publications, summary notices of them, and literary and personal gossip. New works in the German, Dutch, French, Italian, and Spanish languages will receive especial attention. The first number will be issued October 15.——There was a printer's error in our last number, which was too amusing to have passed unnoticed, and hardly needs correction. Mr. Alexander James Dallas's "poetical" writings were spoken of on p. 180, when "political" writings were, of course, the only kind he indulged in.——Messrs. J. B. Ford & Co. will republish in book form the serial novel by Mrs. Stowe that has been appearing in the Christian Union: "My Wife and I; or, Harry Henderson's History."

—Professor D. H. Mahan, who committed suicide on Saturday last, by throwing himself into the Hudson from a steamboat, was born in this city in 1802, and at the age of eighteen was appointed a cadet at West Point. In 1824 he graduated at the head of his class, and ever since then, except when he was under orders in Europe studying in the military school at Metz—1827–1830—he has been a teacher in the Academy there. For more than forty years, then, he had been engaged in teaching, and the officers of the army now living are very few who were not as boys under his excellent instruction. At first he was Acting Assistant-Professor, then Assistant-Professor of Mathemathics, and at the time of his death held the chair of Military and Civil Engineering and the Science of War. It is stated, we do not know whether on good authority, that it was the recommendation of the Board of Visitors that he be retired from the chair which he had filled so long and with such honor and usefulness, which brought on the despondency which caused him to destroy himself. Prof. Mahan was the author of several text-books, the most widely useful of which has probably been his "Elementary Treatise of Civil Engineering," first published thirty-three years ago. All his works, however, are authoritative, all being in the line of his daily labors. Outside of his work he may be said to have written little or nothing; we have known of nothing written by him which was further from the absorbing subject of his thoughts than a few articles in defence of his beloved Academy, contributed to this journal, and a few valuable contributions, of more general interest, which last summer, while the Franco-German war was raging, he made to the columns of the Army and Navy Journal and to our own. His death will be regretted in many circles, for he was a faithful student and much-respected instructor, a master in his profession, and recognized as such both at home and abroad.

—The late war in Europe still furnishes more English publications of interest than any other topic; and of these the best is, perhaps, the translation of Colonel W. Rüstow's "War for the Rhine Provinces: its Political and Military History," of which Vol. I. is out. Captain Hozier's "Franco-Prussian War" has reached the third division of its first volume. Among works or compilations by newspaper correspondents are found Sir Randal H. Roberts's "Modern War; or, The Campaigns of the First Prussian Army, 1870–71," of which not much praise can be spoken; and Nathan Sheppard's "Shut Up in Paris," which, for reading once, will compare favorably with any diary yet published. Percy's "Account of the Kemble Family" is the only noteworthy one of recent biographies. Mr. Joseph Sandall has compiled "Memoranda of Art and Artists, Anecdotal and Biographical." Mr. Edmund Sharpe's "Account of the Churches Visited during the Lincoln Excursion of the Archæological Association, August, 1871," may be named in connection with Mr. Charles L. Eastlake's forthcoming "History of the Gothic Revival" in England. Robert Cowie's "Shetland, Descriptive and Historical," contains, besides notices of the inhabitants, a topographical description, with a map and illustrations. Mr. Ascott R. Hope has partly invented and partly adapted "Stories of French School Life," in which he appears to have retained his knack of being entertaining, as when writing of English school-boy life. Mr. W. H. Corfield's admirable "Digest of Facts Relating to the Treatment of Sewage," we are glad to observe, has reached a second edition. Two pamphlets entitled "The River Plate as a Field for Emigration," and "Emigration to the River Plate," are probably contributions towards the solution of the pauper problem of England, but may be worth consulting by adventurous persons not destitute and not English.

—The indefatigable Dr. William Smith has recently added a new volume to his valuable "Student's" series, which, we venture to say, will prove as useful as any of its predecessors. This is an edition of Hallam's "Middle Ages"—not an abridgment, he is careful to tell us, but a revision which undertakes to incorporate in the text whatever is essential in the supplementary notes, giving the student the first views of the author, with the reasons for them, but omitting views and arguments which he had been led to abandon, as well as such notes and discussions as seemed less adapted to the use of college classes than of historical enquirers—who of course must have the complete work. Besides this, there is very little omitted, and there are even serviceable additions, in the shape of lists of sovereigns, genealogical tables, and original documents (as Magna Charta and the Constitutions of Clarendon), to say nothing of passages from recent works like Maine's "Ancient Law," Bryce's "Holy Roman Empire," Freeman's "Norman Conquest," and Stubbs's "Select Charters." It is, we understand, to be reprinted by the Harpers, with the rest of this series of books. While the "Student's Middle Ages" is peculiarly adapted for general class use (though it omits some notes which would be serviceable, we should think, even for this purpose), for special students and classes Professor Stubbs's selection of "Documents Illustrative of English History" (Macmillan) is without doubt the most admirable provision yet made. It contains a very large number of excerpts from charters, statutes, writs, and other documents, reaching down to the time of Edward I. The introductory sketch of general constitutional history, and that of the several reigns, as well as the numerous brief discussions and explanations—coming as they do from the first authority upon these subjects—would make of themselves a volume of no small value.

—The Paris "Ligue de l'Enseignement" has recently published a report composed by M. Jean Macé, the well-known popular writer. The labors of this body were interrupted by the war, but only to be renewed in a field better prepared for them, if the obvious lesson of the war can only be properly brought home to the French mind. It is the only body we know of that offers to apply to the present ailment of France a remedy, if not efficacious for all things, at least indispensable, urgent, and second to no other. The remarkable feature of the report is the hearty recognition of a kindred organization newly started in Germany, with Schulze-Delitzsch at its head, called "Der Gesellschaft für Verbreitung von Volksbildung"—a sign, by the way, that cultivated Germans are not satisfied with the present state of public instruction, and, even after Sedan, do not find a pretext for inaction in Renan's saying, that it was not the common school but the university which conquered at Sadowa. M. Macé translates the Society's appeal for support, and adds this significant paragraph: "They may do cursing elsewhere who choose. The last word of this report shall be greeting and welcome to the Society founded in Germany, and may its example be a sharp goad to our French association. Let us bear in mind our obligation to maintain creditably our place in the great alliance which is preparing in the bosom of all civilized nations, among all men who have undertaken to fight the common enemy of the human race—ignorance."

—Berlin is getting to be uncomfortable as a great city, not only because its growth has come upon it so suddenly as to find it unprepared, but because, as the capital of the new Empire, it is almost certain to have its rate of growth increased beyond its power to make provision for it. It is now the fourteenth city in the world in population, and, omitting Constantinople, the third in Europe, having distanced both Vienna and St. Petersburg. Eighty years ago, at the time of the French Revolution, while Paris already had 800,000 inhabitants, Berlin had but little over 120,000. The subsequent progress of the latter city has been as follows: in 1817, its population numbered 188,000; in 1831, 230,000; in 1841, 330,000; in 1851, 430,000; in 1861, 547,000; in 1864, 632,000; according to the census of 1867, 702,000. It thus appears that since 1851 the population has increased at a rate that would double it in about twenty-six years; but it is highly probable that it will reach 860,000 some time before 1877, when it may fall little short of a million. The census presently to be taken, in place of that omitted last December on account of the war, will show by how much 800,000 has been exceeded, and what the new order of things in Germany may be expected to do for its chief city. It is noticeable that Berlin has expanded pretty equally on all sides, while the lack of house-room has been seriously felt for the past five years. Its manufactures, which have had an enormous development of late, furnish a steady attraction to the people of the rural districts, and were the accommodations adequate the inward-setting tide would be far greater than it is.

—The Unità Cattolica of Turin has been congratulating its readers and Catholics generally that this year the 15th of August had been celebrated religiously in France for the first time since the fall of Bonaparte. It endeavors to show that this national holyday was instituted by Louis XIII., by royal ordinance of February 10, 1638, in order to place France under the protection of the Virgin; and that the first Napoleon and after him the Third had transformed it into a festival of the dynasty, from which it now happily reverts (by the déchéance of Badinguet) to its original and pious purpose. A correspondent of the Milan Perseveranza, disgusted by this falsification of history, as well as by the coolness with which the part played by the priests themselves in "perverting" the holyday of King Louis is concealed, and struck also by the meanness of abusing Napoleon III. in the hour of his misfortune after having worshipped him for so many years, gives the true history of the festival, with the aid of certain pungent extracts from Count d'Haussonville's "L'Église Romaine et le Premier Empire." The Concordat of 1813 having been ratified August 15, the French bishops were exceedingly desirous of commemorating in a single festival the birth and the marriage of the Emperor. Petitions were easily got up in all the dioceses of France and forwarded to the Minister of Public Worship, asking permission to dedicate chapels to the saint for whom the chief of state had been named. Bishop Osmond, at Nancy, urged the youth of every parish to form pious associations in the name of this great saint; and his success would have been quite gratifying had he not encountered this little difficulty: that he was obliged to mention the saint's name in the service of the day, whereas nobody in Lorraine had ever heard of him. To the everlasting disgrace of Nancy, not a book could the bishop find in all its libraries containing the legend of Saint Napoleon; for even the Roman martyrology made no mention of him. Bishop Osmond then applied to the Minister of Public Worship at Paris, but M. Portalis being equally nonplussed, resort was had to the Cardinal-legate Caprara, Archbishop of Milan, who in turn addressed himself to the Holy See. How the name at last got inserted in the calendar is thus told by the author mentioned above;

"Thanks to the efforts of the indefatigable representative of the sovereign pontiff, there at last appeared at the tail of the decree which instituted the Emperor's festival, on the 15th of August, the legend of the saint thenceforth so dear, but on the very eve so profoundly unknown, to the whole French episcopate. This document, drawn from the martyrologies and from ancient writers, instructed all France, till then completely ignorant of it, that 'under the Emperors Diocletian and Maximian, during the cruel persecution which they decreed against the disciples of Jesus Christ, a considerable number of courageous confessors had suffered martyrdom in the city of Alexandria, in Egypt. Among these was found a Neopolis or Neopolas, a Greek name which, according to the mode of pronunciation introduced into Italy in the Middle Ages, had been gradually transformed into Napoleo, and finally into the Italian Napoleone.'"

—If one sought for evidence of the Italians having recovered their reputation with the rest of Europe, he would find abundance of it in the sensitiveness of the Germans to that respectable (though, as we certainly believe, mistaken) body of opinion south of the Alps which was opposed to them during the late war. The debate is still going on in spite of the marked change of feeling in Italy toward France, and of the triumphant vindication of the German cause by the domestic exposure of its enemies. Possibly the Germans are suffering somewhat just now from the flattery of their self-esteem which was almost inevitable on the part of their friends; and they may occasionally wound the amour propre of other nations by presuming too much on virtues which, after all, are chiefly remarkable in comparison with French defects. The respective morality of different peoples is one of the most difficult facts to establish, and one which requires an amount of experience and a power to discriminate seldom combined. The Kölnische Zeitung and the Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung have lately been treading rather heavily on the corns of the Italians, and have led a leading journal of the peninsula to retort that, whatever may be said of the Italian Parliament as a garrulous, dilatory, and inefficient legislature, or of Italian parties as being no parties at all, but cliques and factions, or of the effects of Catholicism upon the Italian character, this much may be affirmed on the other side: (1) Public morality in Italy is either greater or not less than in any other state in Europe; (2) the social conditions of Italy are not the most but the least spoiled of all European societies; (3) public sentiment in regard to the duties which bind the statesman to his country has been shown to be more rigid in Italy than anywhere else; (4) the morality of the Chamber of Deputies is rather superior than inferior to that of the English Commons, "if by superior morality is understood, as commonly, the removal from business speculations of a greater number of the members who compose it"; (5) no Italian statesman, though unpaid as a deputy, and very much underpaid as a minister, has ever abused his position to enrich himself or for his other advantage, or, if he was poor before, has not remained so; (6) no Italian statesman would, if his house had been burned down, even if it were his only one, have permitted the Assembly, after so many public calamities, to vote him, the first thing, the sum necessary to rebuild it; (7) and finally, the pensioning of the victorious generals which took place in Germany, and seemed just and praiseworthy, would have been rejected in Italy not only by the sentiment of civilians, but by the very persons selected for pensions. Will some American statesman take up this record and determine from it whether the United States or Italy outranks the other in public morality?

LANFREY'S NAPOLEON I.*

THE most characteristic feature of M. Lanfrey's work, striking the reader at almost every page, is his earnest desire to write history and nothing but history. This is to bestow unusual praise upon a French historian, frequently called upon by his subject to pass judgment, not only upon certain prominent individuals, but also upon the people at large. M. Lanfrey, in fact, never avoids an opportunity that offers itself naturally of calling to account the grande nation for what it has sinned in doing and in omitting to do. A deep-rooted and glowing patriotism gives warmth and life to his picture; but his patriotism is not wedded to vanity, and, therefore, it renders him desirous of making his country profit by the lessons taught by its former follies and wickedness. In order to do this, the Frenchman has throughout to be subordinated to the historian, whose opinion upon events which concern the whole civilized world must be based on other elements than merely the interests of his own country. He is not satisfied with pointing out what a worse than worthless compensation for her moral degradation the military glory and boundless conquests of the first Bonaparte have been to France; he condemns with equal severity the wrong committed upon the other nations of Europe by the man who knew "only forces but no principles in politics," and by the people who suffered themselves, with exultation, to be chained, because they could trample the rest of Europe under their feet.

* "The History of Napoleon the First. By P. Lanfrey." Vol. I. London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1871.

The whole book constitutes one continuous lesson, which it would be well for the French to study with all the earnestness they are capable of. And the lesson is rendered the more impressive because it is chiefly conveyed in a simple statement of facts, although the author indulges occasionally somewhat too much in moralizing commentaries which hardly any sound mind stands in need of, inasmuch as the facts speak only too loudly for themselves. It must, however, not be forgotten that M. Lanfrey addresses himself in the first place to the French, and that as to them the lesson has hitherto been preached to deaf ears, or else we should not have witnessed the terrible disasters which France has so lately undergone; in spite of which one cannot cease hoping that sufficient vitality remains in a nation capable of producing historians who remorselessly tear away the last shred of the glittering veils with which the drunken vanity and appalling frivolity of the people are trying to cover the national cancer—historians, on the whole, remarkably successful in finding out the real roots of the evil. A few examples, selected almost at random, will serve to prove that this is not saying too much of M. Lanfrey. Speaking of the character which Bonaparte gave to his first campaign in Italy, he calls it "a crisis at once decisive and fatal for our national character and our political liberties" (p. 89). A few pages further on he says: "They [these details] have the merit of showing how little seriousness there was at this epoch (1796) in a nation whose principal fault has ever been a want of seriousness" (p. 95). On page 105: "In the dispute got up with the Grand-Duke [of Tuscany], as in the 'open quarrel' with Venice, everything was fictitious and imaginary, except our own cupidity." On page 129: "But our very wrongs towards them [the Venetians] were set down as their blame, and became the occasion of new machinations against the Republic."

Notwithstanding the candor and scrupulous conscientiousness with which M. Lanfrey has endeavored to perform his task, there is perceptible throughout his work a strong bias against Bonaparte, with which he entered upon his researches, convinced beforehand that he should find it fully justified. The facts on the whole amply bearing out the presumption, this preconceived bias has gone on slowly but steadily increasing, so that the coloring of the picture is everywhere a shade too deep, and now and then even just reminds one of artificial stage-light. Very likely the actual contemplation of the Second Empire, the worse copy of the bad original, had something to do with that. But be this as it may, the coloring as well as the perspective are just inexact enough to suggest frequently a desire to temper M. Lanfrey's views by comparing them with the statements of other writers, though one never suspects him of the slightest intention to mislead. Unfortunately, the author has done everything to render such a control difficult, for in spite of ample quotations—giving, however, only the title of the book, without mentioning the volume and page where the statement may be found, or the date, in case the quotation is from a letter—he very often neglects to cite his authority, or he adduces such scanty testimony that it cannot be received as sufficient proof. Thus, for instance, speaking of the capture of Toulon, in 1793, he says: "A multitude, struck with despair and beside themselves with terror, rushed to the ships to escape republican vengeance. More than fifteen thousand inhabitants thus abandoned their homes." Now, Lauvergne, in his "Histoire du Département du Var," speaks only of 4,000 who sought refuge on the ships, and we do not know whence M. Lanfrey's statement is derived. This, however—and many similar cases might be cited—is of comparatively little importance. But it is of the greatest interest to be thoroughly informed about the relations between Bonaparte and the Robespierres, and it is certainly not enough to refute the opinions of several of the most eminent historians by mere mention that the Robespierres once called Bonaparte "their man."

The exceptionable consequences of this tendency to present his conclusions in too positive a manner, without furnishing the reader with adequate proofs, are aggravated by an otherwise very praiseworthy desire to be brief. Occasionally it happens that M. Lanfrey falls into both errors of judgment with regard to the same question, and the result is an at least seeming perversion of the historical truth, in striking contrast with the rigid honesty of the author. Thus the reader could not help inferring from M. Lanfrey's representations that Bonaparte had the good-will of Barras to thank almost exclusively for the highly important part he was allowed to play on the 13th Vendémiaire. It is mentioned that Doulcet de Pontécoulant, member of the Committee of Public Safety and the head of the military department, caused Bonaparte to be attached to the Topographical Office; but there is no word of intimation that the young general had, in fact, for three months already been the military oracle of the Committee. It is true, he had incurred the displeasure of Letourneur, Pontécoulant's successor, and his name had been struck off the list of officers in active service, but his influence had attained to such a degree that, in the danger threatening the Convention from the insurrection of the sections, his name could not but occur first to everybody, though Barras—owing to the services rendered by him on the 9th Thermidor—was chosen commander-in chief of the troops in Paris in place of the weak Menou. Barras's proposal that they should give him Bonaparte as his lieutenant, would have appeared in quite another light if M. Lanfrey had devoted a page or two more to Bonaparte's agency in the management of military affairs while he was the adviser of Pontécoulant. These details are, besides, of such importance that they certainly ought not to be omitted in any history of Napoleon. He was the author of the plan to assign, in Spain, the principal part to the western army in Guipuscoa and Biscaya instead of to the eastern army in Catalonia. To this radical change in the plan of the campaign it was due that the French arms were crowned with such success, that the treaty of peace was signed by Barthélemy and Yriarte on the 22d of July. This it was that Bonaparte had been striving for with all his gigantic energy, in order to have the Italian army reinforced, of which he confidently expected soon to take command.

Wherever Bonaparte is not directly and personally concerned, omissions of facts of the highest importance are still more frequent, and sometimes of a really striking character. A whole chapter is devoted to "Campo Formio," but the fourteen secret articles which, in some respects, are undoubtedly the most essential part of the treaty, are merely mentioned in two lines (p. 249). Still more remarkable is it that in the conditions of the preliminaries of Leoben the cession of the limits which had been accorded "by the constitutional laws of the Republic," and the guaranty of "the integrity of the Empire," are entirely left out. M. Lanfrey is usually not slow to point out whenever and wherever Bonaparte has played a double part. How could he fail to perceive the utter incompatibility of these two conditions and the bold and base intentions which prompted Bonaparte to incorporate them into the treaty? He need not even have had recourse to the history of the Congress of Rastadt to have his eyes opened to the glaring and all-important incompatibility of the demand and the promise. The Directory themselves wrote on the 19th of May, 1797: "Le principe est modifié dans les préliminaires mêmes par le consentement qu'ils énoncent à la cession des évêchés de Liége et de Bâle, à celles qui nous ont été faites par des traités, à celles qui résultent des décrets de la Convention Nationale; ce qui nous assurerait Aix-la-Chapelle, Mayence, Worms, Spire et la plus grande partie de ce qui est entre Moselle et Rhin." That is quite correct; but how was it, then, about "the integrity of the Empire"?

Most of the many similar omissions are evidently due to M. Lanfrey's intention to confine himself in his work as strictly as possible to what its title purports to narrate—the history of Napoleon. But he often forgets that full justice cannot be done to such a man if the history of the times be not included in the history of his life to a larger extent than depends on his immediate connection with events. And this again is unquestionably in some degree attributable to the before-mentioned preconceived bias of the author against Napoleon. He is so intently bent upon exposing to the world in utter nakedness the moral worthlessness of the modern Cæsar, that in the hot pursuit of this one object he is not able to fix his eyes with due attention on what is to the right and to the left of his way.

The grasp of his mind is, however, powerful, wide, and philosophical enough to form an estimate of the man as well as of his times which is in the main entirely correct. He pretends that there is nothing enigmatical in either, and that he understands them both, and the conclusion he has come to about the relation between the man and the times is summed up in these words: "From his character and his ideas, and especially from the aim he had in view, Napoleon seems to belong to another age. Again, the more closely we study his life, the more plainly we shall see that the only part of his work which has survived him is precisely that which he borrowed from the genius of his time. The rest is purely phenomenal." To this purely phenomenal remainder the author has done the fullest justice. He readily and amply pays his tribute to the extraordinary genius of the man, though the book does not bear him out in the assertion: "I feel myself free alike from the prepossessions of hatred and the superstition of enthusiasm."

The principal charge which must be brought against the author is, perhaps, his failure to consult the German writers of note on this period. In our age, no real scholar can be dispensed with reading all the principal works extant on the subject of which he is going to treat, no matter in what language they are written. The French historians, like most other French scholars, are very slow to learn that they cannot be allowed to form an exception to the general rule. When they have made up their minds to learn other languages, and to make good use of their knowledge, they will be quite astonished to see how many German authors have written several of the most momentous chapters in the history of France with an impartiality and a thoroughness to which they themselves attained only many years later. If M. Lanfrey could not himself consult the archives in Berlin and Vienna—the latter, by the way, are likely to give us some day, when they have been unreservedly opened to the student, a much deeper insight into several of Bonaparte's transactions than we at present have—he ought, at least, to have informed himself about what others have dug out from their hidden treasures. Had he done that, he would not have been guilty of many of the omissions above alluded to, for many events, the importance of which he has completely failed to perceive, would have appeared to him in quite a new light. And, besides, he would not have supposed himself presenting a novel view of certain events when, in fact, he but restates what was amply proved by others long ago. Any man conversant with German historical literature, for instance, will hardly be able to suppress a smile on reading such a statement as this: "The reprisal which his (Bonaparte's) policy provoked on the part of Venice has always (!) been made to appear as the principle and motive of his conduct, instead of being merely its consequence. The preliminaries of Leoben, for example, have always (!) appeared to have been prepared and justified by the pâques véronaises, whereas in reality Bonaparte had fully made up his mind to sacrifice the Venetian states long before he had the shadow of complaint against the Venetian seigniory" (p. 184).

MILLER'S "SONGS OF THE SIERRAS."*

THE best poem in Mr. Miller's small volume is the first one, which bears the title of "Arizonian." The hero of it is a miner, perhaps a miner in Arizona, who comes from his gold-hunting back into civilization, where he meets a "squire," who apparently gives him a night's lodging, and to whom, in the morning, he tells his story. Long ago, twenty years ago or more, he had fallen in love with a girl who would not, or could not, marry him till he had made his fortune, and sent him away to seek it. In the mining country he found an Indian girl whom he made his mistress, and lived with long. But one day he tells her of his earlier love, and on her speaking somewhat in scorn of that personage, he being out of temper with her and himself, because the last few days have been worse than usual in the yield of gold, tells her that his first love is far dearer to him than she. Upon this she walks out of the cabin to the river, to drown herself perhaps, perhaps only to let herself be drowned. He watches her, and as he watches he sees that one of the sudden and tremendous storms of that region has come up during his quarrel with the girl, and is on the point to break, and that in a moment the river gorge will be flooded with a resistless torrent. She, he knows, has an Indian's eye for the signs of change in the sky; still as the blackness descends, he shouts to her in warning, and calls her to come back. It is too late, however; and in the morning he finds her body far down the stream. It is suggested rather than said by the poet that this crazes the gold-hunter, if indeed we may not say that there is a suggestion of his having always been touched with madness. He gathers up his gold after he has buried the dead girl, and turns his face to the east, with the determination of finding the girl whom he had first loved, and with the insane expectation of finding her just as she was when he left her, the same hair, and cheeks, and eyes. At the same time that he pictures her unchanged in face, he is aware, too, that for twenty years, which he imagines her to have found long and full of sorrow, she has been awaiting his return to her. Arrived at the village, he sees her, and eagerly accosts her as she is drawing water in the square, and calls her by her name. Then he learns that it is her daughter that he sees, and not she, and, learning it, he returns despairing to the gold country. It is on his way thither that he meets the "squire" of the poem. There is something in Mr. Miller's way of telling this story that is really good. He manages the principal personage very well, letting him reveal very naturally, as he relates the events, and in the very necessity that he feels to narrate them, his madness, and his crime, and his consciousness of guilt, and his anxiety to persuade himself and others that he did not commit any crime, and is not to be blamed for cruel treatment of the Indian girl, and for conniving at her death, and letting her go to it because he had tired of her, and had come to hate her. It is the man himself who reveals all this, and not Mr. Miller who relates it, and the poet herein shows good dramatic power. It is a well-conceived poem.

It is well conceived, and, also, some of the details are successful. When the girl, in her passion of jealousy and her sure perception that her lover's heart is no longer hers, that she is alone, desolate, goes down to the water, she sees of a sudden the very embodiment of his falsity, and feels the savage impulse of revenge and the instinctive prompting of just hatred. She gratifies it too:

> "Then a great green snake slid into the river,
> Glistening, green, and with eyes of fire;
> Quick, double-handed she seized a boulder,
> And cast it with all the fury of passion,
> As with lifted head it went curving across,
> Swift darting its tongue like a fierce desire,
> Curving and curving, lifting higher and higher,
> Bent and beautiful as a river moss;
> Then, smitten, it turned, bent, broken and doubled,
> And lick'd, red-tongued, like a forked fire,
> And sank, and the troubled waters bubbled,
> And then swept on in their old swift fashion."

The passage strikes us as worthy of respect for its imaginatively-used realism. For its surface Swinburnism, and the "boulder," and two or three other matters, we have nothing to say. Indeed, we confess our opinion that it is easier to say too much for such things than too much against them, and hold that in the rare cases where such offences are accompanied by anything good, there is apt to be too much mercy for the offender. Having made a good poem gives one surely the poorest of titles to spoil it or deface it. But faulty as it is, there seems to us, in the passage we have quoted, as well as in the poem from which we take it, something excellent.

We cannot say as much for the rest of the volume. Bitterly bad, indeed, is what it is necessary to call it if one would be accurately descriptive, for the other poems have all the faults of "Arizonian," and none, or next to none, of its merits, and have besides abundant faults of their own; and are not only, as poems, sad affairs, but, as giving distinct and strong indications of the moral notions and the taste and the power of thought which Mr. Miller bring to his works—as revealing his admirations and his aspirations, they should be sufficiently discouraging to his friends. Unless, indeed, Mr. Miller is very young; and has a long time to live. It is late now for any one, already of mature years, who is to do anything of value, to be taking for his exemplar—we were going to say Byron; it is truer, however, to say that Mr. Miller's exemplar is that half-Byron which Byron used to put into his Lauras and Manfreds, and which even he himself, and when he was not so very old either, had begun to turn upon; as may be seen in the "Don Juan"—a poem which for that reason may be called moral with as much correctness, on the whole, as is shown in stigmatizing it for immorality. "The pageant of his bleeding heart" Byron had some excuse for displaying, for, in the first place, it was something of a heart, and, in the next place, there can be no doubt that, tumultuous as it was, and uncomprehensive as was the brain which accompanied it, both were representative, and throbbed in unison with their age, which was in revolt, and which found in Byron's poetry a harmonious voice for its discord. The individual in revolt, however, can hardly expect much grace or sufferance if his rebellion is real, nor much disposition on the part of his acquaintances to believe it real. To talk as in this following passage, for example, is now forbidden, and equally forbidden whether one feels so, or only pretends to feel so. Good manners, if nothing else, require of young Ercles a decent self-restraint. Ercles in this case is a young man named Don Carlos, who is in love with a young lady called Ina; or rather he is a young man with whom Ina is in love, and who no longer loves Ina. On the contrary, he hates her, and all her sex because of her, and has taken to the woods and mountains, and the society of rough and melancholy men. Ina wished to marry him, but he had no money, and she therefore decided that he must wait and be her second husband, she meanwhile marrying a very rich, aged man, and securing the estate for Don Carlos's future use. He is very much offended, not at the lady's business-like turn of mind, and her notions of business morality, but at her not taking him as he stood, and, as we have said, goes into the mountains among the rough hunters, and there with them he rails at women, and expresses his wild individuality, in language like this that follows. He wishes to get "fame":

* "Songs of the Sierras. By Joaquin Miller." Boston: Roberts Brothers.

"LAMONTE.

But would you dare the curse of man and—

DON CARLOS.

Dare!
I'd dare the curses of the sceptred kings!
I'd build a pyramid of the whitest skulls,
And step therefrom unto the spotted moon,
And thence to stars, thence to the central suns;
Then with one grand and mighty leap would land
Unhinder'd on the shores of the gods of old,
And, sword in hand, unbared and unabash'd,
Would stand forth in the presence of the God
Of gods; there, on the jewêll'd inner-side
The walls of heaven, carve with a Damascus
Steel, highest up, a grand and titled name
That time nor tide could touch or tarnish ever.
Yea, anything on earth, in hell, or heaven,
Rather than lie a nameless clod forgot,
Letting stern Time in triumph forward tramp
Above my tombless and neglected dust."

The last lines have much the sound of the drunkenest drama of the time of Greene and Nash, but the whole passage and the whole poem are equally bad, though most of it is more distinctively puerile and less bedlamite than these particular lines.

The author's style and versification are almost everywhere as faulty as here, and faulty with the same faults. Fustian in diction, an innocence of metrical art, and a child's or barbarian's delight in staring ornamentation and tricks of cheap conjuring, are its principal marks. And his incidents are apt to be as melodramatic as in this "Ina," and, we suspect, as false to the facts of the life he deals with, and as faithful to a very unformed and vulgar taste. What, for instance, are we to say to the taste, and what are we to think of the nature of the man who takes such a person as Kit Carson—perfectly well known as a man of great simplicity, modesty, steadfastness, and courage—and makes him leave the woman he loved to burn to death in a prairie on fire, while he escaped on her horse? Most people will here imagine that the poet can have little in common with the old pioneer if this is the best he can do in the way of describing him, and that we are to wait a while yet for the man who is to sing truly and worthily, not of the "serapes," and "sombreros," and "gold-mounted revolvers" of the Rocky Mountains, but of the men who inhabit there. Throughout the book, indeed, there is a tone which gives one the thought that a little less noise about various good things in the manly character would be reassuring.

It is the "sombreros," and "serapes," and "gulches," we suppose, and the other Californian and Arizonian properties, which have caused our English friends to find in Mr. Miller a truly American poet. He is Mr. William Rossetti's latest discovery. We trust, however, that we have no monopoly of ignorance, and presumption, and taste for Byronism. In other climes, also, there have been Firmilians, and men need not be born in California to have the will in excess of the understanding, and the understanding ill-informed. There are people of all nationalities whom a pinch more brains and a trifle more of diffidence would not hurt.

SOME POPULARIZED SCIENCE.*

MR. PROCTOR and Professor Tyndall occupy a somewhat peculiar attitude toward the world of culture. They represent that small but increasing class of strictly scientific men who, not content with being scientific, aim also to be popular writers and teachers—"to extend sympathy for science beyond the limits of the scientific public." With many of the most conservative men of science, in England and elsewhere, this attempt finds no very cordial favor. It must be admitted, indeed, that there is a certain degree of incompatibility between the principa aims which Messrs. Tyndall and Proctor have in view. The force which they devote to popularizing science, to illustrating its obscure and to simplifying its complex enquiries for the benefit of untrained minds, must be in part withdrawn from the points of attack to which the strict investigator professes to confine his attention. Their own accepted doctrine of the conversion of forces will apprise them that they can gain popularity and produce an immediate effect only by some diversion, even though it be the slightest, of energies which might otherwise be given to original enquiry. The dilemma suggests a not dissimilar alternative in morals. It would seem as if the doctrine of the conversion of forces had been intimated in the Scriptural warning that one "cannot serve God and Mammon"—a warning which not only scientific but literary conservatives, the "violent illiberals," of whom John Ruskin claims to be one—would be pleased to apply to these gentlemen who serve both science and the patrons of the circulating libraries. And it is the fact that the most devoted and successful investigators of nature have found, as they probably always will find, that he who creates the most in science will have the least time to spend in popularizing science. Mr. Darwin's later writings may seem at first to imply an exception to this rule. But until his dicusssion of "The Descent of Man" appeared, he had not produced a single popular book, and his great work upon "The Origin of Species," a work which contains the text and substance of his entire speculations, is one that has had a scientific rather than a popular audience. Not more than one in ten, we are convinced, of those who have become intelligently interested in the views which it presented, have read the book itself. It is through the means of the countless volumes of criticism, commentary, and popular science consequent upon its publication, that his mastering thought has become so widely known. The tradition still holds that the scientific worker should be something of a recluse, and that he who discovers should leave to others the work of explaining his discoveries to the public.

From this point of view, it is not surprising that many men of science should look somewhat superciliously upon those lively gentlemen who, for a consideration, detail the latest discoveries of science in the daily newspapers, or display the darkness of cosmical space to an admiring audience of cockneys in the lecture-room. The rigid scientist dislikes to have the mysteries of physical investigation made a "drawing" sensation. We do not know how to describe his feeling otherwise than paradoxically, by calling it a reasonable prejudice. It is surely not quite unreasonable that he should regard the lecturer or essayist who promptly converts his latest scientific investigation into fame and money as offending somewhat against the dignity of the scientific spirit. This conviction the rigid scientist does not fail to express with an energy proportionate to his sensitiveness and to his pugnacity. In consequence, the scientific man who transgresses the scientific prescription in seeking popularity rather than fame, requires to be a person of somewhat aggressive temperament. Like Messrs. Tyndall and Proctor, he must be capable of maintaining a controversy. For there is nearly as much difference among scientific men respecting scientific orthodoxy as there is respecting religious orthodoxy among the theologians. The scientific man finds, indeed, his first enemy in the ignorant or bigoted man. But he finds an enemy hardly less dear in his scientific brother.

Of these rancors little flavor is evident in the volumes before us. Neither author is lacking in pugnacity; but Prof. Tyndall tells us that in preparing for publication the papers which make up the present volume he "has endeavored to exclude everything that could cause needless irritation." Mr. Proctor is a born combatant, as readers of his communications published in Nature and in the scientific periodicals know; and he has perhaps even less respect for the formalities of science and of theology than Prof. Tyndall has; yet he has given us a volume temperate in tone. He is unpleasing only when—as is sometimes the case with Prof. Tyndall—he becomes, we might say, painfully and unnecessarily clear. It is almost a relief to find an occasional shade of obscurity in his explanations.

There is no lack of boldness in the expression of either writer. Prof. Tyndall tells us that the essence of the hypothesis of natural evolution is "that not alone the exquisite and wonderful mechanism of the human body, but that the human mind itself—emotion, intellect, will, and all their phenomena—were once latent in a fiery cloud"; and intimates that "at the present moment all our philosophy, all our poetry, all our science, and all our art—Plato, Shakespeare, Newton, and Raphael—are potential in the fires of the sun. . . . . Let us steady ourselves in front of the hypothesis, and, dismissing all terror and excitement from our minds, let us look firmly into it with the hard, sharp eye of intellect alone. . . .

* "Light Science for Leisure Hours: A Series of Familiar Essays on Scientific Subjects. By Richard A. Proctor, B.A. (Camb., F.R.A.S." 12mo, pp. 343. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

"Fragments of Science for Unscientific People: A Series of Detached Essays, Lectures, and Reviews. By John Tyndall, LL.D., F.R.S." 12mo, pp. 422. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

Let us hearken to those who wisely support it, and to those who wisely oppose it; and let us tolerate those, and they are many, who foolishly try to do either of those things. The only thing out of place is dogmatism on either side."

In this commendable spirit is the light science of the present volumes treated. This spirit, and the thorough work that forms their substance, are a sufficient answer, we think, to that conservatism prevalent in scientific circles, of which we have endeavored to explain the attitude. Mr. Proctor and Prof. Tyndall are no triflers; they are men of large scientific ability and attainment. That they possess, in addition to those endowments, the ability to please popular audiences, is not a sufficient ground for the somewhat petulant criticism that has been directed against them in British scientific circles. Happily, we can enjoy these volumes without disturbance by the susurrus of hypercritical discontent which is not inaudible in those circles.

Prof. Tyndall's book is based upon two controlling ideas. The first is, that science is destined to furnish the mastering forces of modern intellectual life. The second is an idea that is rather intimated than expressed—that theological prepossessions must eventually give way to the progress of scientific thought. But Prof. Tyndall does not conceal his antagonism to that teaching which assigns the second place, either in authority or in dignity, to science. The sentiment of this antagonism is ever present in his writings; while it is courteously expressed, and will be likely to repel only those who decline argument upon the tendencies of modern science, Prof. Tyndall enters upon discussions which, however they may be related to science, would seem out of keeping among scientific essays from any other pen than his own. He gives us "Thoughts on Prayer and on Natural Law," and on "Miracles and Special Providences," and while he makes their discussions interesting, he succeeds in treating them in an uncontroversial tone. The most important lectures in this volume, however, are those on the "Scientific Use of the Imagination," on "Dust and Disease," and on the "Structure and Light of the Sky." Prof. Tyndall's themes are in general those of near interest; he prefers to deal with visible dust and sky rather than with remote phenomena, though many of these are discussed in the present volume. It need hardly be said that he brings new observation and new thought to whatever subject he treats. In the lecture upon "Dust and Disease" we notice a shortcoming that is rare in Prof. Tyndall's writings—a limited acquaintance with previous investigation in the given line of enquiry. The speculations here advanced in relation to the origin of disease in microscopic germs borne by the atmosphere have been familiar for years to medical science.

The lecture upon the "Scientific Use of the Imagination," delivered a year ago at Liverpool, has called forth some unfavorable comment in British scientific journals. We think that the central idea of the discourse has hardly been appreciated at its proper value. That beyond all processes of induction in scientific discovery there is a power of insight which finally discloses the new fact; and that this power bears a higher value, as a factor in the mental equipment of the investigator, than scientific men of the inductive school are generally willing to admit, is the proposition for which Professor Tyndall, we think justly, contends. This philosophy of discovery, as reversionary in its character, and seeming to threaten a return to the vague and speculative methods of pre-scientific times, is one that is especially unacceptable to the English followers of the Baconian method. Yet, in this age of re-statements, this view, which is entertained with more confidence by the German than by the British mind, seems to be pretty well established as a correction to the inductive theory. There is little danger, now that the habit of toilsome induction is established among investigators, that valuable minds will be misled into the by-ways of a too exclusively deductive method.

Mr. Proctor's book is composed of articles shorter and more miscellaneous in character than those that make up Professor Tyndall's. They are reprinted from London magazines and newspapers, and are well written in point of style. Both of these works are thoroughly well adapted to their purpose of making science entertaining.

An Illustrated Natural History of British Butterflies. By Edward Newman. 8vo, pp. 175.—An Illustrated Natural History of British Moths. By Edward Newman. 8vo, pp. 486. (London: Wm. Tweedie. 1869.)—These two works, by a veteran in British entomology, are, in their typography, illustrations, and literary style, admirably adapted for a popular history of British butterflies and moths. The volume on butterflies is complete, while the second volume (on moths) comprises only the larger species; the minute forms belonging to the snout moths, the leaf rolling species, and the tineids, numbering as many as the larger moths, are not described. Each species mentioned, however, is well figured on wood, and, in many cases, cuts are given of the under side of the insect, or of rare varieties. The great value of these books, however, consists in the life-histories or accounts of the metamorphoses of these interesting insects, with full descriptions, drawn from nature, of the caterpillars, but few being copied from other works. On this account they will, for many years to come, be of especial value to the American student, even far advanced in the study of the lepidoptera. But, even for the beginner in the study of insects, for the boy of fifteen, with a fondness for beasts and flowers in general, in whom we wish to inspire an absorbing love of a special branch of natural history to occupy his summer vacations, and fill up his winter evenings, we know of no better books. Were there more figures of the caterpillars, especially of the moths, of which there is not one drawn, our opinion of these works would be still more favorable. The introductory remarks on the anatomy and metamorphosis of lepidoptera, the modes of obtaining and rearing caterpillars, and other matters of interest to the beginner, are clear and attractive in their style, and will afford pleasant reading to any one. We might criticise some points of expression, and occasionally find fault with the anatomical portion of the work, some of which the student who advances beyond the information here afforded will have to unlearn, but the general excellence disarms criticism.

The Young Mechanic. Containing directions for the use of all kinds of tools, and for the construction of steam-engines and mechanical models, including the art of turning in wood and metal. By the Author of "The Lathe and its Uses." From the English edition, with corrections, etc. (New York: G. P. Putnam & Sons.)—The explicitness of the title precludes the necessity of our saying more of this little book than that it does not fall behind its pretensions, and that it may be recommended without reserve to parents whose children show aptitude for mechanics. Its directions are simple and perspicuous, by one who evidently knows how to do what he describes; and, if careful adherence to them could be ensured, it is probable that a much greater number of boyish experiments in carpentry and joinery would bear fruit and determine future training than now do for want of just this discipline. There is one article of Rousseau's system of education which has never been and is never likely to be impugned, and that is, that every child should be taught a trade, in the English sense of a manual art. In these days, when everybody is eager to abandon the patient and laborious (often inherited) ways to competence or a decent livelihood in favor of speculative pursuits, it becomes a duty to the young to make them not only (like Émile) independent and superior to reverses, but superior to the omnipresent temptations to be superficial, dishonest, and money-making. An apprenticeship at the bench and at the lathe will do more than preaching to render them so.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Beard (Dr. G. M.), Stimulants and Narcotics, swd.	(G. P. Putnam & Sons) $1 50
Behind the Veil; a Tale, swd.	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 75
Biographical Sketch of Mother Margaret Mary Hallahan	(Cath. Pub. Society)
Brightly (F. C.), Leading Cases on the Law of Elections	(Kay & Bro.)
Brockett (Dr. L. P.), Paris Under the Commune, swd.	(H. S. Goodspeed & Co.) 75
Celebration of the 150th Anniversary of Leicester, Mass., swd.	(Cambridge)
Cocke (W. A.), Common and Civil Law Practice in U. S. Courts	(Baker, Voorhis & Co.) 4 00
Cook (F. C.), The Holy Bible [and Speaker's Commentary], Vol I., Part I., Genesis—Exodus	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Fitch (Rev. E. T.), Sermons Preached at Yale College	(Judd & White)
Hale (Rev. E. E.), How to Do It	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 50
Hay (J.), Castilian Days	" " 2 00
Higginson (T. W.), Atlantic Essays	" " 2 00
Hodge (Rev. C.), Systematic Theology	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Hudson (Rev. H. N.), Plays of Shakespeare, for the Use of Schools	(Ginn Brothers) 2 50
Illustrirte Kriegs-Chronik, Parts 23 and 24, swd.	(B. Westermann & Co.)
Leighton (J.), Paris Under the Commune	(Scribner, Welford & Co.)
Lossing (B. J.), History of England	(G. P. Putnam & Sons) 2 50
Löwenthal (Dr. E. J.), Die Bedeutung des Deutsch-Französischen Krieges, swd.	(L. W. Schmidt)
Lever (C.), Con Cregan, swd.	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 75
Miller (C. H.), Songs of the Sierras	(Roberts Bros.) 1 50
Morgan (L. H.), Systems of Consanguinity and Affinity of the Human Family	(Smithsonian Institution)
Monteith (A. H.), French, German, etc., without a Master.	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 2 00
Moore (Mrs. J. F.), Losses and Gains; a Tale	(Henry Hoyt)
Muloch (D. M.), Agatha's Husband	(Harper & Bros.) 1 50
Palgrave (F. T.), Life of Sir Walter Scott	(Porter & Coates)
Perch (P.), Dukesborough Tales	(Turnbull Brothers) 1 50
Ram (J.), Science of Legal Judgment	(Baker, Voorhis & Co.) 5 00
Reynolds (G. W. M.), Mysteries of the Court of London, swd.	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 00
Richardson (Mrs. A. S.), Stories from Old English Poetry	(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50
Sand (Mme.) A Rolling Stone, swd.	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 50
Stoddard (R. H.), The Book of the East, and Other Poems	" " 1 50
Stephens (Mrs. A. S.), Palaces and Prisons	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 50
The Clyffards of Clyffe: a Tale	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
The Member from Paris: a Tale	(J. R. Osgood & Co.) 1 25
Washburn (Prof. E.), Lectures on the Study and Practice of the Law	(Little, Brown & Co.)
Watertown (G.) Hibernia: Showing How Pat Rules America.	(American News Co.) 50
Weeks (Mrs. H. C.), Four, and What They Did	(Hurd & Houghton)

NOW READY.

A COMPANION WORK TO PERCY'S RELIQUES. Privately Reprinted on superior ribbed paper, in the Modern Antique Style, with the whole of the forty-five very curious Plates, in beautiful facsimile.

A COLLECTION OF

OLD BALLADS,

Corrected from the Best and Most Ancient Copies.

WITH INTRODUCTION,

Historical, Critical, or Humorous. Illustrated with Copperplates.

1723—5.

The extreme rarity of this work has led to the present undertaking as a means of bringing these most interesting and coveted volumes within the reach of the curious and the antiquarian.

The demand for them is so much greater than the supply that copies, when sold by public auction, realize from 10 to 12 guineas.

If any portion of our literature be more generally interesting than another, it is "Ancient Ballad Lore." How many events, historical and domestic, do we owe the knowledge of to this source! Battles have been fought and heroes immortalized in its expressive and inspiring strains; and the sports, pastimes, manners, customs, and traditions of our forefathers have received from it some of their most important and curious illustrations. Scholars, critics, and antiquaries have rendered good service to literature by snatching from oblivion those precious relics of legendary poetry which would have been lost to posterity but for their well-directed labors of love. They have made us familiar with the thoughts, sympathies, and language of our ancestors. We follow them to the tournament, the border foray, the public hostelrie, and the domestic hearth. We glow with their martial spirit and revel in their rude festivities!

250 copies, small 8vo.....$10 00
50 copies on Large Paper, to range with Bp. Percy's Ballads, at 18 00

Orders received by

J. W. BOUTON,

706 Broadway, New York.

REID'S CRUIKSHANK CATALOGUE.

Only 61 copies left of those allotted to America or otherwise.

DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF THE WORKS OF GEORGE CRUIKSHANK,

Etchings, Woodcuts, Lithographs, and Glyphographs. With a list of books illustrated by him. Compiled for the collections of Mr. Thomas Morson, Mr. Edmund S. Maskelyne, and Mr. Edwin Truman. By George W. Reid, Keeper of the Prints and Drawings in the British Museum. With an Essay on his Genius and Works by Edward Bell, M.A., and 313 Illustrations. 3 vols. 4to, large paper, India proof Impression of the Plates, half-morocco, gilt top, $110. The same, 3 vols. 4to, small paper, $90.

ALSO, A FEW COPIES OF

MR. CRUIKSHANK'S LATEST PRODUCTIONS:

I.

THE DEMON OF THE BLOOD-RED REpublic (i.e., Commune); or, The Infernal Fiend. Designed and Etched by Geo. Cruikshank. Printed on a folio sheet, colored, 75 cents.
One of the most vigorous and characteristic efforts of this celebrated artist.

II.

CHRISTIAN PASSING THROUGH THE Valley of the Shadow of Death. Oblong 4to sheet, colored, $1 50; plain impression, $1.

Imported and for sale by

J. W. BOUTON, 706 Broadway, N. Y.

AMERICANA. A Catalogue of a Recent Importation of Rare Books on American History may be had on application to

GEORGE TAWSE, Bookseller,
2 Dey Street, New York.

Immediately, in One Volume 8vo, pp. 406.

HISTORICAL ESSAYS.

BY EDWARD A. FREEMAN, M.A.,

Hon. D.C.L., late Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford.

CONTENTS:

The Mythical and Romantic Elements in Early English History.
The Continuity of English History.
The Relations between the Crowns of England and Scotland.
St. Thomas of Canterbury and His Biographers.
The Life of Edward the Third.
The Holy Roman Empire.
The Franks and the Gauls.
The Early Sieges of Paris.
Frederick the First, King of Italy.
The Emperor Frederick the Second.
Charles the Bold.
Presidential Government.

NOW READY.

THE HISTORY OF NAPOLEON THE FIRST.

BY P. LANFREY.

Vol. 1, 8vo, cloth, $3 50.

"One of the most striking pieces of historical composition of which France, rich as she is in that order, has its boast. Assuredly, M. Lanfrey's book is important not merely for the illustration which it supplies of pure theories of government, but for the light which it throws on the character of what is in so many ways, even now in its hour of confusion, the most important power in Modern Europe."—Pall Mall Gazette.

MACMILLAN & CO.,

38 Bleecker Street, New York.

NOW READY:

THE CATHOLIC WORLD,

FOR OCTOBER.

CONTENTS:

I. CHRISTIANITY AND POSITIVISM.
II. EVENING CLOUDS.
III. THE HOUSE OF YORKE. CHAP. XIV.
IV. A CONVERT.
V. THE LIQUEFACTION OF THE BLOOD OF ST. JANUARIUS.
VI. LUCAS GARCIA.
VII. EGYPTIAN CIVILIZATION ACCORDING TO THE MOST RECENT DISCOVERIES.
VIII. A WEEK AT LAKE GEORGE.
IX. THE ELEMENTS OF OUR NATIONALITY.
X. OUR LADY OF LOURDES.
XI. THE RIOT OF THE TWELFTH.
XII. THE PLACE VENDOME AND LA ROQUETTE.
XIII. NEW PUBLICATIONS, ETC.

Single Copies, 50 cents; $5 per year. For sale by all Newsdealers.

THE CATHOLIC PUBLICATION SOCIETY

(LAWRENCE KEHOE, Gen. Agent),

9 Warren Street, New York.

GINN BROTHERS,

PUBLISHERS,

3 Beacon Street, Boston.

ALLEN'S LATIN GRAMMAR. Prepared by W. F. and J. H. Allen. 12mo. 148 pages, with Index. $1 25.
Recommended by Harvard College as indicating the amount required for admission.
ALLEN'S LATIN LESSONS. 12mo. 134 pages. $1 25.
ALLEN'S LATIN READER. 12mo. 518 pages. $2 50.
ALLEN'S LATIN PRIMER. $1 25.
ALLEN'S LATIN COMPOSITION. By F. W. Allen. 107 pages. $1 25.
CRAIK'S ENGLISH OF SHAKESPEARE. Illustrated. $1 75.
GOODWIN'S GREEK GRAMMAR. By William W. Goodwin, Ph.D., Eliot Professor of Greek Literature in Harvard University. $1 50.
GOODWIN'S GREEK READER. Consisting of Extracts from Xenophon, Plato, Herodotus, and Thucydides; being a full equivalent for the seven books of the Anabasis, now required for admission at Harvard. With Maps, Notes, References to Goodwin's Greek Grammar, and Parallel References to Crosby's and Hadley's Grammars. Edited by Professor W. W. Goodwin of Harvard College, and J. H. Allen, Cambridge. $2.
HUDSON'S SCHOOL SHAKESPEARE. Containing "As You Like It," "The two parts of Henry IV." "The Merchant of Venice," "Julius Cæsar," "Twelfth Night," "Hamlet," selected and prepared for use in Schools, Clubs, Classes, and Families. With Introductions and Notes. By Rev. Henry N. Hudson. $2 50.
HUDSON'S SCHOOL SHAKESPEARE. (2d Series.) Containing "The Tempest," "King Richard the Third." "The Winter's Tale," "King Lear," "King Henry the Fifth," "Macbeth," "Antony and Cleopatra." $2 50.
LEIGHTON'S GREEK LESSONS. Prepared to accompany Goodwin's Greek Grammar. By R. F. Leighton, Master of Melrose High School. $1 25.
MADVIG'S LATIN GRAMMAR. $3.
OUR WORLD; or, First Lessons in Geography. 94 cents.
THE LATIN VERB. By C. H. Parkhurst. 50 cents.

IN PRESS.

SHAKESPEARE; His Life, Art, and Characters. With a Historical Sketch of the Origin and Growth of the Drama in England. By H. N. Hudson.

MESSRS. GEO. ROUTLEDGE & SONS

HAVE NOW READY

New Editions of

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL'S WORKS.

I.

THE REIGN OF LAW.

Essays on Divine Government. By the

DUKE OF ARGYLL.

With Numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.

"This is a very great book; great because, while treating of the most profound subject of human thought, it can be read with comfort by those whom Mr. Lincoln called plain people."—The Round Table.

II.

PRIMEVAL MAN.

An Examination of some Recent Speculations.

BY THE DUKE OF ARGYLL.

16mo, cloth, $1 50.

"This volume is perhaps the most clear, graceful, pointed, and precise piece of ethical reasoning published for a quarter of a century. The book is worthy a place in every library as skilfully popularizing science, and yet sacrificing nothing either of its dignity or of its usefulness."—London Nonconformist.

For sale by all booksellers, or will be mailed, post-paid, on receipt of price, by the Publishers,

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

416 Broome Street, New York.

NEW EDITION OF

AUDUBON'S BIRDS AND QUADRUPEDS OF AMERICA,

Now publishing in Monthly Volumes, at $20 a volume, in Library Binding.

These magnificent works have always been and are now acknowledged standards on all questions relating to the Birds and Animals of this country, and should form a part of every valuable public and private library. They will ever remain monuments to the energy and ability of their author.

The plates are all carefully colored by hand, from copies given by Audubon himself, and by some of the same artists who originally colored them under his direction.

These drawings are interspersed through the volumes in their appropriate places, and represent upward of 1,400 birds and animals in action, together with the plants and trees most frequented by them.

Circulars giving further information on application.

Competent agents wanted to canvass for the books.

Published by

GEORGE R. LOCKWOOD,

812 Broadway, New York.

NEW YORK CHURCH BOOK STORE.

THE PSALTER AND CANTICLES; Pointed for Singing, according to the use of Trinity Parish, New York. 18mo, paper boards, 30 cents; or in cloth boards, sprinkled edges, 40 cents.

THE INCARNATION AND PRINCIPLES OF Evidence. A Theological Essay. By Richard Holt Hutton, M.A., with an Introduction by Samuel Osgood, D D. 18mo, cloth, 60 cents.

COMFORTING THOUGHTS FOR THE WEAK and Weary. Brief Meditations on Passages of Scripture, selected from the Works of the Rev. Edward Bickersteth. 12mo, cloth, extra, $1 25.

THE DAY OF TROUBLE. Plain Words for the Suffering and Sorrowful. Selected from the Writings of the Rev. W. B. Mackenzie. 12mo, cloth, extra, $1 25.

EIGHT YEARS' EXPERIENCE OF MOthers' Meetings. By Mrs. Goodwin Hatchard. 12mo, red edges, $1 50.

THE INTROIT-PSALMS FOR SUNDAYS and Holy Days, as Prescribed by the First Prayer Book of Edward Sixth. Set to Original Chants for Congregational Use. By J. H. Cornell. Small 4to, cloth, $1 50.

NEW BOOKS

FOR

SUNDAY-SCHOOL LIBRARIES, ETC.

THE RAINBOW STORIES: For Summer Days and Winter Nights. $1 50.

SHORT CHAPTERS ON NATURAL HISTory. 75 cents.

THE DAY-STAR: or, A Gospel Story for the Little Ones. Illustrated. $1 25.

CARRIE WILLIAMS AND HER SCHOLARS. $1.

EMILY MILLMAN. The Little Sunbeam of the Farm House. $1.

THE HAPPY VILLAGE, and How it Became so. $1.

IN THE PRESS.

BY MRS. MARSHALL.

Millicent Leigh. Brothers and Sisters.
Helen's Diary. Old Gateway.
Violet Douglass. Hetty's Resolve.

POTT, YOUNG & CO.

(LATE POTT & AMERY),

Cooper Union, Fourth Avenue, New York.

CRITICAL AND SOCIAL ESSAYS. Reprinted from THE NATION, and in some measure supplying the place of the first two volumes of the paper, now somewhat scarce. Price $1 50. Address, Publisher of THE NATION, Box 6732, N. Y.

BOOK-BUYERS.

Send for Catalogue of INTERESTING, USEFUL, and SCARCE BOOKS added to the Stock in hand of

FRANCIS EMMINS,

80 Nassau Street, New York.

PRIVATE SECRETARYSHIP, or similar employment, wanted by a young man of intellectual ability and liberal education; a good linguist, and also fair stenographer; no objection to leaving New York or travelling; can give good references. Address A. S., P. O. Box 1,722, N. Y.

AN EDUCATED GENTLEMAN, of pleasing address and successful experience, desires a position as agent for some first-class publishing house. He is prepared to introduce works to public assemblies, and has a peculiar faculty for interesting children. He expects a fair salary, with liberal percentage on extraordinary sales, and is willing to make a trial engagement for the month of October. Address

ROLLIN STONE,

Office of The Nation.

HURD & HOUGHTON,

13 ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK,

THE RIVERSIDE PRESS, CAMBRIDGE,

Will publish on Saturday. September 23,

THE CLOCKMAKER: Sayings and Doings of Samuel Slick, of Slickville. By Hon. Thomas Chandler Haliburton. With illustrations by F. O. C. Darley. In 1 vol. 16mo, uniform with the Riverside Classics. $1 25.

The celebrity of this humorous work has induced the publishers to reprint it. Aside from the Yankee vernacular, the book justly won its wide repute by the shrewd mother-wit, the capital story-telling, and sound philosophy contained in it.

THE JUDGE'S PETS. Story of a Family and its Dumb Animals. By E. Johnson. Illustrated by E. B. Bensell. In 1 vol. 16mo, $1 25.

These are stories of the veritable pets of a veritable family, and as the incidents are taken with strict regard to their truth, so the pictures of the family and their life are told with a simplicity and freedom from ostentatious writing which will commend the book to all cultivated readers.

LITTLE-FOLK SONGS. By Alexina B. White. With twenty-five illustrations by Lucy Gibbons Morse, M. L. Stone, and M. A. Hallock. In 1 vol. 4to, $1 25.

This little volume of original poetry has the elements of a pure domestic literature—melody, vivacity, incident, and affectionate playfulness, which ought to render it a charm in every refined household.

LIFE OF THE REV. JOHN McVICKAR, S.T.D. By Rev. W. A. McVickar. With a portrait. In 1 vol. crown 8vo, $2.

Dr. McVickar's position in New York society, and his relations to Columbia College, will render this volume of great interest to a large circle of readers. The record embraces his foreign travel and intercourse with eminent men of letters.

☞ Any of the above sent by mail on receipt of the prices annexed.

CASSELL'S POPULAR EDUCATOR.

COMPLETE IN SIX VOLUMES.

PRICE, $15.

"We have gone over its pages with sentiments of real wonder. We know no work like it. It has occupied and filled up a field of education vast and most important to the community."—Dublin University Magazine.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,

596 Broadway, New York.

THE "EDWARDS PLACE" SCHOOL FOR BOYS,

at Stockbridge, Mass., offers superior advantages. For Circulars, address

F. HOFFMANN, or J. REID, Jr.

E. A. GIBBENS' SCHOOL FOR BOYS,

CORNER OF

FORTY-SECOND STREET AND SIXTH AVENUE,

WILL REOPEN SEPT. 18, 1871.

Pupils prepared for Classical and Mathematical Honors in Harvard University.

MRS. ROBERTS and Miss WALKER will reopen their French and English Day School for young ladies, No. 148 Madison Ave., on Wednesday, September 20. Arrangements will be made, when desired, by which pupils under 12 can prepare their lessons in school under the care of a teacher.

S. A. FARRAND'S SCHOOL FOR BOYS, No. 1,400 Broadway, corner of 39th Street. Re-opens September 25. Number of Pupils Limited. This School is so organized that each boy receives all the personal attention he may need. The teachers have time enough to explain the difficulties each scholar meets with, and great pains are taken to teach him how to study. This is done so thoroughly that he needs no help at home. The development and growth of character in each pupil is carefully watched and directed.

MRS. COLTON'S SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES AND MISSES, at Middletown, Conn., re-opens Wednesday, Sept. 30, 1871. A few pupils only desired, to be educated with and as her own daughters. Refers to Bishop Williams, Pres. Cummings, Dr. Bacon, Prof. Hadley, Rev. Dr. J. P. Thompson, Chancellor Crosby, A. S. Hatch, or J. C. Havemeyer, Esq.

"AMER. SCHOOL INST."

FOUNDED 1855.

Is a reliable and practical Educational Bureau—
To aid those who want well-qualified Teachers,
To represent Teachers who seek positions;
To give parents information of good Schools;
To sell, rent, and exchange School properties.

Sixteen years have proved it efficient in securing "the right Teacher for the right place."

J. W. SCHERMERHORN, A.M., Actuary,

14 Bond Street, New York.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF CAPTAIN JOHN Brown. Edited by Richard D. Webb. The best ever written. With photograph showing the face without the beard. Price $1 50. Address, Publisher of THE NATION, Box 6732, N. Y.

ARCHER & PANCOAST M'F'G CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GAS FIXTURES,

LAMPS, CHANDELIERS, BRACKETS, ETC.

of every description.

Manufactory and Warerooms:

NOS. 70, 72, AND 74 WOOSTER STREET,

(Between Broome and Spring Street),

NEW YORK.

Careful attention will be given to the Furnishing of Churches, Public Halls, Private Residences, etc., and Designs for special purposes will be submitted when required.

N. B.—The Broadway cars pass our warerooms in going down-town.

THE NATION PRESS.

The Proprietors of THE NATION PRESS give notice that they have established a Book, Pamphlet, Job, and Newspaper Printing-Office in this City, and are prepared to execute at moderate prices, for cash, the best of work in any and all of these branches.

For BOOKS they will furnish Electrotype or Stereotype Plates, as desired, and will guaranty unusual accuracy in their preparation.

J. ROSS & CO., 27 Rose St., New York.

PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL. Do not endanger your lives and property, by burning unsafe oil, when Pratt's Astral Oil may be had at moderate price, and is entirely free from any dangerous qualities. Over 100,000 families, who now use it, can testify to its perfect safety, reliability, and purity.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1871.

The Week.

THE contest with the Tammany peculators has on the surface slackened during the week, and there is no question that they have in some degree recovered their courage, and are by no means in that "dread of social, financial, and political ruin" which the Evening Post ascribes to them. Finding that the only bad effect of the Barnard injunction has been Mr. Green's installation in the Comptroller's office, and that they are still untouched in body or estate, Tweed has grown very bold, and is reported to have declared, in reply to the talk of arresting him, that no Justice would dare to order it, and no jail was strong enough to hold him; and Hall has stuck out a placard in the City Hall, announcing, in reply to talk of his resigning, that he means to stay where he is for the term for which he was elected, that is, till January, 1872. The main source of their confidence is, however, what most people guessed it would be—the elections in November. They doubtless feel, and with a good deal of reason, that it is only the respectable classes that are incensed against them, that "the people" are still on their side, and that they will have large majorities at the polls. We know of nothing that militates strongly against this theory—keeping in view the enormous power of fraudulent voting which the Ring have in reserve—except the revolt of the Germans. We doubt if Tweed's hold on the "Democratic masses" is otherwise seriously shaken. He still appears in public, and delivers speeches in the canvass.

In the meantime, the person who stole Connolly's vouchers has been discovered to be Haggerty, the faithful janitor of the New Court-House, a young, flashy, political ruffian of the Tammany school, a Pennsylvanian by birth. He appears in court glittering with diamonds, and is interesting as a good specimen of the kind of man into whose hands the work of government is passing in these parts. In prosecuting him and his wife, however, the reformers are coming on their first difficulties. The District Attorney, though we know nothing against him, could not have been District Attorney without the Ring's nomination and consent, and the question now arises, Will he act with energy against his old friends? The question derives additional interest from the fact that he has refused to allow counsel employed by the Committee of Seventy to be associated with him. That Committee and the Joint Committee are hard at work examining accounts and, it is hoped and believed, accumulating proofs. The Union League Club has also met, and preambled and resolved, but Judge Barrett rather disturbed the peace and equanimity of the occasion by asking them whether they were ready to raise $200,000, and go to the polls, we presume, armed, and see that there was no fraudulent voting As "a voice" says at meetings, "That's the talk." If preambles and resolutions could shake the Ring, Tweed would now be putting new bottoms into old chairs for a living in some distant land.

The great event of the week, and the one which perhaps promises as much as anything that has happened for the purification of all politics, has been the final crushing of the Honorable Tom Murphy, Collector of this port. We have recently expressed ourselves freely about Tom, but by no means for the first time. Last year, when his nomination was before the Senate (July 7, 1870), we introduced him to our readers as "strong for the Andrew Johnson party at the time of the Philadelphia Convention, shaky in his business reputation, and an out-and-out politician of the kind that is noisiest in conventions," and also "as a politician of the politicians, enriched through Government contracts, possessing that peculiar reputation which consists in being generally believed capable of participation in any job," and added "that by no means savory charges were made against him under this head already"; and we called his appointment "a monstrous abuse of a great trust," and the bestowal "of one of the most valuable and responsible offices in the United States on a hack politician, unfit for any trust." We should have liked to use still stronger language, but, not having proper proofs in our possession to support it, we forbore. All the party papers kept silent, or approved, believing, we suppose, as in Butler's case, that the man would prove "useful," or would mend his manners. Murphy himself never even pretended that he went into the Custom-house in the interest of the revenue. He was put there because Senator Conkling persuaded General Grant that he would convert the Custom-house into a good political machine, would "build up the party" in this city, and serve the purposes of the Administration when its turn came. He has impudently pretended that he collected revenue at less cost than Mr. Grinnell, having done a little hocus-pocussing with the figures, after the fashion of Mr. Columbus Delano; but Mr. Grinnell forced the Treasury to confess that his showing was fallacious.

His day of reckoning has come at last. Mr. Olcott, who served with honor and fidelity as an agent of the War Department during the war, came upon traces of frauds on Murphy's part in the supply of hats for the troops, put detectives on his track, got his hats examined by competent men in the business, found that in every case they fell below the Government standard, and were of the worst quality, and got proofs of other iniquities on Tom's part, which caused the War Department to order a preliminary enquiry before a board of civilians in this city. Whereupon Tom went to his friend, Mr. Murray, at that time United States Marshal in this district—it is Mr. Murray himself who tells the amazing story in the columns of the Tribune—and told him in tears that the War Department was after him for his rascality; and by Murray's advice, or with his conniving, bribed the detectives who were getting up the case against him, bribed the principal witnesses not to appear, got the army standard hat stolen, and an old hat like his own substituted for it, and then went brazen-faced before the Commission and stood the investigation; but all he got was a verdict of "not proven," with the significant obiter dictum, that the loss of such hats as were rejected fell not on him, but on the contractor. When this story was brought up by Mr. Olcott in the Tribune, he had the audacity to reply, as men of his kind do reply, first, by assailing his accuser, and by citing passages in which the Tribune had once spoken well of him, and finally by bragging, through many falsehoods and evasions, of his devotion to the Republican party. His undeniable appearance in "real estate speculations" with Tweed, Connolly, Hall, and Sweeny, he defended by the plea that these were all citizens, and he himself is a citizen, and that all citizens have a right to combine to deal in real estate. The verdict of "not proven" he paraded as a conclusive vindication, and enjoyed during one night a sense of guilty security. The appearance of Murray on Monday, however, with the whole damning tale of infamy, virtually closed the case. It now remains for General Grant to do his duty. To the Tribune for dragging this man into the light of day, the community owes its hearty thanks. It is a service of precisely the same kind, and, considering the position the culprit occupies, perhaps of a higher order than that the Times has rendered in attacking the Ring; for Murphy belongs, we repeat, to the class which has furnished Tweed, Connolly, and Hall—a class of greedy adventurers, without conscience, or honor, or shame, or decency, or patriotism, or fear of God or of devil, or any strong spring of action, except love of money, and who go into politics and repeat the party war-cries for the same reason that other men pick locks and forge bills—to avoid honest labor, fill their bellies with rich food, and adorn their bodies with rich clothing. We hope the Republican press will see to it that the President gets no peace till this particular rascal is relegated to private life.

The Pennsylvania canvass is proceeding somewhat languidly throughout the State, but in Philadelphia it has suddenly sprung up into a condition of fierce activity. We called attention in June to a movement set on foot to exercise some control over the nominations made by political managers, under the theory that if a sufficient body of independent voters could be organized to hold the balance of power between the two great parties, much could be done to check the recklessness with which unfit men are nominated for responsible positions, and forced into office under the pressure of party discipline. This movement has been by no means abandoned, and last week it threw the political world of Philadelphia into a hubbub by coming forward with a kind of eclectic ticket, mostly composed of the best names selected from among the regular party nominees, and two or three new ones of high character where the party candidates on both sides were considered objectionable. So far as we have the means of judging, this ticket is composed of good men, and its success would not cause regret to any one who regards good government as more important than momentary partisan triumph. We are not near enough to the scene of action to speak with positiveness about local questions, but we observe that the movement has the approbation and sympathy of such men as Horace Binney and Alexander Henry, and that it is received with shrieks and bawls by the thoroughgoing, thick-and-thin party organs; and both of these symptoms, we think, will commend it to the favor of honest men everywhere.

When General Logan was struck with panic fear at the prospect of an aristocracy of office-holders, to be created by a civil-service reform, he was too much agitated to recognize the existence of that other aristocracy which, fortunately for us, is so rapidly coming to grief in New York. The really dangerous aristocracy of this country consists of men like Tweed and Sweeny, the ringmasters of politics, who possess the undefinable power to secure "regular nominations" for themselves or their friends whenever they choose to. Few things in political psychology are more curious than the superstition with which well-meaning and otherwise intelligent people regard the "regular" nominations of their party. The iconoclast who bolts, and who refuses to support an improper candidate simply because he is unfit, is looked upon by many people, who are popularly supposed to have brains and hearts as little better than an infidel. It is this superstition which makes the power of the "men inside politics," and they use it adroitly and audaciously. Without it, Tweed would have remained a bankrupt chair maker, and General Butler would now be practising law. No community is free from these men, and Philadelphia is ridden by them as completely as New York or the Essex District. The movement above alluded to is an effort to show the people how to emancipate themselves, and in this view its success would be a cause of congratulation to the country at large.

Various theories find favor as explanatory of the course of the Massachusetts senators and of the extraordinary muddle in which the Republicans there find themselves this fall. One theory sets out with the assumption that at the bottom of the senators' reticence and of the General's volubility and impudence is the primary fact that the Administration supports Butler. The strongest confirmation of this theory is, that Collector Russell is understood to be an accomplice of Butler's in the raid which the latter is making on the regular party leaders. And the reason given for the Administration favoring Butler is, briefly, that the President is determined to be renominated if he can; that the Massachusetts file-leaders are to a great extent under the influence of Mr. Sumner and his friends; that Mr. Sumner is opposed to General Grant's renomination; that therefore the Administration lends what aid it can to such an outlaw as Butler, who is quite willing to "smash the party" as at present constituted, and who has strength with the rank and file and some strength outside the party. It is no very violent assumption which represents the President as eager for a renomination. Political intriguers like Morton, Forney, Cameron, Murphy, and Conkling are not among his intimate advisers for nothing. But the Administration's interference is certainly, so far as appears, not active, though that the Administration is certainly not hostile to Butler is evident from the fact that so subservient a Republican politician as Collector Russell ventures to be, at the very least, a neutral in a fight between Butler and all the recognized "war-horses," and "wheel-horses," and "men inside politics." The reticence of the senators as regards Butler, and their putting their condemnation of him on the tenable ground that he is "breaking up the party," the theory we have spoken of would explain by saying that they do not like to give Butler the opportunity of saying that they oppose Grant, as it may be early yet to say that with safety. On the other hand, Butler has to thank them for having said so little and spoken so guardedly. But, however his action may affect the war-horses and wheel-horses and all the men who have managed the cut-and-dried Republican politics of Massachusetts, and however little one may find, on examining his secret heart, whether Butler swallows them or they him, the duty of all honest men remains clear nevertheless, and that is to oppose Butler, his works and ways, from this time till death removes him from the scene.

There is a popular hymn, one line of which,

"We are living, we are dwelling, in a grand and awful time," is receiving some comical illustrations from the existing condition of politics. The Republican Collector of the port of New York, appointed by General Grant, has just been shown by the New York Tribune, of all papers in the world, to be a swindling army contractor, and the Republican State Convention is to be torn by two factions, each led on by one of the United States senators, for both of whom the public entertains a mixture of suspicion and contempt. At the same time, the greatest furnishers of Democratic majorities New York or any other State has ever produced are being pursued as criminals by brother Democrats, on charges of forgery, fraud, and embezzlement of public funds. In Massachusetts the spectacle is even more awful. There, a doctor of divinity is preaching the duty of Christians to elect great rascals to high public office, provided they will promote the cause of teetotalism, and this for the benefit of a candidate who not only swears, lies, and cheats, but drinks intoxicating liquors. This same candidate, whom nobody would believe on his oath, has, however, succeeded in securing nearly half the delegates to the nominating convention of the party of morality, and has spread consternation through its ranks. To crown all, Wendell Phillips has proclaimed his preference for a drinking governor who will support prohibition, to an abstaining governor who will not, for which evil behavior one of his fondest admirers, Mr. T. W. Higginson, severely rebukes him, and, of all places in the world, in the Woman's Journal. Looking on these things, it is difficult to epress the belief that we are on the eve of a cataclysm.

The first great strike having for its object the shortening of the hours of labor, that is, securing ten hours' pay for nine hours' work, is now in progress among the iron-workers in Newcastle-on-Tyne, in England, and, thus far, with every appearance of success for the strikers, although the employers are among the greatest English capitalists, one of them being Sir William Armstrong, of cannon celebrity. The amounts of money subscribed on both sides have been enormous, and the cause of the struggle, far from being confined to England, has extended over the whole Continent, the opposing forces meeting in Denmark, Belgium, Germany, and France, as well as at home. The masters have in vain mported laborers by hundreds not only from these countries, but from all parts of Great Britain; the new-comers no sooner reach Newcastle than they are either intimidated or cajoled into breaking their contracts and going home, the strikers paying their expenses. What is, perhaps, most peculiar about the matter is that, although only one trade—the engineers—is engaged in the strike, subscriptions and support are coming in from various others. And this is the first time in which English employers have been baffled in their attempts to overcome the workmen by the aid of foreign recruits, an indication, doubtless, and a strong one, of the growing power and discipline of the International Association. The demand for the reduction of the hours of labor may be reasonable enough—in some trades it certainly is—but both parties are perfectly conscious that a far more serious question than this is raised by the struggle, viz., who is to control the conduct of the great branches of industry—the employers or the workmen? The capitalists say, and with great truth, that the operations of trade are now too delicate, the competition too close, and the market too wide, to make it possible to carry on the leading manufactures except under single and irresponsible heads; that, if the execution of great orders, requiring a long space of time, vast outlay of money, and close calculation of details, is to be constantly exposed to interruption for one reason or another at the hands of large bodies of men, ignorant on most points, but especially ignorant of the condition of the market, the employers might as well give up. This feeling is so widespread in England, and has so much foundation in fact, that very serious apprehensions begin to be felt as to the industrial future of the country. Some trades are already growing sickly under the influence of working-class combinations, and others are on the point of extinction. The worst of it is that the workingmen show little desire or intention of building up anything better on the ruins of the existing order of things.

The French have just been having a scandal of a good deal of interest, both political and social, and which will probably lead to the complete retirement from public life, and even from the bar and Academy, of a man who has played no inconsiderable part in the history of France during the last twenty years—M. Jules Favre. M. Favre, although he was a leader in the long struggle against the Empire, beginning in 1852 and ending last year, and by far the ablest member of his party, became an object of the fiercest hostility to the Reds as soon as he took a place in the Government of the National Defence, and showed a leaning to moderate courses. This hostility, of course, became intensified during the war of the Commune, and foul stories of Favre's private life, set afloat during the siege by Millière, one of the Communist chiefs, and himself a notorious debauchee, furnished a potent means of inflaming the populace against the Versailles Government, of which Favre was a member. Favre, for nearly thirty years, but in the strictest seclusion, lived with another man's wife, by whom he had several children, and to whom he appears to have been tenderly attached. In registering the birth of one of his children at the Mairie, as the French law requires, he committed the indiscretion, owing to the presence of his little girl, ten years old, of declaring that he and her mother were married, or, in other words, committed legal perjury. Of all this Millière got hold, and added to it a terrible accusation, apparently of his own invention, that a man named Odiot was the real father of some of M. Favre's reputed children, and that, after having induced him to make a will in their favor, Favre had poisoned him in order to secure the property himself. Millière was shot by the troops at the fall of the city, but before his death he had communicated the particulars of his accusation to one Laluyé, once an intimate friend, but then a bitter enemy, of Favre. Laluyé was arrested soon after for complicity in the doings of the Commune, and he forthwith published it far and near that Favre had used his authority, as a member of the Government, to have him seized and put out of the way in order to close his mouth. This charge it was impossible for a man in Favre's position to pass by in silence. He accordingly prosecuted Laluyé for libel, and successfully vindicated himself from all charges except that of having made a false declaration before the mayor. This he confessed in open court in a pathetic speech, frequently interrupted by tears, telling without reserve the whole history of his unfortunate attachment. It is not often that such a scene is witnessed in a court of justice, and it is not often that so brilliant a career has so pitiful, we might almost say so paltry, a close. The story throws some light, however, on the causes of the sorry figure cut by Favre in his negotiations with Bismarck. Laluyé was convicted, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a heavy fine, but he has none the less ruined his enemy, who passes from the stage, old and broken in spirit.

The message sent by President Thiers to the National Assembly a few days before its self-prorogation is a document less terrible by far than some former eulogists of the old statesman, this side of the Atlantic, have declared it to be, judging by a sensational passage sent us by the Cable reporters. It does contain the phrase referred to, but in a form considerably differing from that in which it was telegraphically reported. M. Thiers does not treacherously contrast a "reconstruction based on the glorious traditions of a thousand years" with "the abandonment of the ship of state to a torrent leading to an unknown future," but he speaks of the necessity of determining whether the country is to be constituted "in accordance with the tradition of the past, the glorious tradition of a thousand years, or whether, abandoning itself to the torrent which in the present day precipitates human society towards an unknown future, it is to put on a new form, and thus peacefully pursue its noble destiny." The whole context shows that this implies no recommendation in favor of the older of "the two forms of government which, at the present time, divide all nations." Whether France, "the object of the passionate attention of the whole universe, is to be a republic or a monarchy," is with him an extraordinary problem, which can be approached only with patriotic feeling, and solved only after a due study of the country's will, and sincere endeavors "to revive, or modify if necessary, its tradition." The cold reception which the message met with on the part of the Assembly, and the political calm which has prevailed since its publication, sufficiently prove, besides, that there was nothing in it which the Right could hail, or the Left denounce, as an indication that the President of the French Republic was ready to hoist the flag of royalism.

Among the most urgent tasks before the Government, M. Thiers mentions the composition of a normal budget, the completion of the army reorganization, and the conclusion of negotiations which shall place the commercial system of France upon fixed bases. Having yielded to the wish of the Assembly in regard to the proposed additional décime on all taxes, the Government—if the latest reports be true—is now also disposed to cling less firmly to its own protective policy as to the tariff, and the renewal of the commercial treaty concluded with England in 1860 has been made a subject of discussion with Lord Lyons. The fate of the lately concluded partial "customs treaty" with Germany in reference to Alsace and Lorraine is hourly expected to be favorably decided by the Cabinet of Berlin, before which the amendments affixed to it by the French Assembly have been laid by Count Arnim, the German negotiator. Its ratification would be followed by the evacuation by the Germans of four departments—Aisne, Aube, Côte d'Or, and Jura—in addition to the seven already evacuated in consequence of partial payments of the war indemnity—Eure, Seine-Inférieure, Somme, and Seine (with the Paris forts), Seine-et-Oise, Seine-et-Marne, and Oise. Another negotiation is being carried on for the evacuation of Doubs and Haute-Saône, Thiers promising, it is said, to pay within a very short time the fourth half-milliard, falling due on the 1st of May, 1872. The disarmament of the National Guards has nowhere met with effective opposition. The pacification of Algeria also is progressing satisfactorily. Rochefort has been condemned to deportation to a penal colony for life. The conduct of Rossel, on his trial, has elicited both sympathy and admiration. Neither he nor Lullier nor Ferré is expected to be executed.

The "Ministerial Rescript" addressed a few weeks ago by the Bavarian Minister of Worship and Instruction, Von Lutz, to the Archbishop of Munich, shows that the new Cabinet of King Louis has decided on an uncompromising stand against the encroachments of the Ultramontane hierarchy. Von Lutz speaks now in a much bolder tone than he ever assumed as a member of the divided Bray Ministry. He handles the Bavarian episcopacy almost without gloves when reminding it of the glaring inconsistency and illegal daring evinced in its attempting to impose upon the civil spheres of the kingdom, without the royal placet, doctrines which, before their promulgation by the Council of Rome, it had itself strenuously opposed as incompatible with the institutions of modern states. So presumptuous a disregard of the laws he declares to be the more reprehensible the higher the source from which it proceeds. Refuting the argument of the bishops, that their proceedings are in violation of a constitutional provision which ought never to have been decreed, he says: "Whoever would venture to proceed thus within the sphere of the penal law might easily find sufficient leisure in the solitude of a prison to fathom the untenableness of his theories"—which is plain talk, indeed, and fully explains the rage with which the document has been received by the clerical and reactionary press.

THINGS FOR ALL REPUBLICANS TO CONSIDER.

If people generally, and especially people who are interested in political progress, could be got to believe that the government of a country is the natural product of the state of the society in which it exists, or, as De Maistre expresses it, that it is the manners which make the government, and not the government which makes the manners, we should be saved an enormous amount of misdirected efforts at reform. Villains do not take possession of the reins of authority in any civilized community, in our day, until a state of things has been prepared which makes it easy for them to seize them and keep them. We took the liberty of pointing this out a year ago, when a good many enthusiastic people here were trying to saddle Louis Napoleon with the responsibility both of his own career and of all the misfortunes which it brought on France, and to let the French people off as the innocent victims of a tyrant. He became what he became, and did what he did, because the French were what they were. Providence does not rain tyrants or peculators on any people; he lets them earn them through vices of their own; and when they have earned them, he sees that they are surely and justly paid.

We say this by way of preface to a few words of explanation which we shall now venture to offer to the Republican party throughout the country on the condition of things in this city, and which we are most anxious should not be taken as in any wise discouraging or throwing cold water on the attempts which are being made at this moment to overthrow the band of charlatans and adventurers who have taken possession of the government of New York. No matter what the cause of Tweed's, Hall's, Sweeny's, and Connolly's rise, it is the first duty of every decent citizen to do what in him lies to get rid of them and bring them to justice; and we doubt if any improvement can be suggested in the means which are now being employed for that end. The address of the Committee of Seventy shows that its members take a thoroughly sound and just view of the situation, and are under the influence of no illusions, great or small, as to the nature of the work they have in hand. Moreover, we do not share the impatience so freely expressed over the slowness and deliberateness of their procedure. Nothing could be more disastrous than a false step; and, in dealing with such a problem as is now before us, any hasty step would be very likely to be false. That problem is a mixed one, partly legal and partly moral. The thieves have made the law—so low has this great State sunk—not only under which they do their thieving, but under which they have to be pursued and punished; and he who follows them must follow them with cautious feet, if he would not work a failure of justice, and thus utterly destroy the popular faith in the possibility of overthrowing them at all, the smallness and weakness of which is already one of the greatest obstacles with which the friends of reform have to contend.

The work of overthrowing them naturally and inevitably falls to the lot of the people of this city and State. The people of other cities and States, deeply interested as they are in the process, can only look on. But on the questions, the great and all-important questions—Who is to succeed these scoundrels? Are they to have successors of their own kind? Is New York corruption a cancer which, no matter how often excised, is sure to come back again and again, and prey on the vitals of American government and society; or is it a disease which can be made to yield to tonics and alteratives?—on these questions, the people of the whole country, and especially the members of the Republican party, are entitled to their say, and, as we believe, must say it if we are to have any change for the better.

And now let us be frank about the facts. Frankness on the part of the Republican press would, we believe, help to save us, if saved we can be, and without frankness there can be no salvation. We declare, without hesitation, that were the respectable daily press thoroughly frank and independent, it would not be possible for our politics to get into their present condition. It would not be possible for the knaves—who are, after all, only a handful—to stand their ground in public life if public indignation could be concentrated on them through the newspapers, or if editors aspired to a nobler function than that of hashing and seasoning and warming-over the cant of conventions and political hacks. What the New York Times has done in this city against Tammany is a splendid example of what fortitude, persistence, and unpurchasable determination and integrity can do against any gang of scoundrels, however securely entrenched. The course of the Times, on the other hand, with regard to Murphy and his Custom-house, is another and hardly less striking illustration of the way in which the press fails to do its whole duty, and in which it so often, after brilliantly carrying one or two important outworks, declines to assail the main citadel, and leaves the public in the lurch. For there exists in this republic the strange and perhaps unprecedented spectacle of a government elected by the people, and responsible to the people, collecting and spending an enormous revenue, employing a vast army of functionaries subject to its absolute will and discretion, and practically holding in its hand the issues of war and peace, and yet, to all intents and purposes, exempt from honest criticism. The attacks of the Democratic press on the present Administration we do not call honest criticism—nobody else considers them so. They are the perfunctory fault-finding of an office-seeking opposition, and not the judgment of men whose first consideration is that the country be well served, no matter who serves it. Of what is called the "Administration press," with three or four honorable exceptions, we shall only say that, much ability and honesty as there is to be found in its ranks, we know of nothing to which the attitude of its conductors towards the Administration can be so fitly compared as Paul de Cassagnac's support of the Empire in the columns of the Pays. They observe the same tomblike silence on all its faults and indiscretions, the same careful avoidance even of allusions that might seem likely to create doubts as to the supreme wisdom and goodness of the Executive and its agents, the same obsequious and almost oriental alacrity in twisting the commonest occurrences of the day into proofs and illustrations of the foresight, sagacity, and purity of the chief magistrate; and one already begins to find in the phraseology of some of them the very flavor of the adulation which the worthy Paul used to compose on his way down to his office from the Empress's boudoir.

Tammany corruption in this city and State is only part and parcel of the general corruption and debasement, or, as the recent address of the Committee of Seventy truly says, of a corruption which has laid hold of commerce, of the bench, the bar, the ballot-box, the press, of rich and poor, high and low. Those who are not actually engaged in it wink at it, or are no longer shocked by it, if they do not laugh over it. Tammany could not exist and rule if for the last ten years the country districts had not regularly sent to Albany Republican legislators whom the knaves from this city never found any difficulty in bribing; or if there had not been judges on the bench who decided as it directed; or if there had not been a bar too timid or too selfish to rise up against judicial iniquity; or if the rich men of New York had not been more occupied about escaping their full contribution to the plunder than about protecting the rights of their less fortunate neighbors. Tweed would never have the audacity he has if he had not been flattered and caressed by millionaires who call themselves gentlemen, and Christians, and patriots. Why, at that shameful display of his booty which the scoundrel made the other day at his daughter's wedding, in the "gorgeous mansion" which, in the principal street of this great Christian city, divides the passenger's attention with another no less "gorgeous mansion" of a noted abortionist, there were among the presents costly gifts from men standing in the front rank of our commerce, in no social or business relations with him, but who did not hesitate in this manner to buy the robber's forbearance for themselves, careless of what became of the rest of the community. And is it not fresh in everybody's mind how, within two short months, Judge Hilton, who but a little while ago stepped down from the bench, and is now the confidential adviser of the greatest merchant in New York, and whom the Evening Post talks of as a reformer, after acting in conjunction with these men for a year, coolly spent an evening persuading the editor of a religious paper that the members of the Ring were respectable persons who had grown rich by "speculating in real estate"? Is it not fresh, too, in everybody's recollection that when Connolly, the Comptroller, who has been for three years engaged in frauds and embezzlements, found that his deliberate and unlawful refusal to publish his accounts for a whole year was rousing public attention and likely to lead to scrutiny, and wanted to get himself whitewashed, and his delinquency covered up, he went, not to Tombs lawyers or brother politicians, but to four or five of the leading bankers and merchants of New York, and that they did what he wanted not only without hesitation, but with alacrity? If we had the whole Ring arraigned at the bar of a criminal court to-morrow, they might, and perhaps would, truly say that they were amazed at their own moderation; and we confess, knowing what we know, and seeing what we see, that we are amazed at it too, and yet our knowledge is small, and our range of observation limited.

And now, what we want country Republicans to understand is that the Administration, so far from contributing to the work of purification in this city and State, contributes to the work of corruption. We want them to understand that its leading representative here, the Collector, through whose hands there passes nearly $200,000,000 of the national revenue every year, is a politician of precisely the same class as Tweed and Hall and Connolly, and is of like antecedents, and has been and is concerned with them in those "real estate speculations," the nature of which, after all that has happened, we do not need to explain. We want them to understand that this Custom-house is a machine of the same nature, and managed on precisely the same principles, as the city government, as managed by Tweed; and that Murphy differs from Tweed simply in being less able and successful; and that the Custom-house being what it is, Republican indignation here, as Republican, over the Tammany frauds moves honest and candid men to mingled tears and laughter. We pointed out distinctly a year ago, when Murphy was appointed, the kind of man he was. We had not then the proofs which the New York Tribune, to its honor, has now furnished—and the withholding of which when his nomination was before the Senate was as inexcusable as it is incomprehensible—of his rascalities during the war. But we had no hesitation in treating his appointment to such a place, as a substitute for a respectable New York merchant, as one more proof that General Grant had delivered himself over to evil counsellors, and had forsaken the sure ways in which those who supported his election, and eulogized the first year of his Administration as heartily as we did, hoped to see him walk to the end. We are not concerned whether he is renominated or not, and, if we were, do not flatter ourselves that we could affect the result one way or the other; but we most earnestly hope that that great mass of honest men of which the Republican party is in the main composed, will consider seriously, and even solemnly, whether they are prepared to have the abominable system under which men like Murphy find their way into the chief offices of the nation, and can be made useful by a civilized government, sustained for four years longer. We say "solemnly," because we believe that, as Senator Trumbull said, speaking of it the other day at Chicago, if it continues, "we do not know what the result will be in the future." It cannot go on long without ruin. There is no arrangement in the moral order of the universe for the existence of a great and free people ruled by thieves and adventurers and charlatans; and we would most earnestly ask those who are so fond of boasting of the existence of a fountain of "enthusiasm" in their breasts, and so fond of tapping it for mean men and mean things, to draw from it even one little burst of faith in the saving power of honesty and truthfulness.

MUNICIPAL CÆSARISM.

The plan of governing nations by high-sounding phrases which was introduced by the first French Revolutionists, and of whose melancholy failure we are all witnesses, came across the Atlantic at a very early period, and, having got a safe lodgment in the brains of the Jeffersonian Democracy, it made its way into most of the State constitutions, and notably into that of New York in 1846. It has not done the mischief here which it did in France, because it has had to work among a people thoroughly trained in politics, and inheritors of strong traditions, and of a singularly practical, businesslike turn of mind. In France, it found the soil cleared of all obstacles to its action. Habits, traditions, usages, institutions, had all been swept away, and the people who were to build up the new state were destitute of the smallest knowledge of the machinery of government, and, indeed, so unskilled in all affairs that no delusion was too wild for them. Foremost among these phrases, and perhaps the most mischievous of them all, was the phrase, "Trust the People"—meaning by "people," as we have more than once explained, a metaphysical entity, of extraordinary wisdom and capacity, a sort of abstraction composed of all the virtues and powers of the most virtuous and capable men of the community, but wholly unlike any body of live men hitherto seen on earth. The first result of the supremacy of the phrase was that "the people" demanded so much trust that no trust was left for anybody else. It was impossible to compose a government they could depend on, whether one man or many. No French legislature could be trusted to legislate with the presence of "the people" in the gallery to watch the proceedings, and turn the legislators out of the house when they ceased to do right. No army could be trusted to fight or keep order; "the people" had to go armed, and do the fighting themselves. No court could be trusted to administer justice; litigants had to content themselves with "the justice of the people." The power of this phrase on the French imagination, great as it was in 1793, has been growing steadily stronger ever since, and, perhaps, never produced such extraordinary effects as in the late war of the Commune. The daily overthrow of generals and dictators, the weekly substitution of one supreme committee for another, the furious hostility to courts of law, and the profound faith in the ability of large crowds in the streets not only to decide knotty questions of government, but to provide suitors and criminals with a competent tribunal, were all the offspring of the old Revolutionary idea that, while nearly all individual men were knaves or traitors, men in large bodies could not do wrong. The saddest result of all, however, has been the creation in the French mind of that hostility to constitutions, or apparent incapacity to conceive of an organic law binding the majority to do or refrain from doing certain things at all times, in which now lies, as all thoughtful Frenchmen acknowledge, the greatest difficulty in the way of setting up a stable government. M. Laboulaye has recently made it the subject of deep lamentation in correspondence with friends in this country. A constitution—like, indeed, all laws—is neither more nor less than a solemn expression on the part of a community of its unwillingness to "trust the people," or rather the entity called by that name by demagogues, and its determination to bind it to respect the rights of those who happen to differ with it—that is, of minorities.

In this country, the phrase operated to take away nearly all power from governors, mayors, and other high executive officers, and distribute it among a crowd of elective functionaries, each of them responsible only to "the people," and finally to destroy the independence of the judiciary, which the Anglo-Saxon race had spent five centuries in carefully building up, and which was, perhaps, the noblest contribution to politics made by the modern world. Everybody, in short, had to "trust the people," and the people would trust nobody. Things began from that moment steadily to decline—corruption spread, the character of public men deteriorated, and the sense of responsibility was fatally weakened; and when we began to look about for "the people," in order to complain to it and get it to set things to rights, we were shown into a room with half-a-dozen cunning-looking gentlemen in shabby black clothes, who told us their name was Caucus, and that if we had anything particular to say to the people, we could send it through them.

For it was not to be supposed that there were no demagogues ready to turn this phrasemongering to their own account. In fact, there is no form of government which demagogues enjoy more than government by phrases. They hate facts above all things, and delight in words, and as soon as any people gives up, or shows signs of giving up, respect for facts in its politics, they swarm into the forum, each man with a bag of phrases of his own, whose beauty he extols to the skies. In ignorant communities, it is not very long before somebody's phrase catches the popular eye, and he forthwith is clothed in purple and fine linen, and lives on the fat of the land. Louis Napoleon was the lucky man whose speeches took the French fancy, and he was rewarded with eighteen years of champagne, satin sofas, and fast horses, during every day of which he expressed, in some way, his deep "trust in the people." He was the chosen of "the people," and the servant of "the people," and he, towards the close, showed himself hardly willing to permit legislation in any way but by "plébiscite"—or appeal to the people. In his title, drawn up by himself, he admitted that he owed his throne in some degree to "the grace of God"; but this agency would have been insufficient without a popular vote ("la volonté nationale"). Since his dethronement, he has fiercely denounced the new government for not trusting the people. In New York, Tweed and Hall have played exactly the same game. If you asked either of those worthies to what he had owed his success in politics, he would tell you it was his "trust in the people"; if you asked him on what he relied to extricate him from his present difficulties, he would say, "the people." The fact is that they have managed to get the confidence of the people in an extraordinary degree, and if they do not succeed in obtaining a vindication from the people in November next, either their power has greatly fallen off, or the New York "people" has greatly changed.

These things are worth considering, because the problem of city government will probably undergo at the hands of the next Legislature a more careful consideration than it has ever met with before. Both parties are preparing for it, with the consciousness that great social, commercial, and political interests will be affected by their action, and that the eyes of the nation are upon them; and if the country districts send up their best men, and not gangs of thieves, we shall probably have at Albany, what we have not had for many a year, discussions, if not legislation, of which the State may be proud. But if we are to avoid another tremendous mistake, the problem must be fairly stated, without suppressions or evasions, and, with a view to this, there ought to be the fullest debate between now and the 1st of January. It is, of course, hard to take one's attention away from the attempt to bring the City Hall thieves to justice; but if there is not some careful preparation of the expected new charter, done by our best men, the result of all our labors will be that we shall simply find ourselves saddled two years hence with a new set of thieves, claiming, like the present ones, to be the agents of "the people." We are the more solicitous on this account because there are signs that all is not going well. There is no paper which has more—perhaps none which has so much—influence on any constructive effort in city politics as the Evening Post, and none which is better entitled to it. It is, therefore, somewhat alarming to see how loosely it has been talking about what is to be done next, how greatly it is under the influence of French ideas, and how large a part phrases play in its discussions. It has of late been advocating a plan, which has a great deal to be said for it, and which we have ourselves advocated on the ground that it would be more likely than any other to solve the great problem of making "respectable citizens attend to their political duties"—viz., the concentration in the hands of the Mayor of the greater portion of the powers of government, including the appointment of all subordinate officers. This has the merit of simplicity, and of uniting all responsibility on a single head, and would certainly be a great improvement on what we have now, and might, if we had a few good Mayors, be a stepping-stone to something better, by restoring public opinion to a healthy condition, and reviving the courage and public spirit of the more respectable citizens. But it is a plan, considered as a permanency, opposed to all the political traditions and soundest usages of American polity, and savors rather of Gambetta or Rouher than of a New York publicist, for it is neither more nor less than a proposal to get out of our difficulties by setting up a short-term Cæsar—responsible, of course, to "the people," like all Cæsars, but none the less a Cæsar for all that; and thus accustoming us, and, indeed, teaching us, to rely on that canker of democracy, personal government, and arming that government with one of the most corrupt and corrupting instruments of government in existence, a civil service without training, or fixity, or respectable traditions. Such a plan, advocated with sober-mindedness, and with a full perception of its dangers, has, as we have said, its merits, but advocated with French phrases, and accompanied by denunciations of any scheme of giving the taxpayers any control of the city expenditures as "treason to the republic" (one of the regular Gallic phrases, and about the equivalent to sacrilege in the sixth degree or loose notions on the federal headship of Adam), it makes one feel as if we were still in very troubled waters, and likely to remain there.

It cannot be too carefully remembered, that while a Cæsarship would probably work well the first year, as it always does, it would create an extraordinarily tempting prize to the ordinary New York politicians—a prize such as has never been offered them, second only to the Presidency of the United States in value. The appointment of the officials who are to collect and spend the revenues of this city, and enforce its ordinances, is indeed "a big thing," the like of which is not to be found anywhere else; and there would be an amount of "working" done for it such as has never been seen, and it would be done in the ordinary way, not by currying favor with William E. Dodge, and William A. Booth, and Bishop Potter, and Dr. Adams, but by making large promises to the same class of politicians who have raised Wood, and Tweed, and Hall, and Connolly to power; and by these arts one of the Tweed and Hall tribe would assuredly get it sooner or later, unless New York human nature underwent a change such as human nature is not known to have undergone within historic times. Having got it, he would "take care of his friends" in the usual way, and would lay his wires to secure his renomination in the usual way, and he would probably secure it. Then there would be the usual denunciations by the newspapers, the usual lamentations over the way "the people" were "deceived" and "robbed," the usual threats of vigilance committees, and wonderings how Mayor Smith or Brown, whom we all used to see in his pew at church every Sunday, could be such a rascal; and in fifteen or twenty years some Mayor Smith or Brown would quarrel with a confederate O'Rourke or O'Toole, who would expose him; and we should then have indignation meetings, resolutions, and so on—but Smith or Brown would laugh, and either appeal to the people, or make it all right with the District Attorney, put his money into good hands, and go to Europe.

If there be any salvation for a community afflicted as this is, it lies—as the salvation of the Anglo-Saxon race has always lain—in the application to its politics of the sober, practical, business common-sense and self-restraint which govern its daily life. No change in the city government will be a lasting reform which does not make it a representative government elected on a general ticket; in which the representation is composed in some degree of persons chosen by taxpayers; and in which the amount of the taxes, and the disbursement of them, is controlled in the main by those who pay them. As long as the revenues of this city are, as the revenues of no other civilized community are, in the hands of persons who think that they contribute nothing to them, neither Moses nor the prophets could make a change for the better. This may have an unpleasant sound, but it is a fact. It may be "treason to the Republic"; but it will not do to treat it after the manner of the old lady who, having complained of so many of her townsmen not going to church, and having been shown that, while the population was 5,000, the churches would only hold 1,800, told her antagonist that "she wanted none of his infidel arguments."

QUEBEC.

I.

QUEBEC, September 22, 1871.

A TRAVELLER who combines a taste for the picturesque with a love of letters ought not, I suppose, to pass through "the most picturesque city in America" without making an attempt to commemorate his impressions. His first impression will certainly have been that Quebec is a city not in America, but in Europe. I came, some days since, by a dreary night-journey, to Point Levi, opposite the town, and as we rattled toward our goal in the faint raw dawn, and, already hungry for "effects," I began to consult the misty window-panes and descried through the glass, darkly, little but a huge monotony of most unstoried wilderness, I felt that the land would have much to do to take on the graces of antiquity. And, in fact, the feat is achieved with an almost magical suddenness. The Old World rises in the midst of the New in the manner of a change of scene on the stage. The St. Lawrence shines at your left, large as a harbor-mouth, gray with smoke and masts, and edged on its hither verge by a bustling water-side faubourg of unmistakably European coloring; and beyond it, over against you, on its rocky promontory, sits the ancient town, belted with its hoary wall and crowned with its granite citadel. A constant question, I find, at Quebec, is how the city would fare as a spectacle if the imagination had not been bribed, as I may say, beforehand. The place, after all, is of America—American, yet it appeals to you so cunningly with its little stock of Old-World wares that you overlook its flaws and lapses, and swallow it whole. Fancy lent a willing hand the morning I arrived, and zealously retouched the picture. The very sky seemed to pile itself up in massive murkiness, à l'Anglaise, the light to filter down through an air which had forfeited its Yankee lucidity. You cross a ferry, disembark at the foot of the rock on unmistakably foreign soil, and then begin to climb into the city proper—the city intra muros. These walls, to the American vision, are of course the sovereign fact of Quebec; you take off your hat to them as you clatter through the gate. They are neither very high nor, after all, very hoary. Our clear American air is hostile to those mellow deposits and incrustations which enrich the historic masonry of Europe. Still, they are walls; till but a short time ago they quite encircled the town; they are garnished with little slits for musketry and big embrasures for cannon; they offer here and there to the strolling bourgeoisie a stretch of gray rampart; and they attest most agreeably that antique fact of the sturdy and definite personality of the town.

Before you reach the gates, however, you will have been reminded at a dozen points that you have come abroad. What is the essential difference of tone between American and European street-life? It seems something subtler and deeper than mere external accidents—than foreign architecture, than foreign pinks, and greens, and yellows plastering the house-fronts, than the names of the saints on the corners, than all the pleasant crookedness, and narrowness, and duskiness, the quaint economized spaces, the multifarious detail, the brown French faces, the ruddy English ones. It seems to be the general fact of detail itself—the hint in the air of a slow accidental accretion, in obedience to needs more timidly entertained and more sparingly gratified than our own. But, apart from the metaphysics of the question, Quebec is rich in the superficial graces of foreign towns. You can note the small, box-like houses in rugged stone or in stucco, each painted with uncompromising naïveté in some bright hue of the owner's fond choice; you note with joy, with envy, with momentary self-effacement, as a New Yorker, as a Bostonian, the innumerable calashes and cabs which contend for your selection; and you note, when you arrive at the hotel, that this is a blank and gloomy inn, of true provincial aspect, with slender promise of the "American plan." Perhaps, even, the clerk at the office will be gracious. I confess that, in my case, he was not, so that I was compelled to resort for lodging to a private house near by, where I enjoy a transitory glimpse of the vie intime of Quebec. I fancied, when I came in, that it would be a compensation for worse quarters to possess the little bit of picturesqueness I enjoy from my windows. Certain shabby Yankee sheds, indeed, encumber the foreground, but, like Dante, I will not relate of them. Beyond is a piece of garden, attached to nothing less than a convent of the cloistered nuns of St. Ursula. The convent chapel rises inside it, crowned with what seemed to me, in view of the circumstances, a real little clocher de France. The "circumstances," I confess, are simply a couple of stout French poplars. I call them French because, planted here by French hands, they thrive lustily and most notably Gallicize the landscape; while in our Yankee latitudes they decay utterly, as if unconscious of any picturesque commission. I do not say that the little convent belfry, roofed and coated as it is with quaint scales of tin, would, by itself, produce any very deep illusion; or that the whispering poplars, per se, would transport me to the Gallic mother-land; but poplars and belfry together constitute an "effect"—strike a musical note in the scale of the picturesque. I look fondly even at the little casements which command this prospect, for they too are an Old-World heritage. They open sidewise, in two wings, and are screwed together by that bothersome little iron handle over which we have fumbled so often in European inns.

If the windows tell of French dominion, of course larger matters testify with greater eloquence. A few days in a place so small as Quebec of course take the primal flavor from one's sensations; but when first I walked abroad I fancied myself back in a French sea-side town where I once spent a year, in common with a large number of economically disposed English. The French element offers the groundwork, and the English colony wears, for the most part, that half-genteel and migratory air which stamps the exiled and provincial British. They look as if they were still en voyage—still in search of low prices—the men in woollen shirts and Scotch bonnets; the ladies, we must suppose, with their choicer garments still in their trunks. Your very first steps will be likely to lead you to the market-place, which is a genuine bit of Europeanism. One side of it is occupied by a huge edifice of yellow stucco, with stone copings painted in blue, and a manner of porte cochère, leading into a veritable court—originally, I believe, a college of the early Jesuits, now a place of military stores. On the other stands the French cathedral, with an ample stone façade, a bulky stone tower, and a high-piled tin-scaled belfry—not architectural, of course, nor imposing, but with a certain gray maturity, and, as regards the belfry, a proper antique quaintness. Round about are shops and houses touching which, I think, it is no mere fancy that they might, as they stand, confine some dull place of France. The stalls and booths in the centre—tended by genuine peasants of tradition—brown-faced old Frenchwomen, with hard wrinkles and short petticoats, and white caps beneath their broad-brimmed hats, and more than one price, as I think you'll find—these, and the stationed calèches and cabriolets, complete a passably French picture. It is a proof of how nearly the old market-women resemble their originals across the sea that you very resentfully miss one or two of the proper features of the type—the sabots for the feet and the donkey for the load. Of course you go into the cathedral, and how forcibly that swing of the door, as you doff your hat in the cooler air, recalls the old tourist strayings and pryings beneath other skies! You find a big garish church, with a cold high light and a mild Renaissance promiscuity of stucco and gilding. It is, perhaps, a shade or so more sensibly Catholic than it would be with ourselves; but, in fine, it has pews and a boarded floor, and the few paintings are rather pale in their badness, and you are forced to admit that the Old-World tone which sustains itself so bravely elsewhere rather falters in its application to the heavy needs of ecclesiasticism.

Among the other lions of Quebec—notably in the Citadel—you find Protestant England supreme. A robust trooper of Her Majesty, with a pair of very tight trowsers and a very small cap, takes charge of you at the entrance of the fortifications, and conducts you through endless acres of belligerent masonry. I cannot speak of the place as an engineer, but only as a tourist, and the tourist is chiefly concerned with the view. This is altogether superb, and if Quebec is not the most picturesque city in America, this is no fault of its incomparable site. Perched on its mountain of rock, washed by a river as free and ample as an ocean-gulf, sweeping from its embattled crest a vast expanse of village-studded plain and surging highlands of nearer and further blue, single, beautiful, and strong, the warden of an imperial province—as it has managed from our scanty annals to snatch a past, you pray in the name of all that's handsome that it may have a future. I may add that, to the mind of the reflective tourist, these idle ramparts and silent courts present other visions than that of the mighty course of the river and its anchorage for navies. They evoke a shadowy image of that great English power, the arches of whose empire were once built strong on foreign soil: and as you stand upon these towering bastions and look abroad upon a land of alien speech, you seem to hear the echoed names of other strongholds and provinces—Gibraltar, Malta, India. Whether these arches are crumbling now, I do not pretend to say; but the last regular troops (in number lately much diminished) are just about to be withdrawn from Quebec, and in the private circles to which I have been admitted I hear sad forebodings of what society will lose by the departure of the "military." This single word is eloquent; it reveals a social order distinctly affiliated, in spite of remoteness, to that of which Miss Austen's novels are an early chronicle. Another opportunity for some such rich reflections as those I have hinted at is afforded you on the Plains of Abraham, to which you probably adjourn directly from the Citadel—another, but I am bound to say, in my opinion, a less inspiring one. A battle-field remains a battle-field, whatever may be done to it; but the scene of Wolfe's victory seems to me to have been profaned to within an inch, as I may say, of its immortality. An extremely meagre column, with an uncommonly neat inscription, however, ("Here died Wolfe, victorious,") struggles pitifully from the effacement cast upon its pure significance by the brutal granite mass of a bran-new prison rising hugely from the sacred level, as if it, forsooth, were the sole and proper monument of the heroic spirit exhaled there.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, September 15, 1871.

I BEGIN my correspondence afresh after a rather prolonged silence. Since I wrote to you the protracted session has brought itself to a conclusion, and we are now passing through the dead season of the year. The place of interest is occupied by the autumn manœuvres, in which we are endeavoring, though, of course, on a small scale, to follow the precedent set by Prussia. Some 40,000 men are going through the vicissitudes of a mimic campaign at the present moment; and, though a certain amount of ridicule was cast upon the proceedings by a stampede in which the horses of the Life Guards employed their first evening of camp life, I fancy that the general result promises to be tolerably satisfactory. I must, however, defer what I may have to say upon that topic, assuming that I have anything to say, until my next letter. A couple of elections which have recently taken place suggest an important enquiry. In East Surrey, the death of Mr. Charles Buxton, a man of the highest character, and a steady and sensible Whig, caused a vacancy, which has been filled by the election of a certain Mr. Watney, member of a large firm of brewers, who promises to give silent but regular support to the Conservatives. The Liberal press have endeavored to find excuses for the disastrous defeat suffered on this occasion. They argued that Mr. Watney was elected not so much as Conservative but as a brewer, because Mr. Gladstone's Government had shown some disposition to interfere with the unlimited right of the British race to intoxicating drinks. The defeat, however, was significant, whether the rebuke administered to Mr. Gladstone was provoked by his inordinate devotion to sobriety or to Liberalism. It has been followed up by another Conservative success, on a smaller scale, at the remote borough of Truro. There the defeated candidate was Mr. Jenkins, author of the clever satire of "Ginx's Baby," who must, I suppose, be described as a sentimental Radical. He talks eloquent semi-socialism about restoring the land to the people, and is an enthusiast for the maintenance of the British Empire. The remedy for social evils, according to him, is to be found in transplanting our paupers to the boundless waste lands of the colonies; and, though I have small faith in his nostrum, there is no doubt that he propounds it with much power of language. He failed, however, to carry with him a sufficient number of the electors of Truro, though his defeat was partly owing to certain local squabbles, which need not be expounded. It is, of course, impossible to say how much weight is to be attributed to these minute considerations in one of the most out-of-the-way corners of England; but it seems probable that here, as in the more metropolitan constituency, the result indicates a considerable dissatisfaction of the Liberal party with its leaders. Indeed, the fact that such a dissatisfaction exists could be no secret, to whatever causes it may be due. The fact to which I called your attention some months ago is becoming daily more obvious —namely, that Mr. Gladstone's Government has no longer that weight of popular enthusiasm behind it by which it was originally brought into office. On the contrary, the Government is so much disliked that it is just possible that the dislike may take the form of a Conservative reaction. The policy of the Opposition next session will be to force on a dissolution, and in the new elections they hope to win a majority. If this expectation be realized, the result would be remarkable. It is thirty years since a Parliament has been elected in England with a nominally Conservative majority, though, to say the truth, the Liberalism has not been of a very violent type; and it would be strange if Mr. Gladstone, coming in with an unprecedented majority, as the result of a large extension of the franchise, should have succeeded in so speedily converting victory into defeat.

Although this case may never occur, the mischief already done to the party is remarkable. I am not about to attempt an examination of the causes to which it is owing that a session which opened with the greatest promises has been the most disastrous failure ever known. The Government were forced to throw overboard almost all the important reforms which they had promised, without even bringing them before the House of Lords. Of the only two measures which got further, the Army Bill was cruelly mutilated, and finally passed only by an unusual exercise of prerogative; and the Ballot Bill was rejected by the House of Lords, to the very small grief of the world in general. If you believe the writers of leading articles, the circumstances attending the end of these two measures have produced great indignation. According to Radicals, the people are about to demand that the House of Lords shall no longer be permitted to stop legislation imperatively demanded by public opinion. According to Conservatives, Mr. Gladstone's rash attack on the Constitution has roused the affection of the nation for its old institutions; and Hampden, and Russell, and various other eminently respectable people, who were not Conservatives, it is true, in their own day, turn in their graves at the bare name of prerogative. According to my observation, there is very little truth in either of these assertions. The ballot was a good old-fashioned cry, but nobody cared enough about it to be angry with the House of Lords for postponing its adoption. As for Mr. Gladstone's rehabilitation of the old-fashioned weapon of prerogative, it may have been wrong, and possibly the precedent may lead to rather summary exertions of power by future leaders of a parliamentary majority; but we are not likely to quarrel seriously with anybody who gets anything really done, even though he takes an unauthorized short cut to his object. For, to say the truth, what really disgusts thinking men as much as it disappoints the ordinary politician, is the increasing incapacity for work of our parliamentary machinery. Mr. Gladstone's tendency to over-complexity and refinement, his eagerness to satisfy everybody, which has ended in disgusting Radicals without conciliating Tories, and the vagaries of some of his colleagues, have undoubtedly made things worse than usual this session. But it would be unfair to put the failure down entirely to the personal peculiarities of the present ministry. Every year makes Parliament more unequal to the task which it endeavors to discharge. Not content with being the supreme power in the state, it insists on settling all manner of minute details, for which its constitution renders it totally unfit. A body of 658 members, with unlimited liberty of talk, and with forms expressly contrived so as to give the minority the power of obstructing as much as possible any measures with which it may disagree, undertakes not merely to settle the main outlines of national policy, but to frame the pettiest regulations, which might properly be left to ministers or even to the police; to settle all manner of private business, from the railway system of the country down to the enclosure of half-a-dozen acres of waste land; and, besides this, to hold general debates on personal grievances or on questions of foreign policy or constitutional law for the enlightenment of mankind. As business increases and multiplies, the multifarious nature of the occupations of Parliament, and the total want of any organization to enable it to deal satisfactorily with the task before it, become increasingly obvious; and when an opposition takes every advantage of the forms of the House to oppose the transaction of business, talks recklessly against time, raises frivolous difficulties at every step, or insists on discussing general principles apropos to every detail, its unfitness to deal with the vast accumulation of business becomes more glaringly obvious. Of course, a strong popular feeling on any subject may force a particular measure through Parliament, though it will probably be at the cost of other equally essential but less taking reforms. When, as in the present session, there is no matter which appeals very forcibly to the popular imagination—for army reform is rather a dry subject to others than those professionally interested—we come to the kind of deadlock which we have been recently witnessing.

Of course the evil I have noticed is more or less inherent in all systems of parliamentary government; but our own Parliament, which has not only become the supreme power in the state, but has absorbed into itself so much that belongs properly to the executive, and interferes so constantly even with the smaller details of administration, presents an extreme case of the evil. Mr. Mill and his followers are very anxious to secure a due representation of minorities: I have nothing particular to say against the general principle, but at present minorities seem to be so well protected in England, that any minority, however small, can by a little resolute action hinder all legislative action opposed to its views. There is, in short, unlimited power of obstruction, or rather a power limited only by the fear that some vehement outbreak of popular feeling may some day sweep away the obnoxious institution. But that fear is very remote in many cases, and meanwhile the wheels of our legislative machinery creak wearily and move very slowly on their axles. Some reform in the direction of improving the parliamentary capacities for business would be of infinitely more value than those on which far more eloquence is expended; but it is useless to say what shape it should take, as there is no present chance of any change being seriously proposed. We shall grumble a good deal at the accumulating arrears of work, and go on in our old style till some revolution, pacific or otherwise, clears them off with greater rapidity. Meanwhile politics are rather out of place at the present season, and I hope to dismiss them until the approach of the next session brings them once more before us.

Correspondence.

THE BARINGS AND THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The substitution of a new and unknown banking-house for one which has so long and so well served the diplomatic and consular service is not only an antic, but a most serious and injurious blunder on the part of the Administration—an injustice with two edges, of which the sharpest, by far, our Government has turned to itself. I have no means of knowing how Baring Bros. & Co. regard their deposition, but I know that in monetary circles in London there is a good deal of surprise at the injustice, and wonder at the bad policy, which are at the bottom of it; and I hear that the Barings are very much annoyed.

Since my connection with the State Department, I have known numerous instances where the kindness and delicacy (beyond that of business men) of Baring Bros. & Co. have extricated the servants of the United States from serious discomfort and discredit. They made it a rule (which may have had its exception, but none to my knowledge) never to dishonor the draft of a known representative of the United States; and when, through the carelessness of the Treasury (as it twice happened in my own experience), the requisite authority to draw on the Barings was not forwarded by the Department, the drafts of the functionary were still honored, though sometimes to the loss of the bankers. I recall one case in which a United States Minister, having overdrawn his salary about £1,000, was suddenly replaced —which stopped his salary, of course—and died on his way home, leaving no estate responsible for his debt, which the bankers lost. It also happened to me once that, by the negligence of the Treasury, I was left for five months without authority to draw on it, during which time my drafts were honored by the Barings, at their own risk, and simply on account of my being an official of the United States. On another occasion, I had to negotiate for the benefit of my predecessor a draft for about $3,000, authority to make which had been given me by the Treasury, but of which no notice had been sent to the Barings, and the draft was negotiated and paid some time before they received the authority to pay from the Government. Courtesies of this kind live in the memory of any gentleman, and make those who blunder into our diplomatic or consular service regret, with the pain which participation in a great injustice causes, the ill-advised change in our financial agency.

But there is another than the sentimental side to the matter. Our representatives in distant parts, where exchange is not always the easiest thing in the world to arrange, will find a difference of some per cent. in the rate of negotiating drafts on a house as well known and highly honored as any in the world, and a house one does not even know the name of. Clews, Habicht & Co. means nothing on a bill in some parts of the world, and I have been where I might have starved for all their credit would have done for me. If our Government thinks that its credit is enough to carry a new banker in strange parts, it is greatly mistaken; the commercial world believes it to be very rich, but very mean and very indifferent to its credit, or that of its representatives. This new proof of its inconsiderateness will help the impression, and will not help our bonds in this market in the least, but, on the contrary, has already brought them a certain amount of disfavor, which Baring Bros. & Co. could, if they would, increase greatly.

If we want to encourage American finance, let us be logical, and make all our drafts negotiable at Washington, through American bankers located abroad. It is true we should have to lose fifty per cent. in discount, but we should have the consolation of keeping the business amongst ourselves (ignoring, for the sake of the ratio ad absurdum, that Mr. Sturges, of B. B. & Co., is a very good sample of American).—I am, Sir, yours truly,

W. J. Stillman.

London, Sept. 9, 1871.

Notes.

In copying lately from Messrs. Lee & Shepard's announcements, we reproduced an error in regard to a work by Mr. F. H. Underwood, of which the true title is "Cloud Pictures." It will contain four stories: "The Exile of von Adelstein's Soul;" "Topankalon;" "Herr Regenbogen's Concert:" "A Great-Organ Prelude." The last two have already appeared in print. Mr. Underwood, who is the author of a "Hand-Book of English Literature," has in preparation a companion volume of American Literature.——Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Sons will soon publish, in connection with foreign houses, a new and illustrated edition, in one volume quarto, of D'Aubigné's "History of the Reformation in the Sixteenth Century," "Pictorial and Industrial Art," and "Health and its Conditions." Their own list of fall announcements comprises the following: "Gallery of Landscape Painters"—twenty-four steel engravings from the works of American artists of distinction; a new illustrated red-line edition of the poems of Thomas Hood; the Knickerbocker edition of poets, in large type, for the library; fifteen volumes of a standard "Historical Library"; a "Handbook Series"; and "Travels in the Caucasus," by Mr. Kennan, author of the agreeable work on "Tent Life in Siberia."——The firm of Sever, Francis & Co., of Boston and Cambridge, is dissolved, on account of the ill-health of Mr. Francis, and the Cambridge business of the old house will hereafter be carried on by Mr. Charles W. Sever, the senior partner, while the junior, Mr. John Allyn, will carry on its publishing business and its general Boston business at 21 Bromfield Street, Boston. Mr. Francis will retire with the good wishes of all frequenters of "The University Bookstore," his scholarship and taste having been of service to them in many ways.

—Every year, and, indeed, almost every season, one or two absurd predictions as to the weather or an enormous elemental phenomenon of some kind are set going by some irresponsible joker, who, attaching to them the name of the scientific man who is popularly believed to be the most profound in acquirements, secures for them at once insertion into all the papers, and gulls half the people in the country. The last case in point is the revival this summer of the old "tidal wave" story, and the prediction is fathered on Professor Agassiz, perhaps because he knows something about fish. The wave is due on the fifth of next month, and is to roll in on all the Atlantic coast a wall of water fifty feet high. We believe the northern limit of the devastation was not fixed, but that it was to reach as far south as New Orleans the following letter makes plain:

"New Orleans, La., Sept 9, 1871.

"Professor C. G. Forshey:

"Dear Sir: A widely extended impression prevails among the people of the Gulf and Atlantic coast, produced by a prediction, imputed to Prof. Agassiz, of a great tidal wave, or inundation of the coast from the sea.

"After some conversation with you, we ask on behalf of ourselves and many others we venture to represent, that you give us for publication your views as to the merits of the prediction, and, if convenient, your reasons, briefly expressed, for the views you entertain.

"We ask this favor, believing that such publication will tend to allay the public anxiety, from your reputation as a man of science.

"We have the honor to subscribe ourselves, very truly, your obedient servants."

This was signed by five gentlemen and published in the New Orleans Times with a letter from Professor Forshey, in which he denounces the "monstrous and cruel hoax" which has disturbed them, and defends the "illustrious philosopher" to whom it was attributed against the suspicion of originating it. He then proceeds to give them a few words of sense which it is a pity that they or anybody else of mature years, and living under a republican form of government, should need. There is need of them, however. From North Carolina a report comes that about Beaufort and along the neighboring coast preachers are warning people to flee from before the face of the angel of the Lord, and a revival in great force is going on in expectation of the "tidal wave." And the authorities of the Signal Office at Washington think it necessary to say that "no predictions in reference to the tidal wave so called" have been issued from that office, and that no such wave is by them expected.

—A Western correspondent thinks we should probably oblige others besides himself if we could furnish "some information about a French and an Italian periodical published in this country that will pay reading by people who appreciate the Nation." We regret that it is out of our power to comply with this request, for the reason that we are not acquainted with any such periodical, and that we do not believe any such exists. It would not be difficult to name a great number of organs representing nearly every European nationality (a Bohemian newspaper is the latest that has been brought to our attention), published in the United States, but there is no colony except the Germans which, either in numbers or in cultivation, is capable of sustaining the kind of journal we suppose our correspondent to intend. From the French in Louisiana something might have been expected worthy of their social position and length of settlement; but we have yet to meet with it. In this city, the leading newspaper, the Courrier des États-Unis, was obsequiously imperialist down to Sedan, and was unscrupulous enough to manufacture in its own office, during the war, fictitious Cable despatches purporting to come from a well-informed and trustworthy observer in Paris. The Messager Franco-Américain is more honest, but less readable. It is probably to Canada that we must look for the best fruit of Franco-American culture; and in fact, Messrs. Dawson Brothers publish in Montreal (the July number was the third) La Revue Critique de Législation et de Jurisprudence du Canada. We purpose to speak of this magazine critically hereafter; but it has an appearance of good promise, and the inference must not be drawn from its title that its scope is purely Canadian. There has been at least one article on the Civil Law of Louisiana, contributed by a jurist of that State, and more may doubtless be expected from this side of the line. We should say, from first impressions, that any reader of the Nation for whom the Revue's specialty has an interest would be repaid by the reading of it. As for Italian journals, we know only the one which is published daily here, and which is but a very poor affair. Without being asked, we venture to recommend, as we have done already more than once, O Novo Mundo, the fortnightly illustrated Portuguese (Brazilian) newspaper, whose office is in the Times building. It has, by the way, entered upon its second year. Its editorial articles are numerous, thoughtful, enlightened, and in the best sense of the term religious. Any one who understands French and Italian, or even Latin, will find the Portuguese easy to acquire.

—We fear it must be conceded that the present abolition legislation in Brazil is not serious, nor meant to be serious. If the Emperor's heart were in it, it is difficult to explain why he should have left the country at so important a juncture, or why he should have allowed his ministers to offer so crude, impracticable, and dilatory a measure as that now under discussion. The only immediate emancipation entertained by it is for some 3,000 slaves belonging to the crown; all the rest is gradual, and will not be completed till the end of the century. Slaves born after the passage of the act are nominally free, but really in a condition of servitude for twenty or thirty years. Up to the age of eight, they are to be supported by their master, with a subvention from the state; from eight to twenty-one, the state itself will take them in charge and "educate" them, unless the master prefers to keep them, and let them "work for themselves," till their majority. This is a very paltry concession to the popular demand for abolition, and is so regarded by the public and the independent press of Brazil. There is a strong opposition manifested to the proposed rates of compensation to slave-owners, which may make itself felt in modifying the law as originally framed; but of the best that can be passed now we may predict with certainty that it will ere long be superseded by fresh legislation more responsive to the needs of the times and the fixed sentiment of the people. There will be one sign by which to recognize a scheme that is in earnest: it will embrace a land policy, of which the first article will be the taxation of real estate. This effected, slavery will not linger long. The great estates will have to be broken up, and thrown into the market, or relinquished to the Government, which can then both offer homesteads to immigrants, and find means to develop the empire by opening roads, and otherwise preparing the country for habitation. The Germans already settled in the southern provinces are hastening the adoption of such a policy, from which the slave oligarchy has nothing to expect but overthrow.

—Everybody has been laughing at Sir William Thomson's conjecture, recently laid before the British Association, that this planet may have originally been provided with living things by means of an aerolite thrown to us from some other planet already provided with life. It was not known whether the distinguished electrician was in jest or in earnest, but the laugh was as ready in either case. If he was joking, the joke was held to be a good one, as against those scientific men who now and again rejoice at finding the origin of life, and then, by-and-by, have it pointed out to them by the other scientific men and the clergy that what they have found is a form of life merely, and that life itself, in its essence, is as far from them as ever. If he was in earnest, the laugh was still against them, and also against him with them. The origin of life on the other planet was still to be explained, and an incandescent aerolite was thought to be a queer bearer for such a burden as Sir William had laid upon it. A correspondent, in a recent number of Nature, takes up the tale, informing the editor that Sir William Thomson will no doubt be gratified to hear that in a curious book, published some time since, and entitled "A Visit to My Discontented Cousin," his remarkable hypothesis regarding the origin of life on our earth is anticipated. The Discontented Cousin, having heard a discussion about a certain meteoric stone, goes home and, in a vision, the stone appears to him. The mass undergoes various changes, and soon organic dots appear, one of which showed signs of active life, for, after some wriggling, it rose to its microscopic legs, and confronted the dreamer with a self-confident mien. Conversation ensued. The meteoric man tells the story of his planet, beginning with a remark which goes some little way in establishing the doctrine of his and our community of origin: "We know all about you, old boy," he said, "and the British Association, and we don't think much of you, either." So the "British Ass.," it is probable, was not originally indebted to Sir William Thomson for such life as there was in his joke.

—One of the best specimens of modern legal literature of the Belgian type, interesting in itself and in the sharp contrast it affords to our own methods of study, will be found in a stout, handsomely printed pamphlet of pp. 288, viz.: "Concours Universitaire, 1869-70. Exposé du Système de la Législation civile sur les Droits dont les Étrangers jouissent en Belgique. Mémoire couronné, présenté par Hippolyte Lippens" (Ghent, 1871). This scholarly essay upon the legal relations of foreigners who reside in Belgium, is a very clear and orderly exhibition of the way in which such subjects are treated, exhaustively and analytically, in the schools of civil law. Starting out with a sketch of the condition of foreigners in very early times, it brings down the history to the French Revolution, showing the effect that event had upon their legal status under the civil code. Then, starting afresh with the law of Belgium, it goes carefully over the legislation and the judicial decisions on the subject—drawing, of course, largely on the contemporaneous and nearly uniform law of France, but pointing out the differences both in actual and in theoretical legal discussions of the question; next takes up in turn each of the subdivisions, the "acte de l'état civil," domicile, absence, marriage, divorce or limited separation, paternal and filial relation, adoption and guardianship, paternal power, minority, "tutelle" and emancipation, majority, interdiction, and "mise sous conseil judiciaire," and then passing into the broader rights of property, with all its qualifications of intestacy, of wills, of contracts, of marriage, and of imprisonment, it goes into particular details of processes and trial. The absence of "case law," with its easy display of wealth drawn from indexes and digests, is not more remarkable than the authority attributed to treatise writers, and the constant recurrence to the text of the civil code itself, as giving often its own best gloss on the subject-matter in hand. A treatise on the same subject in this country would be a very acceptable help to some of our claimants before the "Alabama Commission" at Geneva; but who would like to undertake to reconcile, even if he could collect, all the cases in all the courts of the Union and the States bearing on the rights and relations of foreigners in this country?

—Julian Schmidt addresses, through the National-Zeitung, an open letter to MM. Erckmann-Chatrian, the occasion being a sentence in the latest tale by these partners in authorship, called "Histoire d'un Sous-Maître," which originally appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes. In the number for December, 1870, the venerable schoolmaster of seventy, Jean Baptiste, is represented as saying to a younger friend that though popular education is the weightiest lever of human progress, "it is not enough to learn to read, write, and cipher decently; for a person can be well instructed and yet very stupid. That's an everyday observation. How comes it, for instance, that the Germans, who can every one of them read and write, are fighting against the French Republic, ushered in, as it is, in behalf of human rights—German rights as well as French? It comes of their bad training. Instead of imparting to them notions of freedom and justice, their heads are filled with ideas of revenge and mastery. With all their great science, these people are nevertheless extremely narrow, inasmuch as they suffer themselves to be butchered for traditions from the time of Clovis, in the interest of kings who make sport of them. Candidly, I prefer to this the ignorance of the French." Mr. Schmidt meets this charge against his countrymen of being slaves to historic renown by a very felicitous quotation from a former novel of Erckmann-Chatrian, in which a certain character explains how the soldiers of the Republic came at last to be soldiers of the Empire, "waging war to the knife on those who only asked for peace, as they themselves thought only of posts of honor, dignities, and riches, and forgetting all notion of human rights": "If you ask me how these things were possible, I answer you—It all came from the inordinate love of the French for glory." The Germans understood this very well when they asked of the Republic the same guaranties they would have required of the Empire. Peace without exactions would not have diminished one iota the chances of a future war; with the same madness, the French would have adopted the catch-word—"Revenge for Wörth!" "Revenge for Gravelotte!" "Revenge for Sedan!" And what sort of a Republic was there to deal with, after all?—"one whose legislature is two-thirds monarchist, and which is only kept from reverting into a monarchy because it cannot decide among the pretenders to the throne. And all these pretenders have promised their future subjects revenge for Wörth, and Gravelotte, and Sedan." Jean Baptiste hopes by means of a sort of catechism to instruct the French in their rights and duties. Mr. Schmidt suggests that special stress must be laid on the duties. He points out two modes of discipline by which the Prussians have their notions of duty sharpened—the universal military service, and (for the better classes) municipal office-holding. "They have served as privates, the young count beside the valet-de-chambre and the peasant's son: I call that democracy in the fulfilment of duty." And his final advice to the old schoolmaster is that his instruction be moral as well as intellectual; and that he warn against lying especially, "holding up a lie to the child's soul as something indecent and to be repelled." It should be stated that the critic praises the general tendency of the "Story of a Sub-master," the sentiment in question being in fact the only one to which exception can be taken.

THE MAGAZINES FOR OCTOBER.

THE Catholic World is always too polemical for the general reader, and is quite as much so this month as commonly, but Fernan Caballero's "Lucas Garcia" is a story which would, no doubt, interest most of our readers. To be sure, it may better be waited for until it gets into book-form. Another article, "The Liquefaction of the Blood of Saint Januarius," is of a kind that many of our readers would be apt to pronounce rather disgusting, but it will please all violent Romanists, we suppose, and all violent Protestants. It goes at length into statistical tables as to the condition of the blood at various stages of its exhibition—as the time when it is "viscous and grumous"; the time when it becomes "jelly-like"; the time when it is very hard; the time when the outside portion of it remains hard, forming a sort of incarnate cup within the glass cup, while all the middle "moves about in quite a fluid condition"; the time, on the contrary, when a hard lump swims about in the centre of the cup; the time when it is fully liquefied and covered with froth. The miracle is by no means the wanton exhibition of supernatural power which the American Protestant is apt to believe it. "When vice is rife in the city, and especially when sins against religion abound," the displeasure of heaven is marked by the withholding of the miraculous liquefaction of the blood, which thus indicates the need of increased ardor in the performance of necessary religious duties. Again, it has on one occasion, at least, saved the city from destruction by earthquake and lava. In December, 1631, the Neapolitans in imminent danger of total destruction from Vesuvius, resolved to call on their patron saint, and the reliquary being borne forth from the cathedral by the archbishop, at the head of a great procession, had no sooner reached the square than a rift in the cloud of ashes overhanging the city let in the sun upon the tomblike darkness, which soon vanished wholly. Outside the city thousands had perished; within it, not a soul. It is added that, "ere the archbishop had descended from the altar, all were aware that an east wind had sprung up, and that the smoke and cinders and ashes were being blown away across the sea"; but the stopping of the lava streams is not to be thus accounted for. The statistical tables given by the author of this article are full and numerous, but not particularly intelligible. On the whole, we do not know as being anywhere accessible to the American reader of magazines a fuller account of this annual ceremony than is here offered. Nothing is left unrelated. Indeed, the Catholic World, as often as not, takes the line of presenting boldly the extreme positions of its faith. Doctor McCosh, for instance, has said recently, in substance, that it is difficult to conceive of an Œcumenical Council at Rome, or a Methodist Conference in Connecticut, or an Episcopal Convocation at Lambeth, fancying that it has the right to decide for or against the discoveries of Sir Isaac Newton, or the doctrine of the conservation of force On this the editor remarks, that Doctor McCosh possesses "truth" only in a mutilated form, and wholly overlooks the fact that religion is the first science, and nothing can be true, scientifically or otherwise, that is contrary or unfavorable to it. There is plenty more of the same sort; "Our Lady of Lourdes," for instance, will be found as surprising to the American mind as the article on the liquefaction miracle, or this "Christianity and Positivism" from which we have just been quoting.

In "The Elements of our Nationality" there is some sensible advice to Irishmen in this country as to the help they should afford their fellow-countrymen. Not by Fenianism, the writer tells them, are they to assist their brethren, but by following the example of the Germans, who have organized a system of receiving German immigrants when they first arrive, and giving them advice, instruction, and assistance of great value to the new comer. Singularly enough, the Irish, all of whom spend money freely to enable their relatives to come over here, have never thought to supplement their individual exertions by organization in the interest of their countrymen as a body. The superior thrift, as well as the superior intelligence and education, of the German immigrant, make of him, however, a person who endorses himself, so to speak, to a far greater extent than the city-haunting Irish peasant, and whom, therefore, it is far safer to endorse and assist.

Another noticeable article in the Catholic World is on the riot of the twelfth of July, which is not treated of in a very satisfactory manner, though there is in it more of sense than of rancor and unfairness. But not much in the way of conciliation is to be expected from a writer who speaks of the Orangemen as representing "the party that in Ireland fought for a foreign invader and a chief of rebels against their own country, and were at once traitors to their king and nation." That is to say, they fought against James the Second, and for a cause which, were it to be fought for over again in this country next summer, instead of having been won for good and all a hundred and eighty ago, would be supported by thirty-odd millions of Americans, South and North, white and black. It is the belief on the part of many Americans that Roman Catholics do to a great extent hold views like those expressed in this article before us which causes them to distrust the Irish Catholics, and compels a reluctant sympathy with the bigoted Orangemen, who cannot be made to look foolish as long as Catholic writers supply for their insulting processions a background like this.

The Galaxy opens with a translation of an extremely interesting story by Turgeneff. It is one of his gloomiest and most tragical—a story to be shunned by those who have given up reading pathetic and mournful things, and even by some such as have not done so, but who will not read unrelieved tragedy. Still it is, as we say, very interesting as a study of character. The analysis is very searching, and we should say that its results are perfectly in accord with truth. It is a simply told story: Four young people, who have known each other as children, are, as it happens, brought together again in the first prime of their youth. They fall in love and become engaged to be married, but the young men go away, and their love—partly a poetic dream, partly passion, partly luxurious trifling—early fades and cools, and the girls are deserted. By-and-by Alexis writes to one of them; not to the one of them whom he had forsaken, but to her sister, Maria Alexandrovna. Why he writes he does not know, he says, though the reader sees why. And Alexis is not mistaken in the belief which he evidently half-cherishes that Maria will reply to him, and that soon her heart will be interested. We must not, however, tell the story on to its doubly tragical and ruinous catastrophe, though we might do so without interfering with its principal claims to attention, its psychological truthfulness, and its excellence of finished workmanship. It is a kind of reading that one may perhaps feel a reluctance to recommend. Still its ability at all events is not to be gainsaid, and its morbidness one may almost expect to find acting as its own antidote.

For a very different class of readers Mr. Edward Cropsey's account of the receivers of stolen goods in this city, their modes of operation, and their relations with the police and the thieves, is well adapted. Mr. E. A. Pollard's somewhat glowing tribute to the emancipated negro has more general interest. Mr. Pollard may not have had an opportunity to hear them, but we could tell him stories of negroes selling their votes and of negroes planning and executing elective frauds with a skill and effect that leave nothing to be desired. That the general aspect of the negro suffrage problem is not on the whole very discouraging must, however, we think, be admitted. His best friends are not at present his political flatterers, however, but the men and women who are educating his children. Doubtless it is true, too, that the mere experience of the cares of freedom, the habit he is acquiring of managing his own affairs, is an educational process of very high importance. And among the most hopeful signs of the times is the spectacle of the Virginian conservatives, and those of other States, welcoming the political assistance of the colored men. Nothing but good, we believe, is to be expected of this, and just here we are confident is to be found the most probable as well as the very best solution of the political and social troubles of the South. The prospects of that part of the country are certainly dark enough at present, and we shall probably see worse things there before we see better. It can hardly be expected, for example, that some one or two of the Southern States are not to pass through an experience of repudiation; and the men are not many who admit with Mr. Pollard, at least with the requisite unreserve and cheerfulness, that to take away the voting franchise from the negro is all but physically impossible; and if it were possible, would still be not desirable. But Mr. Pollard points out some things that are reassuring, his own conversion from the belief held by him ten years ago that the slave-trade ought to be revived being itself not without its significance. At all events, every word of sense on the subject is a clear gain.

For the rest, the Galaxy for October has an article by Mr. Greeley entitled "The One-Term Principle"; something by "Carl Benson" on "Popular Fallacies"; a little poem, of some prettiness, by Mr. William Winter; the "Scientific Miscellany"; and the notices of current literature, both English and German. These latter are neither numerous enough nor weighty enough, and, together with the scrappiness of the "Nebulæ" and the dolefulness of the humorous department, give the magazine something of an air of shabbiness which is not diminished by its typographical appearance, outside and in. The illustration this month, which is a portrait of Mr. Anthony Trollope, is the best of the series in which it appears, and deserves an amount of commendation as regards its likeness to the original, and the quality of the engraving and printing, which could not be given to any of its predecessors. Upon Mr. Greeley's article we have already commented, and have shown, we think, its inadequacy. We may add that it marks so clearly Mr. Greeley's opinion as to the next Presidential canvass, and it is so clumsy in its method of connecting the question of civil-service reform with quite another question, that we fear it cannot be taken as committing Mr. Greeley to the support of the needed reformation. "Carl Benson's" "Popular Fallacies" is calculated to be of service to young writers who have had no opportunity of studying logic, and will have done more good than most magazine articles if it leads a certain number of editors, say, to an acquaintaince with Whately's little text-book, which it mentions.

In Lippincott's Monthly the magazine reader will find something worth reading in the "Baudelaire" of Miss Lucy Fountain, who, however, has been too much impressed by the poet, and makes of him a good deal more than he deserves. On Swinburne, and his degree of inferiority to his French idol, Miss Fountain makes a few brief remarks which are more indubitably close to perfectly just criticism, and altogether the essay is, as we have said, worth reading. Still better worth reading and very beautiful is the little story translated by Miss Agnes Irwin from the French of Gustave Droz. "Making an Omelette" is the title of it, and it is so charming and pure that it may well be regretted that M. Droz should have written some of the things which he has consented to write. It is so charming and so good in feeling that not only may it be regretted that M. Droz has disgraced himself in some of his stories and sketches, but it may be fully expected that he will write no more such, and that it was the exigencies of youthful authorship which compelled him at the beginning of his career to consult other tastes than his own. Besides these two articles, Lippincott's has some more of "Mr. Whymper's Scrambles Among the Alps," with the really excellent illustrations; a short sketch by Mr. Prentice Mulford, which sets forth very well the jocular barbarity with which the Californian regards the Chinaman, and which has a smack of the pioneer humor; the last of M. Donbavand's "Wild Ireland," and a book-notice or two, one of which is acrid enough to suggest apprehensions for the writer's health if he is going to continue in the profession. The October number of Lippincott's is at the usual average as regards the rest of its contents, and taken altogether is a good number of a magazine which, without pretentiousness, does a good deal of honest work. Typographically considered, it may be said to show respect for its public, and self-respect and good taste on the part of its publishers and printers, and this is more than can be said of some others of our magazines which have a greater reputation and make larger claims.

Counting out some poetry which need not delay any one, Harper's begins with a gossiping and amusing account of the old times of the post-office in New York. Think of General Bailey's holding the office of postmaster for twenty-five years, from Jefferson's time till Jackson's, with no thought of removal. We cannot have everything, however—though it is difficult to see why we might not have something like that—and those were the days when the Western mail used to be set across the river in a skiff from "Paulus Hook," now departed, and the Boston mail used to come in great state down the Bowery, drawn by four horses, while the driver, when he reached the place where now the Cooper Union stands, used to blow a horn, which could be heard for a mile or more, and notified the suburban farmers that he was coming. Then the citizens would walk out to see the mail-coach and the four blooded horses. There is usually something agreeable in recollections of this sort, and this paper is not an exception to the rule, and will be widely liked, as local knowledge of New York is widely spread.

Following this article are two others—both illustrated, and not illustrated very well, for Harper & Brothers believe in profusion of pictures rather than in excellence of them, and so no doubt do their audience—the one being about the Yale College Expedition of 1870 out in the Platte River Country; the other being the last of the papers of Siberian travel and adventure. Both will please. And some people will be pleased with an article with something new about "John Phœnix," by General R. B. Marcy—to some other palates it will be of too antiquated a flavor. It is the mess-room talk of an officer who has spent many years telling stories in frontier forts. Gossipy, too, is the "Bygone Celebrities of Bond Street," by the veteran Richard Horne, the author of the forgotten poem of "Orion," so much praised by Poe, and of multitudes of other things equally forgotten, and once for a little time a Bond Street celebrity himself. It has a good story or two to tell, though it must be confessed that they are not of a particularly exalted character. Still, it is worth while, if only for recollection and reflection, when next Miss Lydia Thompson's scanty raiment points the moral against us, to know the facts in regard to Lord Petersham's appearance at evening parties, when George the Fourth was king, in tights of a boiled-prawn color. We do better than that. The conquest of Ireland is a rapid summary of the history of English oppression and Irish division during six hundred years, told with correctness and spirit; "Down the Eastern Shore" is a description of Maryland east of the Chesapeake, well done by Mr. Bayard Taylor; "The American Baron" is lively as ever; the Editor's Easy Chair talks well of Scott; and for the rest of the October Harper's, a serious "poem," of good moral intention, by "P. V. Nasby," and a due allowance of love, science, "Editor's Drawer," and "Editor's Historical Record."

Dr. T. M. Coan, in Scribner's Monthly, makes a good article about the eruptions of Kilauea and Mauna Loa, the Hawaiian volcanoes, which have so often afforded the grandest spectacles of lava streams that the world has shown. It is well illustrated, and, indeed, Scribner's has lately done itself much credit by its illustrations, some of which, prepared abroad, have rarely, if ever, been equalled in our periodical literature; and some of which, prepared at home, will have the effect of stirring up publishers who hitherto have thought themselves beyond competition in this field. In the other details of its external appearance, Scribner's is to be praised; and it is no small matter in a magazine which is so emphatically a magazine for a wide circulation in families of the average kind, that it should do something in the way of educating the taste. It is announced to be the intention of its owners to make very shortly some changes which will be improvements. It will be enlarged, not only by the addition of some pages, but also by the removal of the "leads" which separate the lines so far at present; and thus more matter will be found in each page.

"Water, its Ways and Uses," is a discursive article, which, like Doctor Coan's, will please the boys, as will "Wilfrid Cumbermede." For the heads of the family there is a discussion on the question whether Adam was the first man? which has geology enough in it to make Doctor Justin Edwards turn over in his grave; a sensible article by Doctor Edward Spencer "On the Philosophy of Good Health" and "A Summer Trip to Newfoundland," which ought to send some vacation-seekers down there in coming summers. As for the young ladies of the family, they may very easily find love stories less pretty than that by Mrs. E. A. Walker; and they may easily find some far prettier and far pleasanter than that by Mr. Albert Webster, who ought to be able to see that he makes of his hero a detestable rascal. Some of the incidents have, however, a kind of freshness not usual in stories of this grade. The editorial departments are well filled, and the "etching" at the end is clever and spirited, though a little too severe on the old farmers of the New England town-meeting. After all, they did build the "school-housen," sourly as they used to grumble over the appropriations.

A better Atlantic has not been seen in a long time than this October number. The appearance of Mr. Atkinson's article, "Free Trade Revenue Reform," is an important event in the political world as well as the financial, and will undoubtedly affect legislation at Washington next winter. Nothing could show with more of forcible clearness that the country is taxed foolishly and wastefully. "To take a small portion of that which men seek as the end of their labor, rather than to impair the means whereby they gain their subsistence," is just the rule that every House of Representatives for the last twelve years has not proceeded upon.

Of the other prose articles in the Atlantic, "Kaweah's Run" we may safely recommend to all our readers as an admirable story of adventure. The lowness of tone is very effective; and it appears to be anything but merely artistic. We commend Kaweah's story particularly to all lovers of the horse, and, but that comparisons are odious, we would recommend readers of the Atlantic to compare this story with another one which also appeared in the Atlantic, some three years ago perhaps, and which, like this, was about a horse—a horse in a railroad-car. To apprehend the difference between the two in point of sincerity, in restraint, and in consequent true force, would be to have learned one lesson in good writing. Of Mr. Howells's essay and story in one, and of Mr. James's story, we need say nothing, except, perhaps, that neither is just nor so perfectly characteristic of its author as the former parts have been. "On an Old Latin Text-Book" is by Mr. T. W. Higginson, and besides some pleasant writing has some sensible remarks on the classicist side of the dispute between the scientific men and the others. We confess that, for our own part, we see no reason why "culture" is not safe enough to admit of all its friends possessing their souls in peace. In this country especially, one can think of the Tweeds and Ashleys and Butlers themselves without too much perturbation when one is reminded of the rate at which colleges grow; and grow better with each twelve months, as well as larger and more numerous.

The poetry of the October Atlantic is by Mr. Harte, Mrs. Piatt, Mr. B. G. Hosmer, and Mr. Whittier. The last it would be wrong to praise as poetry merely: it brings one so near to the good and tender heart of a good man. No one will read it without renewed affection for the poet, and without being glad in the serenity of the closing years of his life—a serene close which he surely, of all men in the world, misnames in calling it "self-indulgent years."

> "The outflung heart of youth,
> The tumult of the truth,"

